When a prominent New Yorker, whose name I now forget, was asked, upon the witness-stand if he was a Spiritualist, he replied, "Yes, but not a damn fool." Any total abstinence Liberal (and their name is legion) who does not hanker after legislativ power to force total abstinence down the throats of his fellows with a legal ramrod is privileged to say, and say it truthfully, "Yes I am a Liberal; I am a teetotaler, but I am not a damn fool."

I cannot close without entering a protest against "Liberta's" holding the Yankee up before the German as a bright and shining example for him to imitate. The illustration and lesson will apply if you will only turn it other end to. The first work in the cause of temperance is to Germanize the Yankee—induce him to sit down and drink instead of standing up to it like a giraffe; induce him to sip and chat alternately instead of throwing it down viciously, as you would hurl a rock at a mad dog; induce him to eat a bretzel or something else with his drink, thereby promoting instead of destroying the peristaltic motion of the stomach. But, above all, induce him to quench his thirst with beer instead of intensifying it and setting his brain on fire with fusil-oil-strychnin-forty-rod-kill-me-quick "rot-gut."

The abuse of anything is no argument against the thing itself. One man out of a hundred abuses liberty. Ought the ninety and nine to suffer the loss of theirs in consequence?

MR. EDITOR: Although late, I send money order for $10.25 for books as per order, and $5 to help brother Bennett home, or after he gets home, if he ever does, which I hope he will, and in as good or even better health than when he left, never having been in favor of sending him away. I would like to hear that he had arrived home all right.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find draft for $8.00—$3.00 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the present year, and $5.00 for the Round-the-World trip. I am a little behind with my subscription, and the only excuse I can offer is that I hav been wintering away up in the mountains, nearly 1,200 feet above the sea—a little nearer the Christian's heaven than you ever expect to get, I suppose. Wishing our noble champion a safe return, I remain, Yours truly, WM. NORRIS.

Hamilton for Round-the-World fund; and $3 to my credit on subscription to your paper in payment for same to January 1, '83. It has been our intention to send these amounts for some time, but until now our time has been limited and it has been neglected until almost too late to reap the early benefits.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $8.00—$3.00 for my subscription for the paper, and $5.00 for the Round-the-World trip. Mr. Bennett's letters are splendid. He takes his readers right along with him, shows them what he sees, so much so that it is almost like being there with him, and what escapes his notice is not worth telling. The books I must hav, for so much good reading must be preserved for the future. Hoping Mr. Bennett may enjoy good health, and return to his home safe and well, I remain, Yours truly, JOHN D. EAGER.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $8.00—$3.00 for your paper for a year, and $5.00 for the Round-the-World trip. Hope I am not too late. I am just coming in on the eleventh hour, with my lamp full of oil, to light Mr. Bennett through the promised land, and back to his loving wife. I am very well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the best paper I hav ever read. Wishing Mr. Bennett a safe return to American soil, I remain, Yours respectfully, JOHN STAFFORD.

DAYTON, OR., Feb. 1, 1882.

BRO. MACDONALD: Inclosed please find money order for $5 for the Round-the-World fund. I come in the eleventh hour, like a tardy church-member, but as the old and time-honored adage goes, "Better late than never," and I know that the God I worship is not so relentless and unforgiving as the church-members' God, therefore I hav no fear of having tempted the wrath beyond forgivness of our God, who is now traveling in the Holy Land, telling us something about those ancient and holy cities where the old religious frauds and fanatics used to dwell, and he does it in a manner that almost makes you think you are there seeing it with your own eyes, and thereby shows that he is one of the best writers of the age.

Freethought in our beautiful Western state is yet in its very infancy, but is fast gaining recruits for its ranks. Since Dr. York, of California, was lecturng in this state last summer, he took the scales from the eyes of a great many Christians who were kept in the dark by the black coats.

There are quite a number of Freethinkers in Dayton, but very few that are outspoken. Those that are in business say that if they said they were Infidels it would ruin them and their business, because this is a Christian town. Mr. J. B. Riley, one of the best and most influential citizens of Dayton, is about the only real outspoken Liberal here, who has not much fear of a hereafter, hell-fire, or everlasting damnation. But I am monopolizing too much of your valuable time, and therefore will close my epistle. Ever yours in the cause of Freethought,

MARTIN J. MILLER.

CENTRAL, S. C., Feb. 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to help our "scribe" safely home from his trip around the world. I was one of the small minority who opposed the Round-the-World enterprise, but I cheerfully, yes, gladly, contribute my "V" for the purpose of getting Mr. Bennett home once more; besides, I want and must hav the books descriptiv of the great voyage. I am truly sorry that I can't just at this time remit my dues to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please indulge me a week or two longer, and I will not remain on the delinquent list much longer. It is my misfortune, and not my fault that, I am there now.

LYNN CAMP, KY., Feb. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav wished to become a contributor to the Round-the-World fund ever since the proposition of Mr. Coleman was made to and accepted by D. M. Bennett, but I hav been in such straitened circumstances financially that it has been utterly out of my power, until now I see that the books will be held open till Feb. 20th. Inclosed find $5 for the same, as I wish so much to hav my name enrolled along with that noble band of Liberals. I wish the state and post-office address could be attached to each and every name in the list. It would giv a bird's-eye view of how those noble Liberals are distributed over the country. Yours truly, W. R. BARTON.

DENVER, IOWA, Feb. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: When expecting a combined attack from the "soldiers of the cross" upon our little army of the sons of liberty, I could not consent to the "leave of absence" of General D. M. Bennett. But as he decided to "swing the circle" in a general reconnoisance, I could do no better as a private picket than to "trust in gun and keep the powder dry," and when the general returns I want a copy of his "general order" for preservation, and therefore inclose a postal order for a "V." I don't want any "stars," that looks too much like the fashion up in kingdom come, nor do I expect to head the list in accordance with that celestial motto, "The last shall be first."

I expect while I liv to read THE TRUTH SEEKER. I find much instruction and some amusement therein. I was much amused to see a zealous writer in the last denounce "murderous gods," "bloody-minded, cold-blooded destroyers," etc. And while acknowledging that the worship of such gods "hath soaked the earth with human gore," on bended knee before such god he demands, that "every murderous wretch should die without mercy." This is really funny. The writer has a marked ability for soberly holding up blood to ridicule.

Excuse a few questions: What is the object of punishment? Is hanging any punishment when sensation ends as the drop falls? As "like begets like," are the baser passions inflamed by witnessing such inflictions? How long has "life for life," as a reformatory measure, been tried? and with what success? Has murder increased in the states which hav some time since abolished capital executions? Has any man the right to take human life except in self-defense? As republican governments derive all powers from the people, can such governments rightfully take life except in self-defense? Under the Mosaic dispensation, is life becoming more secure? How many murders are daily committed in the United States? and is the number increasing or diminishing?

Yours truly, M. FARRINGTON.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Feb. 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a regular reader of your valuable paper ever since Mr. Bennett was shut up in prison by his malicious persecutors, and hav come to regard it as a very essential part of my mental food and cannot well do without it. I hav heretofore purchased it weekly at the news stands, but I wish now to subscribe for it for four months from date, and also to be one of the eleventh-hour subscribers of $5 to bring our very worthy and beloved traveling brother home again. I sincerely hope (and would earnestly pray if I thought it would do any good) he may hav a safe and in every way a successful and prosperous tour around this globe. I would gladly hav subscribed to this fund before, but could not conveniently do it.

Some time since I was at a protracted meeting in one of Jersey's inland towns while a "revival of religion" was in progress, and was witness to what is, perhaps, nothing unusual on such occasions; but as many of your readers do not hav the opportunity to be present at an entertainment of this kind, I will describe it for their benefit without any exaggeration. Among the mourners who were up to the altar to be prayed for was one young man who was evidently in dead earnest to hav his sins all washed away in the "blood of the lamb," and he wanted it to be done then and there, and no mistake about it. With his sleeves rolled up, and his arms extended as if reaching out to his imaginary God, he was bellowing (or I suppose I should call it praying) at the top of his voice over and over again as follows: "O Lord, ah, bless me, Lord, ah; just now, Lord, ah, take me just as I am, Lord, ah. I've got nothing agin you, Lord, ah; I've got nothing agin you. Bless me just now, and I'll never sin agin you any more." And as the mourner in question was not the owner of a Sunday-go-to-meeting suit, his employer had kindly loaned him an overcoat and boots for the occasion, which fact, being known to the "worldly young men," for weeks and months afterward it was a common thing to hear the above prayer quoted, with the addition of, "Take me now, just as I am, Ben M———'s, overcoat, boots, and all." Whether the Lord took him just as he was this deponent sayeth not.

BAKER'S CORNER, IND., Jan. 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to help Mr. Bennett home from the Round-the-World trip. I thought I would hav sent before this time, but I hav had a very tedious time at my house with typhoid fever. We hav all recovered from it, and it left us not as near ready to die as we were before, for we hav got our doctor bill to pay yet; but I thought I would run the risk of getting ready and send one $5 to help our dear old brother Bennett home, for I am anxious for the time to come for him and those big guns to come together. We hav some of these awful goody good orthodox ministers not far from us, that are blowing terribly about him, and are fixing themselvs to compete with him. One of them will be ready in another six months to throw the old case off of his track in a hurry with his Bible and sword. I hope Mr. Bennett will make the time interesting for them. We think we could not do without THE TRUTH SEEKER by any means, it strengthens our spirits so. I hav for myself experienced a great pleasure since I hav been seeking the truth. The good spirit has helped me in the last year, I know. I will tell the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER why I know this. I had hoped and prayed if I was to lose any of my children that the good spirit would giv me warning of it before the last moment. Last spring I had a vision, and I saw my little baby boy passing to the spirit world. I told my husband that our baby was to die in two or three months. The babe seemed to be well and hearty as common when I saw the vision, but in the third month he went, and oh, my dear friends, what a comfort that vision has been to me; and I do hope the time will come when all mothers' troubles will be lightened as mine were, even made more clear to them. I cannot wish my babe back again to liv in this world, to be scared and tormented by a set of preachers telling them they are sure of hell if they don't join their church, so that they (the preachers) can get a little mony for themselvs.

I think it is necessary for every Liberal thinker to take a share in a Liberal orphan home. If Mrs. Lincoln could hav enough sense beat in her to let her know that she wasn't suffering, and let her $5,000 go to help the poor people of our land, it would be better. It is to be hoped by all sensible persons that she and some more like her will die and go to their resting-place, where they will not need so much silk to wear; and, kind friends, let us all work in earnest to put down such nonsense as giving to those that do not need it, and giv to help make Liberal homes for the needy of our land.

If you will send some posters of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we will put them where they will be seen, and try to get some more to sign for your paper; for if they would take time and read it there would be more Liberal-spoken men here than we hav. Hoping your paper will be extensivly circulated in this vicinity before long, I remain Your well wisher,

MRS. A. BAKER.

Jan. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: We hav had the usual religious revival. Sunday night I went out of curiosity, like lots of Liberal people I saw around me in that back corner; the saints and those converted during the week sitting on the front seats, of course. As usual, the most intelligent faces are those of Liberals; as James Parton said at the New York convention, "If we cannot count the most noses, we can the most brains." Verily, it is true that those having the smallest souls make the most fuss about having them saved. With all the praying, singing, and beseeching, they did not get a single convert to go up this evening. Too much Infidel element, I suppose, present. The argument, if it can be called such, of these ignorant preachers is an insult to common sense. There were three exhorters, one of them insane since the meetings began, and he of course was the most earnest. They cannot see that this religious emotion or frenzy is insanity itself. The more sincere one is, the more insane. T is man's particular theme was the grand plan of salvation. He could not see why everybody would not accept it, etc. In his cadaverous face and glittering eye one could see the same spirit working that sacrificed human life to an imaginary inspirer from Abraham through the religious persecution of the middle ages, when fanatics had supreme control, down to the present day of the Freeman and Guiteau murders. It would not take much more of this frenzy to make this man before me, I thought, kill those who would not with him accept the grand plan of salvation. Would that all might read Mr. Bennett's tract on this "grand plan." It is a most conclusiv argument, showing up the grand failure; that, according to the Bible, nine-tenths of us are doomed to hell any way from the beginning.

The only speech approaching argument was by a conceited young preacher named Britt, whom his friends think very smart, and who thinks because he has read Ingersoll some he has mastered the whole Infidel argument. He said these moral people were so busy admiring their own goodness that they would fall into the pit unawares. He had read in Ingersoll's last lecture, "laughter," "renewed laughter," "applause and laughter," etc., and thought it shocking that he made sport of this sacred subject that had occupied the minds of men for centuries Thanks to these priests who keep nagging at the people for the sake of an easy living. He did not of course quote argument and try to answer or tell how in that same lecture Ingersoll sorted the good out of the gospel and indorsed it, merely ridiculing the bad, claiming it had been interpolated by designing priests, and proving it, too.

This Britt is evidently envious, as all these little preachers are, of the great Infidel's wonderful ability to entertain an audience. If these reverends would drop the gloomy pit subject, as hav done their more clever compeers, remember people love the bright side of this short life, try to entertain and enliven, they would gain more respect from the sensible. Britt sneered very much at reason. It was claimed, he said, that reason would guide us to do right. Why, then, did the Hindoo mother throw her little one into the Ganges, and the nativs bow down to wooden idols? They had no Christianity there, etc. He did not inform us that this was their religion taught by their priests, only another form of superstition—not bright reason. After all, the Hindoo mother is not so cruel as their orthodox God—her child's sufferings are soon ended, while he designs that they shall suffer eternally in that bottomless pit so carefully prepared from the beginning, "where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched." I hav no doubt if Christians told these "heathen" that they eat the flesh and drink the blood of their god who died a long time ago, every few weeks, they would think it sillier than bowing to wood and stone. It is more repulsiv, anyhow, as well as all their blood doctrins.

Another preacher talked of angels' visits (this aristocracy of the air, as Ingersoll calls them), and Lot's wife being turned into a pillar of salt for looking back, advising none there to look back. I could not help wishing to my neighbor, the editor's wife, who is half Liberal, that the drunken father and incestor's daughters had been turned into something instead of proceeding on their iniquitous way. But such is Christian justice, persecuting innocence, letting the guilty go free. I should think they would be ashamed to speak of the Lot affair, as Bible readers must know how these three godly ones acted after being saved by God. One of the brethren prayed that a big concern might roll over all unbelievers who did not love and follow Jesus. Maybe he meant a kind of Juggernaut car to crush us. There was some mirth on the back seats when that prayer ascended.

After the regular, came the experience and prayer meeting. It was saddening to see peoele, mostly women, under such an unhealthy excitement, crying, protesting they never would turn back, etc., the light of the fanatic in their eye. It was easy to see they could do almost anything if they thought it would further the cause of Jesus. Finally, when they saw no new converts come up the preacher, asked all to rise who hoped to be saved by loving and serving the Lord, about every one but me arose slowly. I will not even seem to encourage such hypocrisy. The preacher hoped many would yet come before the meeting closed, etc.

I left with a sickening sense of pity for these insane leaders and their deluded followers. I had listened all through for some remark as to the higher duties of life, our obligations to one another, kindness and toleration as to mere belief (which are nothing to actions), but in vain. No appeal to common sense and reason was made for these things, which alone beautify and make life worth living.

Mr. Britt is indignant at my lending books, papers, and tracts around, "drawing Christians away from church." By being so personal he offended a lady who had borrowed one of the books, and she did not go again. Verily, on what a sandy foundation must Christianity rest that it will not bear argument! Its leaders already feel it giving way, and realize they will probably hav to work for a living, like other people, soon. I am going to try to get up a public reading of the Bennett-Mair Discussion.

Inclosed is $6.50—$5.00 for renewal of my subscription, and the balance to be used as directed.

Mr. Wakeman's lectures are grand, showing how the religion of Liberalism is built up of the natural sciences. I wish our opponents would accept bright science instead of their barbarous creeds and dogmas about faith and blood. ANNIE EVEREST.

REDWOOD FALLS, MINN., Jan. 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find ten cents, for which send to my address a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for Jan. 14th. I carelessly left my paper of that date in a waiting-room, and some one must hav taken it. The last I saw of it two young ladies who were waiting for the train were reading it and seemed to be very much interested in its contents. I do not accuse them of taking it, but if they did it only goes to show how eager the rising generation of fair sex are for the truth.

LOCUST BAYOU, ARK., Dec. 28, 1881.

FRIEND MACDONALD: Please find inclosed money order for $3 for my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for the year 1882. I think our Christian friends hav made two grand mistakes, one when they imprisoned Mr. Bennett, and again when the whole civilized world prayed for the recovery of President Garfield. They should hav known before they put up such long petitions that he would hav restored him; but it is all right with them (the Christians), as I hav not seen a line in their papers where they expressed dissatisfaction because their God did not hear them. That givs the lie to "whatever ye ask in my name," etc.

I thank Bro. J. Allen Noe for his article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 24th, entitled "God or No God." My sentiments. "Think of it, a great intelligence before there was any universe, any space for that intelligence to abide in. Then think again of God making a natural law; what did he hav to make it of?" Also to friend Holt for his communication, "The Evidences of Christ's Miraculous Birth." I should like the "reverends" to read that to their congregations. If they are after the truth why should they not? I expect it is a consideration of bread and butter with them. Very respectfully yours,

JOHN H HASLAM,

EAST RODMAN, N. Y., Feb. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I suggest that James Parton, or some other historian—though I think Mr. Parton is better qualified than any other—write a United States history, giving Thomas Paine such prominence as his deeds deserve—and no more, of course—on the plan of D. M. Bennett Around-the-World—a thorough and comprehensiv work, or an abridged school history. I will take five copies to start with. We are needing something of the kind. The present historians systematically ignore Thomas Paine's aid and patriotism in the great struggle for independence. If such a history were written, it would come in direct conflict with these bogus, semi-religious ones of the present (J. D. McCabe, for instance), and inquiring people, studying our history, would soon discriminate against the imperfect. Think of it, if you hav not before Yours truly, M. E ROSE.

BUTTE CITY, M. T., Feb. 9, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: My trial subscription ends this month. Find inclosed $3 for your paper for the ensuing year. I consider it the best paper published. I was interested in J. Allen Noe's letter on "No God." C. L. James endeavored to answer his belief this week, with, I think, very poor success. I cannot see why man should bother his head about the beginning of life. It is unexplainable, and the "first cause" has never troubled itself about man. I believe with the late Prof. Draper that climate has made man what he is to-day. Man improved himself without divine aid, and consequently ought not to seek the great supreme in anything. My idea of God is expressed by Mr. Bennett in his letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 4th.

If there was not such a rambling lot of people in this city I could get plenty of subscribers for your paper. There are plenty of Freethinkers in this territory. The territorial legislation has tried time and again to force a Sunday law on the people, but hav signally failed. With best wishes, I remain,

Yours respectfully, FRED COOKE.

FARLINVILLE, Feb. 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find six dollars, for which you will please send me the inclosed list of books and place balance to my credit on the paper.

I had intended to write before, as I was anxious to hav Mr. Bennett tell us more about that field that so many people were harvesting in, spoken of in the Bible. That must be a tremendous big field, and I don't know what Bennett means by calling that a seven-by-nine country. It must be larger than this to hav such a field in it. There are farms in some parts of this country that employ from three to four hundred men in harvest time, but what is that to one field having over fifty thousand men harvesting in it? In fact, we don't know how many more there was. This much we are told, that some of them were curious enough to look into that old box (the ark), and for their curiosity God killed 50,070 men, and it don't say how many got away; of course some did, or the harvesting would never hav been finished. Only think of the widows and orphans that were made just for that seemingly slight offense. I don't wonder that they sent word over to the men in the next field to come and get the old thing. I think that Bennett should hav been cautioned about all those things. Some one should hav told him that if he saw any old chest for God's sake not to look into it (it would be just like him to do it), but to let it alone, as we do not want to hear that he has been blown all to smithereens. I hope he will liv to complete his journey, and then I shall want him to make a tour of the United States and shake hands with as many of his friends and admirers as he can, one of whom is Your humble servant, H. E. DEWEY.

ARRINGTON, KAN., Feb. 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberal cause is still advancing in this vicinity, having at last a hearing. On the 3d, 4th, and 5th inst. J. E. Remsburg, of Atchison, lectured here. His first was a vindication of the writings and character of Thomas Paine, which, I must say, was the best effort of the kind I hav ever heard, complete in all its details. The second was equally as good in answering the question, Was Lincoln a Christian? No one hearing him and listening to his proofs on the subject would dare repeat that stale falsehood that Abraham Lincoln was a Christian. The third was on the Sabbath, and, like the others, was unanswerable. Indeed, J. E. Remsburg is one of the ablest and best defenders of our cause I hav listened to, and I would say to all, Hav him lecture to you. He will both entertain and instruct you. His manner of handling his subject is such as to command the attention of his audience, I care not how much they may differ with him. Indeed he is one of those rare men who can get a hearing where many others would fail, therefore I hope he will be soon called into the lecture field and be appreciated as his merits and abilities deserve.

Your friend, R. A. VANWINKLE.

ADRIAN, MICH., Feb. 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I was very glad to notice in the last TRUTH SEEKER a little article signed William Black, with a donation of $10 for that aged veteran, a lifelong Freethinker, and a truly benevolent man, Jeremiah Hacker, of Berlin, N. J. If friend Black can hav access to THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 18, 1880, he will there find a beautiful compliment, all in rhyme, from friend Hacker, to a benevolent friend that had made him a contribution; then, following this, he will notice a little sketch of his truly benevolent character in caring for the unfortunate that I think will satisfy him or any other person that this is the real Jeremiah Hacker that was editor of a little paper in Portland, Me., twenty years ago, called the Pleasure Boat. I hav before me a long letter from friend Hacker, telling me of his labors as an out-and-out Freethinker fifty years ago. But I must close with this word to the benevolent and humane, that friend Hacker is truly worthy of our benevolence.

Yours truly, S. D. MOORE.

SOLEBURY, PA., Jan. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I see by your last published paper my article on "The Gods," treated as was once said of the play of Hamlet, with Hamlet left out. I know, according to the old adage, "beggars hav no right to be choosers," nevertheless it pains me to see Liberal truth seekers imitating professional Bible Christians—now going out of date—as a thing of the past, belonging, as stated in one of "Esop's Fables," to "the day of yore, when bulls lived upon mutton." But however that might be, we know spiders liv upon flies, which some poet has beautifully expressed in the following verse, to which I will affix something more, and then proceed to giv my view in accordance with Stephen Pearl Andrews's communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER on the Guiteau case:

THE CUNNING SPIDER AND THE SILLY FLY.

"Come walk into my parlor," says the spider to the fly;
"'Tis the prettiest little parlor that ever you did spy."
"Come walk into our churches," we hear our preachers cry;
"And you shall go to heaven whene'er you come to die.
We only ask blind faith to join our Christian band,
And we will be your sponsors, with little cash in hand.
Priests must hav a living," so written in the book,
As fishermen, you know, eat the fish they hook.
They use a tempting bait to catch the silly fish,
That they may feast upon them when cooked and on a dish.
And so we use blind faith, to catch the silly people,
And cook them with a creed of faith beneath a lofty steeple,
Where Bible saints are wont to meet, and hear the preachers tell
How Jesus ransomed them for heaven, and all others doomed to hell!

THREE BIBLE CHRISTIAN SAINTS.

Abraham, Freeman, and Guiteau, three faithful servants found,
If the Bible tells what's true, and Christian faith is sound.
The first is held to be a saint, why not the other two,
And make the trinity complete with Freeman and Guiteau?
Bible Christians may object, but what, I ask, of that?
When they swallow camels they can swallow gnats.
There's many Bible camels, riders on their backs,
Traveling in the desert with merchandise in sacks.
Priests who make their living preaching from a book,
Like fishermen, we know, fishing with a hook.
The tempting bait that's offered, blind faith upon a hook,
Brings a priestly living, and reverence for a book,
But scientific light is dawning, to make mankind more wise,
Not to be caught in priestly nets, as spiders catch the flies,
But rise above the dust of ages, to mind the golden rule,
Ever taught by all the sages, taught in science school,
To do to others as you would hav others do to you,
And so avoid the errors of Abraham, Freeman, and Guiteau.

QUERIES.

What is time? who can tell? or
What is space? in which we dwell.
What is power? no one can see; or
What is life? please answer me.
If they're not God, then what is he?

Yours truly, E. W. ALLEN.

The Balm of Death.

BY ALHAZA.

Each water-course is dry,
The fountains fail to-day;
And the burning land, where the balm drops clear,
Is many miles away.

And one ungentle word
Will sear the heart like flame,
And would such blot a bosom bear
That boasts a Liberal name?

I did not know that grief
Had poisonous darts in store,
And that a kind and honored heart
Would pity feel no more.

A frail bark nears the shore;
Death comes, a shadow mild;
Peace, and a softly dripping oar—
I go to meet my child.

The Laws of Moses.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

Some laws fixed in doses, by old Doctor Moses,
If dealt now would make men turn up their noses.
They are said to be still the laws of our God,
Though full of such cruelty, vileness, and fraud.
If men are not blind, they'll certainly find
That some of his laws are the most loathsome kind,
Which, if men obeyed, they would without fail,
In these latter days, get shut up in jail.
There is the command, Thou shalt giv the meat
Of self-dying beasts to strangers to eat,
Or else thou can sell to aliens this stuff,
That's too vile for saints, yet still good enough
For those who hav not in holiness trod
The way of the Jews, the people of God.
This law givs churchmen an order to sell
Dead cholera hogs to the damned Infidel.
Should they fail to cheat him with that kind of meat,
Oh, the strangers then can expect a treat.
This God in our nation's Constitution,
How joyful to know has no intrusion.
And this law of his, our own laws rebut,
In prison shall they who obey it be shut;
And no honest man exists who would pause
From breaking his holy, but nasty old laws.
Do pious men think that sinners would use
The vile carcasses that saints would refuse?
Priestcraft in the Constitution would fix
The God who would teach such abominable tricks.
If he was put there then all laws of man
Must bend unto his, for a whole church clan
Of God-fearing men his laws would enforce,
Enslave, and make us eat vile meat, of course.
That is, they would cram down our throats their creeds,
And if we refused, there would be bloody deeeds,
Forbid it, dear sinners, let us never be slaves
To these priestly tyrants, gods, devils, or knaves.

An Interesting Dialog.

"Hav you read that new book from Samuel Bowles?"

"No; is there a new one? I read one last year, and it was excellent."

"Well, there is a new one three times as large, and it is the best pamphlet on spirit life I ever read. Bowles says he has met Garfield, and describes the fine reception they gave him eleven days after he came over. He says he saw Garfield die, and he describes the process with marvelous distinctness. He has met his old friend, Dr. Holland, late editor of Scribner's Monthly, and reports the delight the doctor felt on being able to think better than ever. E. V. Wilson's passage to spirit life is in the book true to every detail. Bowles shows up bad ministers, lawyers, doctors, grocers, and contrasts them with good ones. He says money don't count in heaven, and millionaires are paupers unless they hav brought good characters to spirit life. He depicts with a vividness that will make you shudder the reception that the opium eaters, rum-drinkers, prostitutes, libertins, abortionists, and rum-sellers find. If people believed these statements they would shun such vices as they now shun the smallpox. He says he heard Washington, Lincoln, Clay, Lord Beaconsfield, and others welcome Garfield, and reports in brief their speeches. He explains independent slate writing and form materialization as seen from the spirit side."

"Why, you surprise me! the book must be a fascinating and instructiv one."

"Yes, it is. I hav not time to tell you half that is in it. He interviews John Wesley, Jonathan Edwards, Hosea Ballou, Joseph Smith, William Miller, and other noted divines, and reports what they say. It is rich reading. Why, some of those old clergymen still stick to much of their former belief, and are preaching yet to spirits in the first and second spheres.

"Bowles givs a clear account of life in the first five spheres, how people liv, dress, what homes they hav, their occupations, ornaments, visits to the art galleries, the opera, the religious gatherings, the schools, the hospitals for sick souls, where spirits are cured of insanity, drunkenness, habits of opium eating, prostitution, abortion, etc. He reports his visits to the Chinese, African holy-land, and Lapland heavens. It is written in a reporter's style, crisp, graphic, full of pen pictures, like the eminent journalist he was."

"How do the people in old Massachusetts take it?"

"Well, some condemn, others praise; but everybody about his old Springfield home is talking about it. They generally admit that it is smart, wonderful, and full of ideas that are refreshingly new."

"Who is the medium?"

"Carrie Twing, the one he used in writing his first book."

"Where can I get a book?"

"Send fifty cents to THE TRUTH SEEKER, 141 Eighth street, New York, and call for Bowles' 'Contrasts in Spirit Life.'"

CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubonrg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubonrg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belginm, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, bnlit a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step ont of the orthodox paths of thought.

Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to maukird in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. ☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, aided by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Gems of Thought.

I ALWAYS much admired a saying of the Emperor Charles the Fifth. "When I learn a new language," he said, "I feel as if I had got a new soul." But I would console those who hav not time to make themselvs linguists by assuring them that, by means of their mother tongue, they may obtain ready access to vast intellectual treasures, to treasures such as might hav been envied by the greatest linguists of the age of Charles V., to treasures surpassing those which were possessed by Aldus, by Erasmus, and by Melancthon.—Macaulay's Speeches.

DID the Almighty, holding truth in his right hand, and the right of search after truth in his left, deign to proffer me the one I might prefer, I should, in all humility, but without hesitation, request the right of search.—Lessing.

To skepticism we owe that spirit of inquiry, which, during the last two centuries, has gradually encroached on every possible subject, has reformed every department of practical and speculativ knowledge, has weakened the authority of the privileged classes, and thus placed liberty on a surer foundation, has chastised the despotism of princes, has restrained the arrogance of the nobles, and has even diminished the prejudices of the clergy.—T. H. Buckle.

APART from the peculiar tenets of individual thinkers, there is in the world at large an increasing inclination to stretch unduly the powers of society over the individual, both by the force of opinion and even by that of legislation; and as the tendency of all the changes taking place in the world is to strengthen society, and diminish the power of the individual, this encroachment is not one of the evils which tend spontaneously to disappear, but on the contrary, to grow more and more formidable.—Mill's Liberty.

NO man works save under condition. The sculptor cannot set his own free thought before us, but his thought as he could translate it into the stone that was given, with the tools that were given. Disjecta membra [scattered limbs] are all that we find of any poet or of any man.—Carlyle's Hero Worship.

THE ideal humanity of the Christian is the humanity of the slave, poor, meek, broken-spirited, humble, submissiv to authority, however oppressiv and unjust; the ideal humanity of the Atheist is the humanity of the free man who knows no lord, who brooks no tyranny, who relies on his own strength, and makes his brother's quarrel his, proud, true-hearted, loyal, brave.—Besant's Gospel of Atheism.

THE TREE OF LIBERTY.

Without this tree, alake, this life
Is but a vale o' woe, man;
A scene o' sorrow mixed wi' strife,
Nae real joys we know, man.
We labor soon, we labor late,
To feed the titled knave, man;
And a' the comfort we're to get
Is that ayent the grave, man.

Wi' plenty of sic trees, I trow,
The world would liv in peace, man;
The sword would help to mak' a plough,
The din o' war would cease, man.
Like brethren in a common cause,
We'd on each other smile, man;
And equal rights and equal laws
Would gladden every isle, man.

—Burns.

IMMORTALITY upon this earth is out of the question. Without death there could be no generation, no sexes, no parental relation, i. e., as things are constituted, no animal happiness. The particular duration of life, assigned to different animals, can form no objection, because whatever that duration be, whilst it remains finite and limited, it may always be asked why it is no longer. The natural age of different animals varies from a single day to a century of years. No account can be given of this; nor could any be given, whatever other proportion of life had obtained amongst them.—Paley's Natural Theology.

THERE are pursuits peculiar to boyhood; do therefore young men regret the loss of them? There are also some of early youth; does that now settled age, which is called middle life, seek after them? There are also some of this period; neither are they looked for in old age. There are some final pursuits of old age; accordingly, as the pursuits of the earlier parts of life fall into disuse, so also do these of old age, and when this has taken place, satiety of life brings on the seasonable period of death.—Cicero's Old Age.

RIGHTLY is it said
That man descends into the vale of years;
Yet hav I thought that we may also speak,
And not presumptuously, I trust, of age
As of a final eminence, though bare
In aspect and forbidding, yet a point
On which 'tis not impossible to sit
In awful sovereignty. —Wordsworth.

ALL Christians believe that the blessed are the poor and humble, and those who are ill-used by the world; that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven; that they should judge not, lest they be judged; that they should swear not at all; that they should love their neighbor as themselvs; that if one take their cloak they should giv him their coat also; that they should take no thought for to-morrow; that if they would be perfect they should sell all that they hav and giv it to the poor. They are not insincere when they say that they believe these things. They do believe them, as people believe what they hav always heard lauded and never discussed.—Mill's Liberty.

I THINK it shows "inconsistency" to believe one set of miracles simply because they are in a big book that priests succeeded in palming off on a lot of credulous, ignorant, fanatical, superstitious people as God's word, and doubting all others, though thousands of them are ten times better attested to and less incredible as well.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

A GERMAN astronomer has found a planet. Anybody who misses any of his planets should make a note of this.

SHE was a wee bit of lovable humanity, and when she murmured "Yes" to his tender inquiry he called her "a little one for assent."

A DERBY doctor killed a fox, and the Derby Transcript sardonically remarks, "The doctor means business when he gets after 'em."

"WHY does a donkey eat thistles?" asked an Austin teacher of one of the largest boys in the class. "Because he is a donkey, I reckon," was the prompt reply.

SHE was plump and beautiful,
And he was much in love.
She hated him, but, woman like,
To catch him she well strove.
But then, you see,
He was—a flea!

IN Connecticut they do not ask: "Who was your grandfather?" "What are you worth?" or "What do you know?" but "How many patents hav you taken out?" If you say none, they giv you one more chance to prove yourself respectable by inquiring, "How many insurance companies hav you started?"

TWO men discussing the wonders of modern science, one said: "Look at astronomy, now; men hav learned the distances to the stars, and, with the spectroscope, they hav even found out the substances they are made of." "Yes," said the other, "but the strangest of all to me is how they found out all their names."

MR JONES: "The state would be better off if every Chinaman was kicked out of it to-morrow."

His married friend: "Where would you get your washing done then?,'

Bachelor Jones: "Marry some nice girl and hav it done at home."

Chorus by eight eligible young ladies who happened to overhear Jones and his friend talking, "The Chinese must go!"

CONSTABLE JONES held an execution against a farmer, and when he called for a settlement the agriculturist took him out into a big pasture and pointed out a wild steer as the particular piece of property to be levied upon. Jones chased the steer around for a while, and then sat down, and, taking out his book, began to write.

"What are you doing there?" asked the granger.

"Charging mileage," replied the constable, without looking up.

"Do I hav it all to pay?" gasped the rancher.

"You bet."

"Then take this tame heifer here. I can't stand any such game as that."

THIRD-CLASS MATTER.

The numerous rulings of the post-office department, in its efforts to distinguish between first and third-class matter, hav given rise to perplexities which postmasters and business men are perhaps better able to appreciate than other citizens.

The postmaster sat in his office chair,
Disheveled, and wan, and pale;
His eye was fixed, and his brow was sad,
And he mopped his face with an inking-pad,
While anon I heard him wail:
"Ah me!"—in a minor key—
"This is awful. It staggers me!"

Around about him, and on the floor,
On table and window-sill,
Were maps and volumes of postal lore,
The regulations and guides—a score—
And documents strewn at will,
But ever the master's gaze, intent,
Fixed and blank on the wall was bent,
And ever, anon, his plaintiv cry
Smote the ear of the passer by—
"Ah, me!"—in a minor key—
"This is awful. It staggers me!"

"Sticker of stamps," I said, "it seems Something troubles thy waking dreams;
Answer, nor look aghast:
Hav they cut thy salary down once more,
Or has thy mother-in-law gone o'er
The Stygian stream at last?
Speak, O master, thine eyes are wild
And thy brow is overcast."

Quick uprising, like one who wakes
From a vision of rattlesnakes,
"Youth," he whispered, "it is not so;
Keener motivs I hav for woe.
Look!" And seizing a book he spun
Page and title before my eyes;
"Just received it from Washington—
P. M. General's last surprise.
Read!" he thundered in tones so dire
All my molars began to clatter.
Meek complying, these words I caught,
Last Construction of "Third-Class Matter."

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. A. H. Knight, pastor of the colored Methodist church at Mitchell, Ind., has been suspended. His wife found poison in her tea, and he is accused of putting it there.

THE officers of the Lutheran church at Columbia, Ind., locked out the pastor. He took an axe from a neighboring wood pile, chopped down the door, and held services as usual.

THE Lutheran congregation at Elmhurst, Ill., gave their pastor, the Rev. F. W. Roeber, a choice between resignation and a trial for habitual drunkenness, card-playing on Sunday, and lying. He resigned.

A FEMALE preacher is said to be writing a "Commentary on the Life of Joshua." It is reported that she will observe that Joshua was successful with the sun, but he never dared to command the daughter to be still.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher (about to comment on St. Paul's direction for the conduct of men and women during divine service): "Now, do you know why women do not take off their bonnets in church?" Small boy: "Cos they ain't got looking-glasses to put 'em on again by."

AN international congress of ethnologists is to be opened at Geneva on April 2, divided into the seven following sections: Origin and migration of peoples; ethnology; descriptiv ethnography; theoretical ethnography; manners and customs; political ethnography; international regulations.

ALTHOUGH the Rev. Tobin R. Brooks, of Bloomington, Ill., is editor of the Banner of Holiness, charges hav been preferred against him for criminal insubordination to the authorities of the Methodist church. He is also charged with having scandalously defamed the Illinois conference of that church.

BISHOP RYLE, of England, says that much of the Christianity of to-day is "jelly-fish religion," of which the basis is, as far as it has any, "no dogma, no distinctiv tenet, no positiv doctrin." He holds that, both in the church of England and out of it, there are hundreds of ministers who hav not a single bone in their "body of divinity."

THE Rev. Ezra Winslow, of Boston, whose forgeries and flight made a great stir several years ago, is still living in Buenos Ayres. He lived there awhile unidentified, under the name of Low, and became superintendent of a Sunday-school. He married a wealthy woman, became a successful politician, and is now living sumptuously.

THE Rev. Dr. Newman, in a recent Sunday's discourse, said that "the generally accepted fact that women are more pious than men may be attributed to the afternoon visits of the pastors." He did not mention Mrs. Tilton as an instance, but she may possibly be one of the many whom he had in mind when he made this remarkable statement.

A MASSACHUSETTS state officer is about to undertake the enforcement of the law regarding juvenil labor. It provides that no person under eighteen shall work more than ten hours a day in any manufacturing establishment, except in certain specified emergencies; that children between eight and fourteen shall attend some public day school at least twenty weeks in each year; none under ten may work at all in a factory, and none under fourteen unless able to read and write.

THE Rev. George H. Austin went into the bank at Madison, Ind., and asked for $280 on his own note. The cashier explained, as delicately as possible, so as not to wound the reverend gentleman's feelings, that an indorsement by some person of property was required. Mr. Austin inquired if the signatures of John and Perry Cotton would do, and was told they would. After an hour's absence he returned with their names forged on the note, got the $280, and absconded.

A RECENT report sheds light upon the influence of Buddhism on the education of the people of British Burmah. Not only do the Ponegyees (Buddhist monks) read the law and deliver addresses at stated seasons to the assembled villagers, but their monasteries are so many little seminaries, at which nearly every Burman man or boy comes under instruction of some sort for a part of his life. The greatest liberality is shown by the monks in freely admitting English inspectors into their religious houses and in welcoming educational measures.

PROF. HAECKEL, who, like Humboldt, prefers to study nature in her own wilds, was at last accounts in a small village on the south coast of the island of Ceylon—the only white man there. The village, which bears the melodious name of Belligamma, lies on the shore of a fine bay, and is surrounded by dense forests of cocoanut and breadfruit trees, filled in with other luxuriant tropical vegetation. The professor received an enthusiastic welcome from the governor of the island, and has been afforded every aid in the pursuit of his zoological investigations.

IN the course of a lecture by Dr. J. A Weisse on "The English Language," at Cooper Institute, last Saturday evening, the lecturer read a letter from Prof. Max Muller, which said: "No language has such a future as what you call composit English; no language is so strong, yet so pliant; so bright, yet so varied by the most delicate shades; so homely, yet so universal. As to the science of language, I quite agree with you that it will clear up proto-history; and it will do even more, it will clear up proto-philosophy." The lecturer prophesied that English would become the universal language.

REGARDING the attempt to enforce the Sunday law in San Francisco, the Jewish Times says: "The immaculate pietists and perfumed moralists who are attempting to enforce the 'Sunday' law hav not met with success so far. Juries hav disagreed and public opinion is opposed to them. California is not the only state of the republic threatened with the cloven foot of religious intolerance. The manna is wide-spread, and has even reached to the territories. The Town Talk, of Walla Walla, says that Washington territory 'will suffer so much inconvenience and the town such a loss of business that the framers of this iniquitous Sunday law will be execrated by the people of Walla Walla and other important towns in the territory.'"

THE impression that the northeastern coast of the American continent is slowly rising—the estimate of the rate of emergency in progress being over a foot, and perhaps as much as three feet, in a century—has recently been controverted by eminent scientific authorities, including Dr. Mitchel, of the Coast Survey, who states that the salt marshes are still, as they were in the time of the early explorers, at ordinary high-water level, and that the rocks on our coast, long notorious as dangerous to navigation, hav not risen since they were first discovered. But eastward of longitude 62 deg. 13 min., and especially in Newfoundland, great changes present themselvs, the depth appearing to be at some points less and at other points greater now than formerly.

THE Missouri Grand Lodge of United Workmen, recently in session in St. Louis, passed a resolution of great significance. It came up in the form of a question upon the admission of saloon-keepers and bar-tenders into the organization. It was claimed that these men were in constant danger of losing their lives at the hands of the very characters who patronize them, and, according to the supreme medical examiner's report, the saloon-keepers were largely in the lead on the list of deceased members, many of the class being taken off by consumption. The debate was spirited, and when the vote was taken the resolution that no saloon-keeper or bar-tender be admitted to the brotherhood was carried by a large majority. Here is a text for the temperance advocates to make the most of.

SPEAKING of the religious views of the late president, Blaine givs the following testimony to Gen. Garfield's liberality, and confirms the fact, usually denied, that he numbered Col. Ingersoll among his nearest personal friends: "The crowning characteristics of Gen. Garfield's religious opinions, as, indeed of all his opinions, was his liberality. In all things he had charity. Tolerance was of his nature. He respected in others the qualities which he possessed himself—sincerity of conviction and frankness of expression. With him the inquiry was not so much what a man believes, but does he believe it? The lines of his friendship and his confidence encircled men of every creed, and to the end of his life, on his ever-lengthening list of friends were to be found the names of a pious Catholic priest and of an honest-minded and generous-hearted Freethinker." He also said that Garfield "followed with quickening step in the paths of exploration and speculation so fearlessly trodden by Darwin, by Huxley, by Tyndall, and by other living scientists of the radical and advanced type."

AT a fair and festival in a popular church, fried oysters were among the dainties served to the guests. These oysters were by some mishap overdone, and consequently too dry to be eaten with satisfaction by the time they were placed on the tables. Nevertheless, they were said to be what the bill of fare called for, and as such some of them were paid for and eaten without any very severe criticism by the persons who never expect to get the full value of their money at a church fair. Yet they proved so dry and unappetizing that, even for the good of the cause, many of the guests declined to eat them. As the church had no steam apparatus for keeping each thing hot, the overdone oysters were unfortunately placed over the furnace register, which made them even more dry than they would otherwise hav been. Those which were left over when the fair closed at night remained in this position until morning, by which time they were as dry as sawdust, and as juiceless as old corn husks. In the morning the charitable idea occurred to some of the ladies that the inmates of the Home for the Bettering of Destitute Females did not often hav oysters, and that it would be a good deed to send these oysters there. Forthwith the dried-up things were sent. The amount of enjoyment had by the destitute females over the gift is not registered in heaven.

THE ecclesiastical trial of Lewis N. Ireland, of the Methodist church of West Troy, N. Y., has come to an end. The accused is the son of a Methodist minister, and for twelve years a class-leader. He was charged with immoral conduct in seven different and distinct allegations. The trial began on the 13th of February, and on last Monday the jury of five brought in their verdict. They found Bro. Ireland guilty of profaning the Sabbath by horse-racing on that day; guilty of attempting violently and forcibly to dispossess the occupant of a certain parcel of land; guilty of making a false statement about preacher Gates; guilty of calling the members of the church a "set of hypocrits;" and guilty of wrongfully and maliciously commencing a lawsuit in the civil courts against his pastor, D. W. Gates, and the Washington street Methodist Episcopal church. "We also find," wrote the jury, in concluding the verdict, "that the specifications sustain the general complaint or charge of immoral conduct in the first degree." So the brother is found to be guilty of almost every species of dishonorable conduct. But he has this comforting reflection: through the whole trial, destructiv as it has been to his moral character, the genuinness of his faith in hell and damnation has not been called in question. Thus it is that the Christian religion brings consolation when everything else seems to hav gone back on us.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

The Book of Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh.

21. While the pilgrims were still in Lebanon, when they first entered the Land of Yahweh in the vicinity of Dan, and when a view was had of the plain of Huleh, the man of God Getz several times broke out in ecstasies about the splendor of the country, its wonderful fertility, and the fulness with which Bible accounts were shown to be true.

22. But when he saw that a large share of the plain is rocky, that much of the rest is mere swamp, and that all the hills are but piles of naked rocks, and since in particular the Scribe asked him to point what he saw that so especially verified the scripture, and freely commented upon the sterility and worthlessness of a great proportion of the country, the enthusiastic and jubilant man of God has had less to say upon the subject, and does not go off into ecstasies half as often.

23. Shiloh, the Arabic name of which is Seilún, though nothing now, has figured conspicuously in what is called Bible history. Here it was that the tabernacle and the ark were first set up, and here it was that Joshua is said to have congregated the Israelites and sent three men of each tribe to divide up the country into lots so that he could dispose of it by a kind of lottery or division by lot. If this is true, it is the opinion of the Scribe that more rocks were divided out on that occasion than were ever similarly disposed of before or since.

24. It was at Shiloh that the virgins of the country assembled once a year to attend a festival, and to join in dances on that merry occasion. It was here that the men of Benjamin were sent to kidnap wives for themselves, when four hundred thousand warriors of the other tribes went up to fight the children of Benjamin, because a part of the tribe of Benjamin, the men who lived at Gibeah, had acted in a very disgraceful manner in their treatment of a Levite's concubine, when he tarried over night in Gibeah, by which abominable treatment the poor woman died before morning.

25. The Benjamites preferred to go to war with the men of the other tribes, rather than give up the men of their tribe called sons of Belial, who had committed this great iniquity. Yahweh directed the proceedings, and told the men of the other tribes to go up against Benjamin; but the latter came out from Gibeah, and killed twenty-two thousand of the children of Israel the first day of this fraternal war

26. On the second day Yahweh sent the Israelites up again to fight Benjamin still more, and on the second day the unerring left-handed Benjamites cut down to the ground eighteen thousand more of their brethren, the Israelites, making forty thousand in all which the Benjamites killed. It is not strange that such a heavy loss should make the Israelites weep, and cry unto Yahweh as to what they should do.

27. But Yahweh, being always fond of blood, urged his dearly beloved people to go up again for the third time to fight their brethren, promising this time to certainly give the poor Benjamites into their hands; and, on the strength of this assurance, the third effort was made, when, sure enough, Yahweh was good to the nine tribes, but rather hard upon the twelfth; for on that day the nine tribes, with the help of Yahweh, were enabled to kill twenty-five thousand and one hundred of their brethren, the Benjamites.

28. And, like the true children of Yahweh, the victorious Israelites pursued their advantage, and kept on fighting, until they extended to all the cities of Benjamin, and murdered all the children and all the women, so that for the six hundred of the Benjamites who fled to the rock Rimmon and stayed four months, there was no women for wives; and for this reason they were recommended to steal them from the virgins who assembled at Shiloh to feast and to dance.

29. It was discovered, however, that the Israelites from Jabesh-gilead, beyond the Jordan, had not sent up men to help kill the Benjamites, and this caused such great dissatisfaction among the slayers of the Benjamites that they sent twelve thousand picked men, and these were sent against their brethren of Jabesh-gilead, with this injunction: Go and smite the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead with the edge of the sword, with the women and children. And this is the thing that ye shall do, Ye shall utterly destroy every male and every woman that hath lain by man.

30. This bloody and relentless order appears to have been carried out, and among the people that were thus summarily dealt with were found four hundred virgins that had known no man by lying with him; but just how this important matter was decided is not clearly described, but undoubtedly it required acuteness and an experienced judgment.

31. These unfortunate young girls, whose fathers and mothers had been killed, were brought to Shiloh, and were summarily handed over to the six hundred of the Benjamites who were still at the rock Rimmon, which answered very well, so far as they went; but there were still two hundred of the Benjamites without wives, and these took the advice of their brethren, and kidnaped the girls who came to Shiloh to dance. Verily, what a godly people these Jews were, and what a God they had to command such things to be done! Let those love and praise Yahweh who can. (See Judges xix and xx.)

32. The Scribe tried to realize what a scramble there must have been between the virgin girls, who did not want to be caught, and the amorous Benjamites, who were particularly anxious to catch them; how they must have tumbled over the rocks with which the place is covered, and how some of them must have fallen and hurt themselves in the peculiar contest. He dared hardly think of what took place after the poor, unwilling girls were caught and were borne away by the triumphant two hundred. Here the curtain drops. But really the base conduct toward the Levite's poor concubine led to most serious results.

33. Here also, on this pile of rocks, or near here, dwelt a man by the name of Elkanah, who had two wives, Hannah and Peninnah. The latter bore children to her husband, but Hannah bore none, because Yahweh had seen fit, in his inscrutable wisdom, to close her womb; and it fretted Hannah not a little that Yahweh had done unto her in the way he had, for she desired to bear children unto her husband, who loved her. She even became so much affected by this continued state of things that she wept and refused to eat.

34. Then her indulgent husband said unto her, Hannah, why weepest thou? and why eatest thou not? and why is thy heart grieved? Am I not better to thee than ten sons? This all took place at Shiloh, where the husband and his two wives went yearly to worship and to make their vows.

35. And after they had eaten and drunk, Hannah arose from the table, or probably from the rock. Eli the priest was sitting close by, while poor Hannah, in the bitterness of her soul, prayed unto Yahweh and wept sore. She even vowed a vow and said, O Yahweh, if thou wilt indeed look upon the afflictions of thy handmaid and remember me, and not forget thine handmaid, but wilt give unto thine handmaid a man-child; then I will give him unto Yahweh all the days of his life, and there shall come no razor upon his head.

36. This is supposed to have been a greater temptation to Yahweh than he could well withstand, for he seems to hav yielded to the supplicating woman and no longer kept her womb closed. But not too fast. While she was still praying to Yahweh and making these vows, the priest Eli noticed her and thought she was drunk, and placed his hand over her mouth to keep her from talking.

37. But Hannah was so intent upon making a favorable impression upon Yahweh that she kept on talking in her heart, and only her lips moved, her voice not being heard. Then did the man of God Eli say, How long will thou be drunken? Put away thy wine from thee.

38. Then did the heavy-hearted Hannah make answer and say: No, my lord, I am a woman of sorrowful spirit. I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink, but have poured out my soul before Yahweh. Count not thine handmaid for a daughter of Belial, for out of the abundance of my complaint and grief have I spoken hitherto.

39. Then the man of God Eli, when he came to comprehend the true state of the case, answered her in this wise, Go in peace, and Yahweh grant thee thy petition that thou hast asked of him. Then was Hannah comforted. She arose and eat, and her face was no more sad. As soon as they returned Elkanah knew Hannah, and Yahweh remembered her and opened her womb; and that is the way little prophet Sammy came into the world. The wonderful things which he did, including his coming up out of his grave after he had become old and was dead and buried, are all recorded in the books of Samuel, in the first chapter of which the sorrows of Hannah are given.

40. Shiloh must have been a remarkable place when Yahweh flourished in this land, but now there is nothing left but the rocks and some ruins of old buildings which are thought to have been a temple to the sun that was afterward erected here, and a church built still later. With the loss of the ark Shiloh lost all. It was taken away by the Philistines, and was never returned to this rocky summit. Poor Shiloh dwells chiefly in the past. It will never amount to anything more.

41. Leaving the rocky mass called Shiloh, the pilgrims passed over rough, rocky roads, and through a wild glen, where a high, abrupt pile of rocks overhangs a spring, before mentioned, called the Robbers' Fountain.

42. The pilgrims next passed over ledges and shelves of rock, in places so narrow that there seemed danger of the animals sliding off the precipices into the glen below. Two or three cheerless and unimportant Moslem villages were passed, also a ruin called one of the castles of Baldwin. The road, a mere rocky bridle-path (which is all the roads in Palestine amount to) leads over more rough country, but there are a few narrow valleys, possessing fertility, between the mountains, some of which, at a considerable outlay of labor, were long ago terraced, affording narrow shelves for cultivation, and occasionally fig-trees and olive-trees are still seen there. This was called the most fruitful part of Ephraim.

43. It is a long and tedious ride to Bethel, and it was sunset before the pilgrims, cold and weary, arrived where the tents had been pitched; but the numerous letters from home, sent out from Jerusalem from Cook's agency, made atonement for the hardships endured, and the pilgrims were all happy, though the night was cold.

44. Bethel is often mentioned in the Old Testament. Here Abraham is said to have reared an altar and called upon the name of Yahweh before his return from Egypt, where he acted most disgracefully, palming his wife off for his sister, and taking money, cattle, and sheep from King Pharaoh for her use. What he received in that disreputable manner made him, as per Genesis xiii, 2, very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold. The patriarch returned to Bethel again, probably to give thanks to Yahweh for the great wealth he had disgracefully obtained, for then he again called upon Yahweh's name.

45. Here Jacob is also said to have stopped for a night's lodging after he had traveled fully as far as the pilgrims had this day. Here he gathered together some stones for a pillow, which enabled him to have such sweet dreams that he saw the angels performing the ladder feat in a most interesting manner, though that angels require a ladder to enable them to get in and out of heaven is an idea not usually entertained.

46. The most probable feature about this Jacob story, in the opinion of the Scribe, is the finding of stones enough at Bethel for a pillow; for if a million pillows were required, the stones could have been forthcoming. A man might walk around here for days and not touch his foot to the earth. That stones are good material for pillows the Scribe does not believe; but peradventure they may conduce to dreams of angels and ladders.

47. Genesis xxviii, 10–17, describes Jacob's experience at Bethel, how Yahweh appeared to him and renewed the promise made frequently before, that he would do extraordinary things for the descendants of Jacob; made a renewed display of the present of the land of rocks for perpetual inheritance, and asserted again that they should become as the dust of the earth for multitude.

48. It seems that Jacob gave the name of Bethel to the place, it having been Luz at first, though the previous account states that nearly a century earlier Abraham knew it by the name of Bethel. But perhaps those little discrepancies in the Land of Yahweh should not be noticed. Jacob and the Scribe agree in one particular—Jacob said it was a dreadful place, and the Scribe is of the same opinion.

49. Like unto Shiloh, Bethel seems not to have been thought much of by the writers of the New Testament, neither of them being referred to in later Judaism and Christianity.

50. At Bethel Jeroboam is said to have set up a golden calf for worship when he wished to draw away the hearts of the Israelites from Yahweh, in consequence of which the prophet of Yahweh was sent to cry out against this ungodly business, to confirm the mission of which prophet the altar was rent in pieces by invisible hands and the ashes poured out.

51. It is also thought that at Bethel dwelt the two she-bears which Yahweh, at the request of Elisha, sent out to destroy the forty-two little children for laughing at the prophet's bald head. This claim, however, is of no value. The story of Yahweh and the bears is slightly mythical; and, if it is true, it is no credit to Yahweh, and the habitation of the bears is unknown even unto this day.

52. Bethel is but a poor village, composed of wretched huts. There are some remains of the walls of a church and an old cistern, but nothing to show that it ever enjoyed any superior consideration or advantage.

CHAPTER XXI.

TENTH VISIT OF MELCHISEDEC.

1. And it came to pass on this last night of the eleventh month, and just about the usual hour, that the venerable visitor made his entry into the tent of the scribe much as he had done on previous occasions. In gentle tones he spake these words:

2. Hail, Seeker after Truth! I perceive that weariness oppresseth thee, and that the hardship of the day hath been severe upon thee; but this is a hard country for pilgrims to travel in, and containeth little to cheer the heart. Thou art, however, learning truth about the Land of Yahweh which thou couldst not otherwise obtain, and thou wilt never regret making the journey. Let me resume the subject of my last visit:

3. Thou well understandest already that neither of the four canonical gospels which were admitted into the collection composing the New Testament had even an existence as such until late in the second century; and that, consequently, they were not written by the persons whose names they bear, nor were they written by persons who had the slightest knowledge of the events recorded in them.

4. They were simply made up from vague legends and traditions that were floating around from mouth to mouth of an ignorant, superstitious population; and when these were committed to writing in the form which they at present bear, many things were added to them which never occurred, and the things that had occurred were so changed by the designing writers as to be wholly unlike the originals.

5. It should be easy for any sensible person to understand that legends a century and a half old cannot be of any great historical value, and that it would be a matter of utter impossibility for persons, however well disposed, undertaking to write up the discourses that had been spoken, the conversations that had been held, and the acts that had been performed a hundred and fifty years before, to state anything like the truth, or to give anything near the words that were really uttered or the events that absolutely took place.

6. The liability to error, and to incorporate positive untruths into the recital, was greatly increased because the purpose was to build up a belief in what was not true, and to bring about a recognition of events that never occurred. It was under this state of things that the four gospels were written. A new religion was being formed, a new god was being given to the people to worship, and it was deemed necessary that a supernatural character should be given the latter, and that supernatural deeds should attend his ministration.

7. This very claim of supernaturalism is quite sufficient to condemn the whole system. It is one of the strongest axioms that truth is able to establish that every claim of supernaturalism is untrue, and every system of religion based upon the relation of supernatural occurrences must necessarily be an untruthful system.

8. Judaism, Christianity, Mohammedanism, and the greater share of the pagan systems of which they are the outgrowths are of this character. Nearly all the religions of the world have been based upon supernaturalism, all claim the occurrence of impossible events, and to that extent are wholly untrue.

9. No such thing as a snpernatural event, as I before indicated, ever took place or ever can. Every effect is produced by a natural cause, and could not be otherwise. Nature is never superseded; there is no power above it; it is everywhere present; it is omnipotent, if anything is, and sufficient for every event that ever occurred and must produce every effect.

10. There have been few original system of religion in the world. Nearly all have been outgrowths of older systems. Sometimes the later evolution has been an improvement upon that from which it was copied, and sometimes a going back into darkness, error, and falsehood.

11. Christianity is no exception to the rule of other religions; it is made up of the notions which have long prevailed in the world, and is based wholly upon the supernatural, and the revealed will and command of a being supposed to dwell above and apart from the earth.

12. So far as its dogmas and points of belief are concerned, it has absolutely nothing that is new, nothing but what was accepted by pagan religionists fully a thousand years before it. Upon examining the ground closely it will be found that there is nothing in this comparatively modern system that was not steadfastly held to and promulgated by pagans many centuries before the time of Jesus or Paul.

13. The fundamental dogma of Christianity is that deity, in order to make the salvation of his creatures possible, devised the plan of begetting upon the person of a human female, a virgin, a son who should reveal to mortals the way to heaven, teach the world what to believe, and at last die as an expiation for the sins of mankind.

14. There certainly is nothing original in this. The belief that gods have cohabited with females, both celestial and terresrtial, was held thousands of years before Christianity. The principal gods of all the nations, according to the prevailing belief, begot sons, being partial to virgins and other attractive females of the human race.

15. It is not needful to enumerate all these, but a few may be named. Vishnu, the great god of India, was believed to have begotten on the person of a human virgin the demi-god Christna; and he was also believed to have been incarnated in eight other cases, being the father of nine incarnations in all.

16. Ormuzd was held to be the father of Mithra, and Astarte the mother. The Chinese Yu was the son of the deity of that country, and Shing Mung was the virgin mother. In the same way Buddha, the great redeemer of many of the Asiatic nations, was believed to have been divinely begotten on the person of Maia, a virgin.

17. Horus in a similar manner was the son of Osiris and Isis; Hercules was the son of Jupiter and Alcamene; Zulis was the son of the divinely-impregnated Celestine; Semele was the similarly impregnated mother of Bacchus; Myrrha of Adonis; Latona of Apollo; Maia of Mercury; Somnus of Momus; Alcimede of Jason; Hecate of Jason.

18. Thor and Balder were the sons of the Scandinavian god Odin; Prometheus, Æsculapius, and a dozen others of Jupiter; the Druidic Hesus of their chief divinity, and at least a score of others were, believed to have been thus begotten, and saviors of men. The idea of divinely-begotten sons and virgin mothers is more than a thousand years older than the conception of Jesus, and all the principal nations have believed that their gods did this thing.

19. The belief that many of these sons of gods, after passing their lives on the earth as teachers of men, have yielded them up to satisfy the vengeance or sense of justice of their fathers or superior gods; that they have been executed—many of them put to death upon the cross—as an expiation for the sins of mankind, and for their benefit, was held with regard to many demi-gods before Jesus was believed in at all.

20. Some of the names of these sons of gods thus believed to have been crucified are Christna of India, Thammuz of Syria, Wittoba of Telingonese, Iao of Nepaul, Hesus of the Celtic Druids, Prometheus of Greece, Thulis of Egypt, Mithra of Persia, Indra of Thibet, Alcestos of Euripides, Crite of Chaldea, Atys of Phrygia, Bali of Orissa, and Quirinus of Rome. Many of these were sculptured in stone by the people who believed in them, and set up in temples and places of worship for adoration three thousand years ago, the same as the crucified figure of Jesus is in churches to-day in all Christian countries.

21. It was believed that the birth of many of these saviors was pointed out by the stars; several of them were said to have been born in a stable, a manger, or a cave; the birth of some of them was said to have been announced to shepherds, and it was claimed for several of them that wise men or magi visited them and adored them soon after birth.

22. Some of them were said to have been born on the twenty-fifth day of December, and that day, in consequence, was celebrated before the same was taken as Christmas. There is no proof, however, that any of them, Jesus included, was born on that day.

23. Many of these sons of gods were simply personifications of the sun, and the time of their birth came from the fact that on the twenty-fifth day of December the sun begins to rise from the night or death into which he had sunk, and for six months from that time daily rose higher in the heavens. On that day the sun was said to be born, and for that reason it was observed as a great festival. Christians found it convenient to adopt this pagan holiday as they did pagan notions and dogmas.

24. The titles of the pagan saviors were much the same as those that were subsequently applied to Jesus; among them were: The Most High, the Lord of Life, the Son of God, the Redeemer of the World, the Lamb of God, the Holy Lamb, the True Light, the Sun of Righteousness, Guide to the Erring, Advocate with the Father, and others of a similar character.

25. The legend of these saviors being saved while in a state of infancy from the slaughter ordered by some wicked ruler was common with some of them; for instance, Christna was saved from the destruction designed for him by the tyrant Nanda of Madura.

26. The retirement to the wilderness for fasting, meditation, and temptation was by no means first believed of Jesus; it was accorded to others before him. The performance of miracles was attributed to all of them, as well as to other divine characters. Nearly every one was believed to have raised people from the dead.

27. Those older saviors had bands of disciples who followed them around. The earlier saviors taught multitudes in the villages, on the highway, in the fields and in the wilderness. At the crucifixion of some of them the sun was said to be darkened and earthquakes took place. Some descended into hell after their crucifixion, arose from the dead, and miraculously ascended into heaven.

28. The doctrine of the Trinity is three thousand years old. The idea of a Holy Ghost was an oriental belief, and a devil was believed in long before the Jews or Christians adopted one.

29. The cross was a religious symbol in many pagan nations. Immortality of the soul was first taught in pagan countries. A personalized Word or Logos was essentially pagan. Baptism was an early pagan rite. A pagan Holy Ghost descended in the form of a dove. The sacrament of the Eucharist came from the pagans. Anointing with oil was practiced a thousand years before Christ.

30. Belief in saints and worship of them, the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, a day of judgment, the resurrection of the dead, angels and spirits, fasting and prayer, the power to forgive sin, sacred writings and revelations from the gods, and the second birth, all originated in heathendom.

31. Confession and absolution, monasteries and monks, the sacred and imperative order of the priesthood, repentance and humility, and the efficacy of prayer to the gods, are all pagan institutions and teachings. The injunction of morality was strict and effective among pagans, and they have ever been quite as moral as Christians.

32. Thus it is seen there is no new or original doctrine or dogma in the Christian religion; everything it possesses was held by the pagan systems, which were much older, even down to the forms and ceremonies of worship, the robes and paraphernalia of the priests, the forms of the altars, and all the corresponding minutiæ.

33. Inasmuch, then, as Christianity contains nothing original, the claim of its being a new and revealed religion falls to the ground. If it is insisted, nevertheless, that it is a new revelation, it necessarily follows that the being who is supposed to have revealed it must have taken it from where it already existed; and he must have been very poor in originality, unable to devise anything new, and utterly dependent upon the worn-out systems of a thousand years before.

34. It is, indeed, a sad commentary that an infinite, omnipotent, and all-wise God was under the necessity of leaving his happy home and his extensive business in heaven, to come down into this world of turmoil and trouble; take upon himself the inconveniences of humanity; endure three-fourths of a year of close confinement during the period of gestation; pass through the tedious and troublous years of infancy, childhood, and youth to manhood; and then die ingloriously like a criminal, all for his own satisfaction and glory, simply to carry out what the old defunct pagan deities had inaugurated and taught more than ten centuries earlier. It indeed speaks very badly for the intelligence and originality of an all-wise and infinite being, as well as for the believers in the system.

35. But I will dwell no longer upon the subject at this time, leaving a continuation of it till my next visit. I leave my peace with thee; I wish thee a refreshing sleep, and health and strength to complete thy pilgrimage. Good-night. When the morning came everything with the Scribe and with the pilgrims was just the same as though the Venerable Visitor had not made a call.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE ELEVENTH DAY—BETHEL TO JERICHO.

1. And it came to pass on the morning of the first day of the last month that the pilgrims were up betimes, and ready for another day of rough riding over rocks and down precipices and steep hills to Jericho. Bethel is but fifteen miles north of Jerusalem, but the pilgrims here diverged to the east, toward the Jordan, leaving Jerusalem until Jericho and the Dead Sea have been visited.

2. Early after starting out the pilgrims passed upon the right the site of the old city of Ai, where Joshua is said to have committed such godly bloodshed after he had, by the use of rams' horns, demolished Jericho, leaving it a ruin, and putting the people to death by the sword.

3. Next, flushed with conquest, he turned his face against Ai, and took thirty thousand valiant men of war with him. He went by night, and played a sharp game upon the people of Ai, stationing a sufficient force in ambush, then with another force making a direct attack upon the city, with instructions to fall back as if defeated, when the men of Ai would pursue them, whereupon those lying in ambush were to rise up suddenly and enter the city and burn it. This programme was carried out; the city was destroyed, and men, women, and children were indiscriminately put to death.

4. The Bible says, And Joshua burnt Ai, and made it a heap forever, even a desolation unto this day. In looking at the desolate pile of rocks now, it is difficult to realize that it is the cite of a once populous city, or that such a great amount of blood was there spilt.

5. The roads this day were unusually rough and rocky, and so steep were they in some places that the pilgrims alighted from their horses and walked for safety; for verily their necks seemed to be in danger.

6. At length the valley of the Jordan, and the Mountains of Moab on the other side of Jordan, came fully in view from the top of the hills. But the banks of the river are so high that the stream itself could not be seen. The Dead Sea, however, was in plain sight in the south, and the noted peaks of Nebo and Pisgah in the range of the Mountains of Moab reared their heads before the pilgrims—the very hights from whence Moses is said to have had a view of the Promised Land preparatory to lying down to die, so that the angels could bury him so securely that no man could find his grave. Notwithstanding this assertion, the Moslems have the veritable tomb of Moses on the west side of the Jordan. They falsify the Bible by having the grave of Moses under their special control, and thousands of the faithful make pilgrimages to it. The Mountains of Gilead and many of the places mentioned often in the Jewish scriptures were immediately in front.

7. From the hills to the valley of the Jordan about four thousand feet have to be descended, and the way was so very steep and rough that most of the distance had to be made on foot, it being all the beasts were prepared to do to pick their way from bench to bench without riders; and it was more pleasant for the pilgrims to walk than to risk their necks by staying on the horses.

8. At length the valley was reached, and for an hour or two the pilgrims rode down on its outer side at the foot of the abrupt mountains, which rise directly from the plain. This being considered a country of thieves and robbers, two Bedouin sheiks, or deputies, were engaged to accompany the pilgrims to prevent their being attacked; and these Bedouins rode before the pilgrims, the one bearing a ferocious-looking spear, with a handle some fifteen feet in length, and the other had an old flint-lock musket strapped to his shoulder. The Scribe did say he would not like to have that spear run through his body, unless it was absolutely necessary.

9. On level places, and especially when the lunching-place on the camping-ground was neared, the Bedouin sheiks were very fond of exhibiting their horsemanship and fighting prowess. They cavorted on their steeds as though pursuing a real foe, and brought the big spear and the old musket to bear as though they had a hundred men or so to demolish. Their horses are so well trained that they mind at a word, and stop in an instant though on a full run. The horsemanship of the Bedouins is excellent, and, with all their trappings, they present a formidable appearance, much like the pictures that have been made of them.

10. They must have the credit of keeping the pilgrims from being robbed or killed, for nothing of the kind occurred; but possibly this was partly due to the fact that there appeared to be no person within ten miles inclined to molest them, and because those that were seen evinced not the slightest disposition to make an attack. There is danger, however, in these localities from the roving brigands, though they never attack a company under the protection of a sheik.

11. If a party is robbed or interfered with while under such escort, the government holds the tribe responsible to which the escorting sheik belongs, as well as the one to whom the robbers making the attack belong. The vicinity of Jericho, from time immemorial, has been noted as a resort of thieves and robbers.

12. Lunch was partaken of on the edge of the plain of the Jordan, by the Fountain of the Do'm, where several do'm-trees spread their limbs, bearing a sweet but rather inferior fruit about the size of robbins' eggs. Here also grows a thorny shrub called the Balm of Gilead, but totally unlike that which grows in the native land of the pilgrims.

13. Here also grows what are called the apples of Sodom, the plant being the Solanum Sanctum, which belongs to the same class and genera as the potato, the tomato, and the night-shade, or bitter-sweet. The fruit called the apples of Sodom, somewhat larger than potato-balls, are of a pretty yellow color, but are mere shells without meat or anything fit to eat. This, by the bye, is the false apple of Sodom, while the true is the calstropis procera.

14. A fine spring gushes up at the foot of the mountain at this place, making a good-sized stream, which converts a little place in that locality into an oasis around it. The mountain of rock immediately in the rear is called the Mountain of Temptation, one of the places when Jesus is claimed to have retired after his baptism in the Jordan to fast and be tempted of the devil. This might have been the exceeding high mountain into which the devil took him to show him all the countries of the globe; but if so, its exceeding great hight consists of two thousand feet above the level of the sea.

15. The Scribe thought if he were on that verdureless hill, the greatest temptation he would feel would be to get off again as soon as possible. It is a decidedly unattractive mass of cheerless rock and gravel, with not a tree to enliven the scene. It is dreariness intensified.

16. While stopping for lunch a shepherd came along with a large flock of sheep, and he amused the pilgrims by calling several sheep by name, which would come to him the same as a child would if called.

17. It was about ninety minutes' ride from the place of lunching to the site of old Jericho, with no hills to climb. In approaching the old site several caves were passed, located up in the side of the hill, from one to two hundred feet above the plain, where Abyssinian hermits live upon herbs alone. They are a wretched set of men, who think they are pleasing God by living in that useless manner. It seemed singular how the poor fools could climb up the sides of the rocks to their miserable places of abode.

18. The white tents were reached an hour or more before the sun went back of the hill, affording the pilgrims good time to look at their surroundings. The camp was immediately in front of what is called the site of ancient Jericho, where the great feat of throwing down the walls of a city by blowing upon rams' horns was so successfully performed. It would seem that the blasts must have been remarkably effective, as they not only threw down the walls, but blew the very stones out of existence, for not a vestige of them is to be seen.

19. The place where the house of the harlot Rahab stood is pointed out; but one spot may be as rationally claimed as another; for there is no Rahab, no Joshua, nor anybody else, to dispute the claim. The site is simply a rough mound of hard, sterile gravel, without a house, a ruin, or a person to make the slightest claim or to hold a residence.

20. Jericho seems once to hav been called a city of palm-trees, but there is not a palm-tree growing upon the site now; in fact, nothing grows there; the few mounds of the ruins of what once stood there are all that remains of what is claimed to have been the principal city of Canaan.

21. It was here, according to the story, that the two Israelitish spies called upon the harlot Rahab and made the arrangement with her by which she proved false to her own people, and for which there seemed to be no necessity, for the efficacy of the rams' horns did not depend in the slightest degree upon her faithlessness. It was here, as may be supposed, that Joshua—the man whose forte was to shed the blood of his fellow-beings and to appropriate the property and houses of others to himself and his own murderous band—stood on the surrounding high ground and said these words, Cursed be the man before the Lord that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho.

22. It was at Jericho, as claimed, that the prophet Elijah spent his last days, and from here he went forth with Elisha to the river Jordan, where they parted the rapid stream by striking it with an old mantle, after which Elijah made the most remarkable ascension on record, to wit, in a chariot and with horses of fire.

23. It has been suggested that it is far more probable that Elisha, wishing to succeed his master, quietly put him out of the way on the east side of the Jordan, and then took his mantle and set up business for himself. This seems infinitely more likely than that a chariot and horses of fire should come down and take a man bodily up above the atmosphere, which if done could not be of the slightest use to him. Such an ascension is an utter impossibility, while it would by no means be impossible for Elisha to kill a man he wished out of the way that he might succeed him, for he more than once exhibited a murderous disposition, particularly when he sent the she-bears to eat up forty-two little children. It would be infinitely easier for him to invent the chariot story than for it to be true; and he seems to have been the only person who knew anything about Elijah's going up.

24. Here, close by the site of Jericho, is a large spring called Elisha's Fountain, which he is said to have healed by throwing in a pinch of salt. The story runs in this wise: And the men of the city said unto Elisha, Behold, I pray thee, the situation of the city is pleasant, as my lord seeth, but the water is nought and the ground barren. And he said, Bring me a new cruse and put salt therein. And they brought it to him. And he went forth unto the spring of the waters and cast salt in there, and said, Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters; there shall not be from thence any more dead or barren land. So the waters were healed unto this day according to the saying of Elisha which he spake.

25. What kind of water it was which flowed from that spring before that, why it did not serve to water the vegetation that grew there, and how casting salt into the spring should change the nature of the fountain, can hardly be told; but if there are those who want to believe the story, let them believe it. There is plenty of barren ground in the immediate vicinity of the spring, so the healing of the land was not so very complete if that of the water was. There are thousands of acres of the land near the spring that are utterly barren.

26. The cry or bark of the jackal is heard here at night, and sometimes they seem to be not far from the huts. It is said that the nightingale is sometimes recognized in this vicinity, but the pilgrims have not been so fortunate as to be favored with its notes.

CHAPTER XXIII.

MELCHISEDEC'S ELEVENTH VISIT.

1. And it came to pass on the evening of this day that the Venerable Visitor made his usual call, and, after a salutation as on other occasions, proceeded to speak in this wise:

2. It is unfortunate for the Christian religion that it has no historical confirmation of the events which it claims in connection with the person it owns as its founder. As I remarked, it is not improbable that there might have been a person by the name of Jesus who may have been an enthusiast, or a kind of reformer, who spent a year or two of his life in tramping around this narrow country with a band of men following him; but there is not a line of authentic history, sacred or profane, to substantiate the fact.

3. No writer of the day, with the exception of Paul, makes mention of him; and Paul must be regarded as an interested witness, who had a special object in view in having the story believed; and even he, as before remarked, makes no claim for the miraculous or supernatural part of the story.

4. There were other eminent writers of that period who, if the story of such a remarkable character—who raised people from the dead, who was himself raised from the dead, and who was finally taken up bodily into heaven in the presence of five hundred people—had been true, should have known something of it and have said something of him. Among these men were Philo of Alexandria, Josephus of this country, Pliny and Tacitus of Rome, and several others; but they afford no corroboration of the remarkable claims.

5. Josephus was an elaborate writer, and lived in the generation following that attributed to Jesus. He gave full accounts of all the events that transpired in the country, but with the exception of a spurious and interpolated passage—which he surely did not write—his works contain no allusion to the person Jesus.

6. The spurious passage alluded to in Josephus was wholly unknown to the fathers and leaders of the church in the first, second, and third centuries, and it was not till the fourth century that it was known or mentioned by any one, and then by the unreliable church historian, Eusebius, who has the reputation of being himself the forger of the spurious passage. Had it been in the writings of Josephus before he (Eusebius) placed it there, others of the Christian fathers would surely have known of it, and they would have been only too glad to call attention to it.

7. Besides, the spurious passage overdoe, and therefore defeats itself. It makes Josephus to recognize Christ as being the messiah, or sons of God, who performed miracles, etc., which an orthodox Jew, as Josephus was, would surely not have done. He was by no means a Christian, but one of the most rigid believers in his own religion among his people, and he could not have so stultified himself as to avow a belief in the messiahship and the miracles of Jesus. Even had he known such a person, he is the last one who would have called him a god, the son of a god, or the messiah.

8. Again, inasmuch as the claims to the supernaturalism of Jesus, and the miracles performed by him, were not made in the first century, having been first promulgated to the world in the last quarter of the second century, it follows, as a matter of course, that Josephus, though a believer in the man Jesus, could not have recognized as true the impossible feats in the story.

9. This supposed recognition on the part of Josephus in the first century of that which was not claimed for more than a century afterward, may be regarded as a positive proof that the questionable passage is an arrant forgery. No other reasonable view of the case can be taken.

10. When, in connection with this, the fact is taken into consideration, as before remarked, that neither of the four canonical gospels were in existence till about the year 180, more than a century after every person who lived contemporary with Jesus was laid in his grave, it can naturally be seen how easy it might have been for an ingenious man, with a fair knowledge of preëxisting religions, to make up the story, and weave in the incidents of a miraculous character with which it is replete.

11. Were it a certainty that the books ascribed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were written by those persons, there would still be a great uncertainty about their truthfulness, for the stories of the four disagree widely in many respects, each giving incidents which they were not present to see, and stating them in a manner different from the other three.

12. But when it is found that an imposition has been practiced upon the world; that, so far from having been written by the four persons named, these gospels were wholly unknown till after those four persons had been a century in their graves, the utter worthlessness of the account, and the spuriousness of what is palmed upon the world as the history of the matter, becomes painfully apparent. When so much misrepresentation and falsehood is discovered, the whole sinks below the consideration of candid people.

13. Whenever gross impositions are found in the claims of any historical narrative, all that pertains to it loses all just claims to regard and confidence; and greatly is this enhanced when the claims set up are of an extraordinary character, and the world, upon the strength of such testimony, is asked to accept the assertions. Really, the whole story sinks to the level of simple contempt.

14. It is utterly impossible for Christian zealots and partisans to show the slightest proof that either of the gospels in the New Testament collection had an existence prior to the last quarter of the second century. None of the early fathers knew anything of those books; neither of them was read in the early churches, and it cannot be shown that either of them had an existence until they were mentioned by Irenæus, the bishop of Lyons, who, had he been a man of ability, might justly be supposed to be the author of them. It is, at all events, very fair to conclude that he knew the source from which they emanated.

15. The silly reasons which he offered as to why there were four gospels and no more show clearly one of two things, that he was a man of such simplicity as to be regarded as a simpleton, or that he was a swindler who was trying to foist a great falsehood upon the world. An able man, and an honest man at the same time, could not have made use of such frivolous and miserable sophistry.

16. The reasons he gave were that there are four principal winds of heaven, four corners to the earth, four spirits of heaven, and four-faced cherubim. Could more ridiculous reasons be advanced? When it is now well known that the earth has no corners, what can be thought of a father of the church insisting that because there are four corners of the earth, there must be four gospels—no more and no less? The most natural conclusion is that such a man could be dishonest enough to forge so-called gospels, and attribute them to other people, for the purposes of deception.

17. The unreliability of this Christian father, and the unreliability of the entire story, may be seen by noticing the fearful differences in the accounts which come down to the present time. According to Matthew, Mark, and Luke, the ministration of Jesus lasted a year, or a year and a half at most, and Jesus paid but one visit to Jerusalem after he had attained to the years of manhood. According to John, his mission lasted from four to seven years, and he paid several visits to Jerusalem. While again, according to this Father Irenæus, Jesus's ministry lasted some twenty-five years, and until he was past fifty years of age.

18. It must with but slight effort be seen how utterly unreliable the story is when such fearful discrepancies occur between those whom it is claimed wrote by inspiration, and between their defenders, who are their vouchers and sustainers. Any cause at the present day, sustained by such evidence, would be set aside at once as utterly unworthy of attention.

19. As another instance of the worthlessness of the character and testimony of Irenæus, it is only necessary to refer to the remarkable grapevines which he and John undertook to describe—each vine was to have 10,000 shoots, each shoot 10,000 branches, each branch 10,000 twigs, each twig 10,000 clusters, each cluster 10,000 grapes, and every grape twenty-five measures of wine, estimating the measure to be the small amount of a pint. I think thou calculatedst that the wine produced by a single vine would amount to over 1,302,083,000,000,000,000 hogsheads of 240 gallons each.

20. A man capable of making such extravagant statements cannot reasonably be credited upon any subject. But this was the man who first spoke of the miraculous paternity of Jesus, the first to allude to his performing the astonishing feat of raising people from the dead, of his performing other miracles, and of his going bodily up into the clouds. Indeed, how little credit the statements of such a man are entitled to!

21. The story of Irenæus about a certain kind of heavenly wheat is of the same character. He said: In like manner shall every grain of wheat produce 10,000 ears, and every ear 10,000 grains, and every grain 10,000 pounds of pure white meal—sufficient to make 5,000,000,000 barrels of flour, and to load railroad cars enough to make a train reaching forty times around the globe.

22. A man, I say, capable of talking and writing in this ridiculous manner is the authority the world has to depend upon relative to the authenticity of the four gospels upon which the Christian system rests, and which, according to the assertions of Christian priests, mankind must accept as truth, or burn in hell to all eternity. Could anything more absurd be devised? Surely not.

23. To say the very least, it is more than suspicious that Irenæus should know so much about the four received gospels, while so many other apostolic and Christian fathers who were on the stage before him knew nothing of them. St. Barnabas, bishop of Milan, and St. Clement, bishop of Rome, knew nothing of the four gospels now accepted by Christians.

24. St. Hermas, bishop of Philippolis; St. Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, and St. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, never heard of them; neither did Papias, bishop of Hierapolis; Quadratus, bishop of Athens; Aristides, Hegesippus, Justin Martyr, Melito, Tertullian; neither, let me say again, did any of the Christian fathers, or dignitaries, previous to Father Irenæus of the wine and wheat statements.

25. Aside from the mythical character of these four gospels, the manner in which they were admitted into the canon is sufficient to condemn the whole affair. There was no authority as to which books should be accepted and which discarded, save the mere opinions and preferences of a lot of quarrelsome and designing bishops and priests who met together for the purpose of contending and voting about the books presented.

26. These councils were often of the most disgraceful character, and the men who had assembled to decide upon which books should be admitted into the canon, as well as to settle other subjects pertaining to the church, frequently indulged in shameful quarrels, and sometimes even came to blows. In one instance, indeed, one bishop was so kicked and beaten by another bishop that he died.

27. Such, surely, were most unfit men to settle the question as to whether or not a given book was inspired by deity and to decide which productions should be accepted by the world as God's revealed will. If this whole matter is calmly considered in all its bearings, it must be seen that the collection called the canon possesses no claims that an intelligent and thoughtful person is bound to accept.

28. The conclusion, then, cannot be avoided that the Christian system is a borrowed religion; that its dogmas were purloined from paganism; that forgery and deception were practiced by those who had written some of the books; that the men who took it upon themselves to say what and which the word of God is were not by any means the men best qualified for the purpose, and that the collection, at best, is of a positively worthless character.

29. But I will not enlarge upon this subject at this time. I will bid thee good-night and wish thee sweet repose.

CHAPTER XXIV.

TWELFTH DAY—TO THE DEAD SEA AND THE JORDAN.

1. And it came to pass on the second day of the twelfth month that the pilgrims pointed their noses across and over the plain of Jordan, and followed the same toward the Dead Sea, which is at a distance of eleven miles, though, owing to the clearness of the atmosphere, the distance does not look to be more than half that amount.

2. For a mile or two from the camping-ground, and through the untidy stone and mud village of Riha, or modern Jericho, there is considerable vegetation, the fields appear to be cultivated, and there is quite a growth of fig-trees, shrubbery, and some grains. This portion is watered by the stream, before alluded to, called Elisha's Fountain.

3. The village of Riha is not only dirty and uninviting, but the inhabitants look as though they might belong to a class who rob such strangers as come their way. They look villainous and full of hate.

4. From this place to the Dead Sea the land is level, but dry and barren. A slight growth of grass covers the ground, upon which camels feed. Some two hundred camels, including their young, in different groups, were seen feeding in the course of a few miles; but the land is nearly worthless as to all that grows upon it.

5. It was upon this plain, according to Bible story, that the two cities (Sodom and Gomorrah) once stood, which were destroyed by fire and brimstone from heaven. There is nothing to be seen to indicate that those cities ever existed.

6. The Scribe searched anxiously around to see if he could find the figure of Mrs. Lot, standing as a warning to those who are inclined to look back. He was sorry that he could not espy the salted lady, because many of his friends requested a small piece of the woman coverted into salt, but no Mrs. Lot is to be seen.

7. In casting about the Scribe saw some caves up on the side of the rocky mountain, where Mr. Lot and his daughters might have taken shelter, and where, sad to contemplate, the daughters gave their father wine to drink and got him so drunk that they induced him to do a most monstrous act, or rather a couple of monstrous acts. Still he was not so drunk but what he was able to perform a deed which a drunken man is totally unfitted for.

8. The Scribe was not greatly disappointed in finding no Mrs. Lot, for he was prepared to think she had washed away years ago, though it rarely rains on this plain; but still he would be glad to take numerous pieces of her home as souvenirs for his many pious friends. But Mrs. Lot is entirely gone; not even a pinch of her remains—not enough is left to salt a lump of butter the size of a piece of chalk.

9. But, while in the neighborhood of the exploits of the Lot family, the Scribe wishes to speak a good word for Mrs. Lot and to pay her this tribute: She was, by far, the most honorable member of the Lot family; she did nothing to disgrace herself in the eyes of her neighbors and of the whole Jordan valley. The matter of turning her head and looking around to see how the home she was leaving was getting on was a mere bagatelle; every woman should be allowed to turn her head when she feels like it, and it was extremely ungenerous in Yahweh to salt her down just for that.

10. It would seem that Yahweh foreknew what was to take place, and wished to get Mrs. Lot out of the way so that the old man and the girls could have a good time. Had she been around, those shameful proceedings would never have taken place. Mrs. Lot, it must be insisted, is the only one of the four that maintained a respectable character. Compared with the rest of the family, she was a saint of the first water. She should have been canonized by the Jews and Christians from that day to this, and should have had marble statues made of her and put in all the holy places, instead of being made, by way of disgrace and punishment, a pillar of salt, which, very naturally, must waste away in the weather.

11. The Scribe gives his unanimous vote that Yahweh acted very unkindly towards the worthy lady, and that he is really responsible for the subsequent despicable behavior which the old man and his daughters were guilty of. If he wanted the very acts to be performed that were committed, he could not have adopted more effective means for bringing them about. He was particeps criminis in the business. All the participants should have been sent to the Albany Penitentiary for twenty years. The cause was immensely greater than mailing a copy of Cupid's Yokes.

12. Brimstone is not a perishable material; and the Scribe is of the opinion that if enough of it was sent down from heaven to burn up two cities made of stone and mud, a sufficient amount should still be lying loose around upon the ground to mark the spot where those cities stood. But nothing of the kind is to be seen. No sulphur can be found to tell where Sodom and Gomorrah once flourished.

13. The Scribe gives it as his opinion that the brimstone story is bogus. He does not believe that a supply of the drug sufficient to burn two cities is kept in heaven ready to be sent down on short notice. He believes that the man who wrote the account hundreds of years afterwards either dreamed it or drew upon his imagination for his facts. This is what was done in many instances in the Land of Yahweh.

14. It was in this locality—in the plain of Mamre—if there is any truth in the story, that Abraham resided at the time of that brimstone feat; it is here that he must have had that celebrated conversation with Yahweh, when the latter found it necessary to come down from heaven and make personal inspection as to whether the report he had heard about Sodom and Gomorrah was correct, as it must have been hereabouts that Abraham killed the calf and had it dressed for Yahweh and his two angels to partake of, while Sarah made some nice warm cakes for his majesty and suite to eat.

15. It was here, too, that Yahweh made the promise to Abraham that Sarah, though nearly a hundred years old, should again become like a young woman, and bear a son to her husband in his old age. It is not strange that Sarah should laugh to hear such a promise, and be a trifle incredulous. It seems, though, that she denied laughing when Yahweh perceived her mirth. She need not have told an untruth, for there was nothing criminal in her smiling or being incredulous touching such an unusual occurrence as a woman ninety years of age bearing a child.

16. It was on that occasion that Abraham washed Yahweh's feet and treated him as he would an ordinary guest; and, after Yahweh and his two celestial companions had partaken of the hearty meal of veal and warm cakes, followed them, and induced Yahweh to spare Lot and his family from the destruction he had decided to bring upon Sodom. Perhaps if Abraham had not made that request, Yahweh would have left Lot to his lot.

17. It is the opinion of the Scribe that the entire story about the old woman bearing a son, about the brimstone being sent from heaven, about Yahweh taking a hearty meal of fresh veal and warm cakes, about turning Mrs. Lot into a pillar of salt, and all the rest of it, is wholly fabulous and untruthful. To his comprehension, the idea of an infinite deity, the author of all worlds and all constellations of suns and worlds, who must be in the most distant star as well as here, calling upon old Abraham and having his feet washed, partaking of fresh meat and warm bread, and the necessity of coming down to inform himself as to the facts about Sodom, is extremely crude. He thinks the man that wrote that yarn must either have been in the condition of Lot in the cave or practicing the same art in which Baron Munchausen was such an adept.

18. The Dead Sea is called in the Bible the Sea of the Plain; in the Talmud, the Sea of Sodom, and by Josephus, Lake Asphaltiles. Owing to many wild legends as to its deadly character, it was named Dead Sea by the Greeks. The Arabs call it Bahr-Lût (the Sea of Lot). It is more a lake than a sea, for it is but about forty-five miles in length and from three to nine miles in width.

19. In some respects it is the most remarkable body of water in the world. It is 1,300 feet below the level of the sea, and hence is the lowest of lakes on the earth. The water is very dense with salt and other mineral substances. It is much more salt than the water of the ocean, and is probably the heaviest water in the world. It contains soda, magnesia, potash, lime, and other elements, and such as prevent fish or any animal from living in it. But it is as clear as the purest spring water. Its specific gravity is 1·256.

20. It is a body of water without an outlet. The Jordan pours constantly into it, but still it never is full; the evaporation in the burning sun, and the soaking away of the water in the thirsty sands, suffices to prevent any surplus being on hand. Its area is about 250 geographical miles; its mean depth is 1,080 feet. It receives a few other streams besides the Jordan. It is estimated that 6,000,000 tons of water empty into it daily.

21. The range of hills on each side of the valley shuts in the Dead Sea, so that the view east and west amounts to nothing. The hills on either side are rough, steep, naked, barren rock and gravel, and are extremely uninviting. The whole is little more than a wide and wild ravine, and the feeling of quietness and a deathlike stillness pervades the surroundings. No one lives in the vicinity of the Dead Sea, and very few of the natives visit it.

22. It has been proposed to cut a canal from the Mediterranean to the Jordan velley; and were such a thing to be done, what a rushing in of the water of the ocean there would be, and how thousands of acres of the valley and plain would be covered more than a thousand feet deep with water!

23. The day, though in December, was bright and warm, the sun pouring down its rays with a burning persistence that almost scorched the skin. In approaching the waters, some of the pilgrims galloped their horses over the plain, and Mrs. Moots had the misfortune, by the turning of her saddle, to be thrown to the ground when her horse was at full speed, but luckily, the ground being sandy and soft, she was not injured.

24. Of course a bath in the Dead Sea must be indulged in by the pilgrims on such a warm and pleasant day. All improved the opportunity save one or two. The Scribe was not one to decline the bath. He is an indifferent swimmer, but he found that, owing to the density of the water, it has remarkable sustaining power, and that sinking in it is almost out of the question. But swimming in it is not easy, as it is hard to propel the body through the water, and the feet evince a disposition to come to the top. One can sit in the water and float, and floating upon the back is very easy. The water is bitter, and the disagreeable taste remains long in the mouth.

25. The Scribe picked up several of the smoothly-worn pebbles of the beach as souvenirs of the visit, there being little else one would wish to carry away. Along the shore is not a little flood-wood, which the streams emptying into the lake bring down in times of high water. Very little vegetation is seen around the borders of the Sea. No boat is upon the lake, hence there is no chance for riding upon the waters. It is indeed a lonely place.

26. The Jordan empties into the Dead Sea at the northeast corner, and some two miles from where the pilgrims bathed. The waters of the Jordan are turbid and muddy, though the lake, as observed, is very clear.

27. The Jordan is of course the sacred river of the Israelites. It rises in springs at the foot of Mounts Hermon and Lebanon. It flows along the plain of Huleh, and empties into the shallow Lake Huleh, or waters of Merom, from which it again emerges with increased force, and in the course of ten or fifteen miles plunges down twenty-seven rapids into the Lake of Galilee. From the Lake of Galilee to the Dead Sea is sixty miles, but the river is so tortuous in its course that it measures one hundred and twenty miles.

28. Leaving the Dead Sea, the pilgrims took a northeastern course, with a view of striking the Jordan about three miles from its mouth. The waters of the Dead Sea are so charged with saline matter that, despite the most thorough wiping, a disagreeable sense of stickiness remains, and a bath in Jordan is necessary to wash it off.

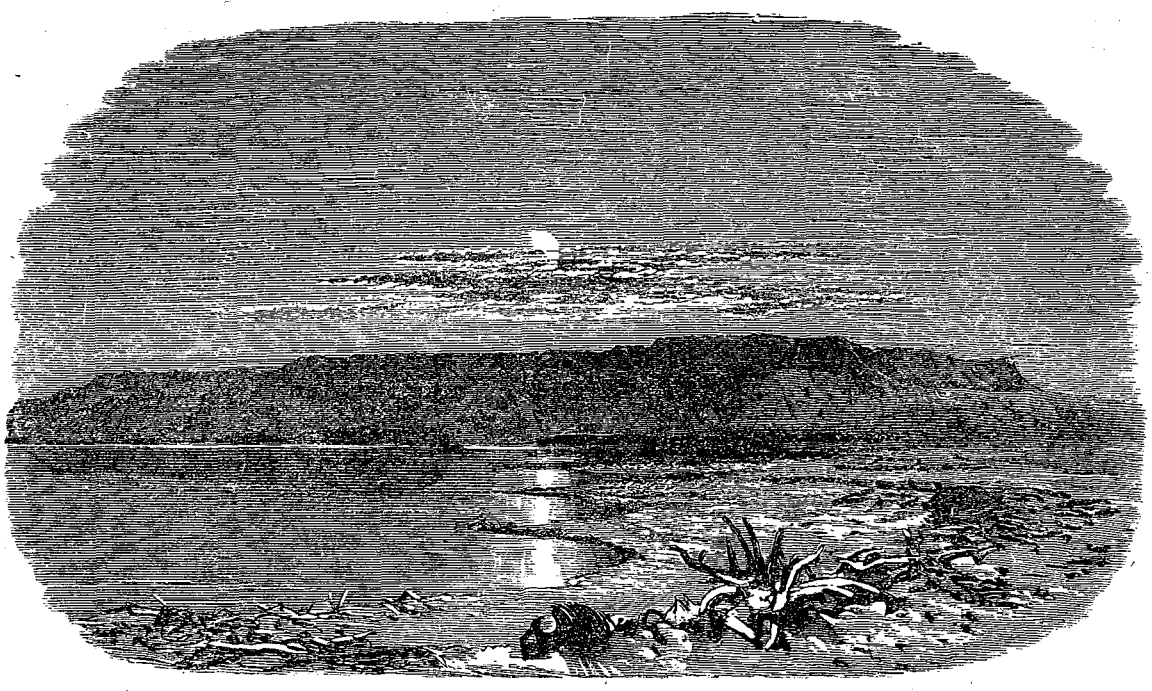
29. Bathing in the Jordan is a sacred ceremony with thousands of Christians who resort to its banks for the purpose. At Easter time the Greek Christians from all the neighboring country collect in thousands at their bathing place early in the morning, and at a given signal they proceed to the river, where old and young, rich and poor, without much regard to propriety, plunge into a promiscuous bath. The scene has been variously described, and probably the less accurate the description the more creditable appears the performance. The Christians attach a deep religious significance to the ceremony, which they regard as the source of many blessings. The Roman Catholics do not go in where the Greeks do, but have a place farther down.

30. The Jordan is by no means a pretty river; the water is muddy, the banks are high, precipitous, and unsightly, being alluvial soil, or mud. On the top there is a considerable growth of bamboo, oleanders, weeds, and mixed shrubbery in a wild, tangled profusion; but a little way from the stream all is barren and drear. The banks are so high and perpendicular that the river cannot be seen until close upon it. In the narrowest places it is eighty feet in width, and in the widest three times that distance.

31. The point of the river which the pilgrims reached is said to be near the place where Joshua and his army crossed over, and where the river kindly parted for them; the place where Elijah and Elisha crossed just before the former made his ascension; and the place where much later Jesus was baptized by John the Baptist, after which the Holy Ghost, in the form of a dove, descended upon him.

32. The Scribe remembered the old Methodist hymn which he heard in the days of his childhood,

> On Jordan's stormy banks I stand,
> And cast a wishful eye
> To Canaan's fair and happy land,
> Where my possessions lie.



33. He realized the misrepresentations in the four short lines; had it said,

> On Jordan's muddy banks I stand,
> And cast a squinting eye
> To Canaan's rough and sterile land,
> Whose natives steal and lie,

it would have been much more correct. The hills opposite the Jordan are especially dreary and unsightly, being naked and precipitous piles of gravel and rock, as cheerless and desolate as can be imagined.

34. But a bath must be had in the sacred Jordan, and the Scribe must not be excused. Perhaps he needs a baptism as much as any other person. The place selected to enter the waters of the Jordan is a spot where the camels go down to drink, and the descent for a short distance is gradual. Some two hundred camels were there drinking at the time.

35. The Jordan is a rapid stream, and a dangerous one, as the Scribe learned to his cost, for here he came near making his wife a widow. With characteristic venturesomeness, amounting perhaps to a species of foolhardiness, the Scribe thought he would see how much of a miracle it would require to wade across the noted river. He selected a point a hundred feet or more below where the other pilgrims went in.

THE DEAD SEA.

36. He waded in and found the current very strong, but by bracing himself he was able to withstand it. He had passed nearly over, and was within six or eight feet of the eastern bank, when, unexpectedly stepping into a deep hole, the stream took him off as it would have taken a log, down where the river is deeper and wider.

37. He, of course, struck for the shore from whence he started; but, being a poor swimmer withal, and unable to go far without getting out of wind, he had not navigated a great distance before a feeling of exhaustion came over him. Hoping he had got where the water was shallow enough for him to stand upon the bottom, he stopped and went down, but no bottom was within reach.

38. He swam on until it seemed as though he had not another breath, when he stopped again; but again he found no bottom. Then he saw that considerable more natation was to be performed, breath or no breath, strength or no strength. He kept his face toward the muddy bank, and struggled on the best way he could, but the exertion produced a bewildered state of mind, and the whole thing seemed like a dream, an unreality, attended with a singular feeling of indifference whether he got out or not. He was not so far gone, however, but what he realized that he had not been sent out to drown in the Jordan, that he had but partly filled his contract, and that the best thing that he could do would be to get ashore with as little delay as possible.

39. He pushed on, though his breath had entirely deserted him and he was even more thoroughly exhausted then ever before in his life; and at length, when it seemed he could not go another foot, he was just able to grasp a slender, but friendly, bamboo stalk that bent over to the water, and by which he was enabled to draw himself to the bank; but even there the water was over his head, and he could find no rest for the sole of his foot.

40. For ten minutes he held on to the bamboo stalk, until he could, to some degree, recover his lost respiration. The other pilgrims had missed the Scribe, for when he reached the shore he was in a bend of the river where they could not see him. One of them saw the Scribe swimming his best, and the man Bridges called out to the Scribe asking if he was safe. The Scribe, while still in the water, gathered his breath the best he could and shouted back, All right. He did not wish the others to know the effort he had had to make, nor the narrow escape he had met with.

41. After breathing for several minutes he attempted to get up the bank, but found it utterly impossible to obtain any toe-hold—the mud was washed out from under the bank, leaving it in a shelving position—so the only way for him was to haul himself up by his hands, the feet being unable to take any part in the exercise. Once the bamboo broke and let him back into the water, and he knew not that he would succeed in getting out; but luckily he was able to grasp some weeds, and after working for ten or fifteen minutes, and by the most vigorous exertions he was capable of, he succeeded in drawing himself up on the bank; but so completely covered with mud as to be a sight to behold.

42. The business of the first ten minutes was to get some breath, after which the mud was washed off, when the scribe walked back thirty rods up-stream to get his clothes, where he washed again; but it was thirty minutes before he had so far recovered as to breathe naturally. He did not feel like wading the river again, thinking his escape as narrow as he desired, and judging that if he had had a fathom farther to swim, if the bank had been but a single foot higher, if the weeds had been but a little weaker, or if he had gone fifty feet farther down stream, where the banks are higher, he must surely have drowned.

43. He had not informed himself of the treacherous and dangerous nature of the stream, and it was not till afterward that he learned that many persons have been drowned in the Jordan. The conductor of the party said that a few years ago one of Cook's party went in to bathe, and though he did not attempt to wade over, he came within an ace of drowning, and would have perished had he not been hauled out by the hair of his head.

44. Only last year a German professor went in the Jordan to bathe, and the current took him down and he was drowned, and it was three days before his body was recovered. Usually, the bodies of the drowned are not recovered; the current takes them along hurriedly to the Dead Sea, and carries them far out. The banks of the river are so high, and the current so rapid, that no chance for rescue exists; and when the body is out in the Dead Sea there is little chance for obtaining it.

45. The Scribe is glad he did not leave his body in the Dead Sea, preferring to take it around to his own land, where his own friends will be enabled to attend his funeral, when ultimately he shuffles off this mortal coil. Had he been a Bedouin, replete with muscle and activity, able to swim like a fish, he would have been able to cross the stream and to have swam out without difficulty, as they often cross the river by fording and on camels; but not being a Bedouin, the case was quite different, and he counted himself fortunate in getting out.

46. He questioned somewhat whether Jeremiah had any reference to him when he asked, If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses; and if in the land of peace wherein thou trustedest, they wearied thee, then how wilt thou do in the swelling of the Jordan? (Jer. xii, 5.) At all events, the Scribe feels that he has been pretty thoroughly baptized, and if from this time he is not saved, he wants to know the reason why.

47. When the Scribe had fully recovered his breath, and returned to the pilgrims, the carpet was spread upon a high bank of the Jordan, and lunch was partaken of. But he had little appetite for eating; his vigorous exercise had driven it away, if any there would have been. But after drinking some camel's milk, he was able to enter into a discussion with the man of God Getz, and the man of God James.

48. The discussion came up in this way: the subject of the Mormons was upon the tapis, and it was decided by the entire party who participated in the talk that polygamy is a very great enormity, and that the United States government ought to suppress it by law. To this the Scribe demurred, saying that the government had no right to interfere with men's religious convictions and privileges.

49. And however pernicious the habit of polygamy is, Christians are the last people in the world who should cry out against it, for it was practiced by the men whom they hold up as God's greatest favorites, the guides to be patterned after, and the men who are regarded superior to all others who have lived. If it was right for Abraham, Jacob, Gideon, David, Solomon, and all the patriarchs and men of God in olden times to practice polygamy, it is also right for the Mormons. What was moral and right three thousand years ago cannot be immoral now. As God did not condemn polygamy then, they have no reason to claim he condemns it now. What is right and true in one year is right and true in another. Principles do not change. If polygamy is wrong now, it was always wrong. That is a truism that cannot be evaded.

50. The men of God responded that men must be allowed to progress and advance, and that Christ had condemned polygamy, hence it was wrong. The Scribe replied that men, of course, had a right to progress and improve their civilization; but how about God? Is he also to improve? Is he to be better this year or this century than he was in some previous year or century? If he did not condemn polygamy three thousand years ago, will it do for him to condemn it now?

51. And as for the matter of Jesus condemning polygamy, I deny it, and ask you where his language forbidding it is to be found. He condemned polygamy no more than he did monogamy; he did, in fact, condemn marriage in every form. This the men of God stoutly denied, repeating that Jesus and Paul both approved of marriage.

52. The Scribe answered that both Jesus and Paul showed they were opposed to marriage, first, by not marrying themselves. If it were better to marry than not to marry, they certainly should have married. And Jesus insisted that unless others took up the cross and followed him—doing as he did—they could not be his disciples, and consequently could not be saved. Hence if he did not marry, those that follow him also must not marry.

53. The Scribe also quoted the words of Jesus in reply to his disciples when they asked him if it was right to marry: All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given; for there are some eunuchs which were so born from their mother's womb; and there are some eunuchs which were made eunuchs of men; and there are some eunuchs which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it let him receive it.

54. And again he said: Verily I say unto you that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. In the following verse he enjoins the forsaking of wives and children; and he declared on another occasion that in the kingdom of heaven there was neither marrying nor giving in marriage. These declarations, with his entire abstinence from marrying and sexual intercourse, argue that he was opposed to marriage of any kind.

55. As for Paul, though he admitted it was better to marry than to burn, he insisted that those who did not marry did better than those who did; and he would that all men were like himself—unmarried. The Scribe insisted that if those persons approved of marriage their language did not show it, nor did their lives and examples prove it. If they approved of marriage they would have married.

56. The man of God James insisted that Jesus was the son of God, and therefore could not marry nor indulge in the sexual act. Said the Scribe, Why therefore? Did not his father indulge in the sexual act when he begat Jesus? and what authority have you for saying that the son could not do as much as the father? Besides, did not the sons of God in olden time, as narrated in Genesis vi, 2, marry the daughters of men, taking such as they chose? What grounds have you, then, for saying that another son of God could not do the same if he wished? What right have you to say that Jesus, being the son of God, therefore could not marry?

57. The two men of God did not like to hear the Scribe talk, because he said things displeasing unto them, and they even looked as if they wished he had not got out of the Jordan. The Scribe has frequently had such spats of words with them, which would require too much space to repeat, and he was sometimes fearful he would to some extent detract from the pleasure of their visit to the Land of Yahweh, which he was loth to do, as he wished them to have all the happiness possible.

58. The Scribe is alone in the heretical notions which he indulges in, and when religious subjects arise the entire party is opposed to him. Even the man Bridges, from the land of Hoosier, though for a wonder he has discarded sulphur from his creed, persistently holds on to all the rest of the Christian nonsense. His friends even feared to have him make the tour of the world with the Scribe, lest heterodoxical notions might be imperceptibly instilled into him. But the Hoosier man is quite safe. He left home perfectly steeled against the reception of any new religious notions. He would not read THE TRUTH SEEKER or any book written by the Scribe, even if he knew it would kill him on the spot. A new idea of a religious nature could not be introduced into his head, even by a surgical operation, any more than into a burglar-proof safe with a double-combination lock. How he ever came to discard sulphur is a marvel. The Scribe has told him that he is a fine specimen of the religious fogy.

59. In due time the pilgrims were on their way back to the camp at the same place where they camped the night before. The ride was pleasant enough, and the tents were reached in good season.

CHAPTER XXV.

MELCHISEDEC'S TWELFTH VISIT.

1. When the Venerable Visitor entered the tent after this day was over, and when all had sunk into repose, he smiled placidly at the Scribe and said: And so thou wast baptized in the Jordan to-day, and it came near being thy last swim? Hadst thou given up the ghost there in the Jordan, that holy stream, thou shouldst have been entitled to a direct passport into paradise, else there can be no special efficacy in those turbid waters over others.

2. But it appears thou art destined to live still longer to give forth further utterances of what thou deemest to be the truth, whether it make thee popular or unpopular; and the last is the more likely to be the case. It cannot be otherwise than unpopular to oppose and expose popular errors. So thou canst make up thy mind that so long as thou pursuest thy present course thou wilt incur the ill will and even the hatred of those who think differently from thyself.

3. Thou hast, however, sufficiently counted the cost in this matter, and I trust thy heart will not grow faint in the work in which thou hast engaged. Thou hast gone to prison once, and I think thou wouldst not quail even should thy enemies send thee there again; neither wilt thou flinch at the unpopularity or obloquy that may meet thee in the pursuance of thy honest convictions. I bid thee keep up the warfare against the reign of superstition and error though millions rise against thee, and frown upon thee, and speak evil of thee.

4. Now let me recur to the subject touched upon in the late visits I have made thee, and let me say a strong proof that Jesus was not a God, that he did not possess infinite knowledge, rests in the fact that according to the record he recognized and believed the most utter fallacies and absurdities which men have accepted. An infinite and all-wise God could not do this.

5. The very fact that Jesus believed in men being possessed by devils, that seven or a thousand could enter into a single person, that the ordinary mental disease called insanity was the operation of devils, clearly shows that he was governed by the same errors and absurdities that darkened the minds of the people of that age.

6. What would now be thought of a physician in charge of an insane asylum, or of any medical man of the present day, who should hold that insanity or aberration of mind comes from a devil having entered into the patient, and that the afflicted person could only be put in possession of a sound mind again by the devil being driven out? He would certainly be deemed demented himself, and wholly unfit to administer to the mental ailments of others.

7. It is now well understood that insanity is as much a disease as is fever, rheumatism, or consumption, and that it requires to be treated in a scientific manner. It is as sensible to think of removing the bilious cholic by charms, incantations, or by rebuking a devil, as insanity.

8. Jesus seemed to know nothing about this; he did not regard insanity as arising from a diseased condition, but thought that some imp of Satan had surreptitiously taken possession of the poor man, and that the only way the sufferer could be relieved was by ordering or cajoling the devil to depart from him.

9. If there were no other proof that Jesus was not a god, that he had not infinite knowledge, that he was not superior to an ordinary man of intelligence, this very devil absurdity is sufficient to show it. A sensible person can hardly believe in such a being as a devil; that monstrosity belongs to darkened minds and to darkened eras.

10. There is no such thing as a devil, save in the minds of ignorant and superstitious people. Those who can believe in devils can also accept genii, gnomes, hobgoblins, fairies, naiads, witches, gorgons, fates, furies, harpies, hulders, and the thousands of other monstrosities which have existed only in the brains of superstitious men and women. An infinite and all-wise god could not possibly believe in them.

11. The fact that Jesus quoted and recognized such fables as Noah and his flood, the earth being covered with water to the tops of the highest mountains; all the forms of animal life, from the elephant down to the smallest insect, including also birds and reptiles of all kinds, being housed together in a tight, dark box, without food or drink for thirteen months; about the ark resting upon the top of a mountain 17,000 feet above the sea, and the delicate animals being turned out midst perpetual frost, which must prevail at that hight, without the slightest show for food, either animal or vegetable, and with all vegetable and animal life swept from the face of the earth, shows that he could neither possess infinite intelligence nor ever even good common sense.

12. Also his recognizing and indorsing the equally frivolous story of Jonah being swallowed by a fish and lodging in the fish's stomach under water for three days and three nights, without air, without oxygen, so essential to the life of every person, shows equally that he was not an all-wise god, and that he was only an ill-informed man to be gulled by a foolish fable.

13. Nothing is more apparent in the story of Jesus than that he was a person of not more than ordinary attainments. He gave no evidence of possessing the least scientific knowledge, which man at that time so much needed, and which was then so scarce in the world. He seemed to know no more of chemistry, astronomy, geology, mathematics, geometry, biology, and the other most useful sciences than the most ignorant persons he had called around him.

14. Had he given lessons to the world as to the laws of the universe, showing it how imperative is natural law, how essential that man should understand it and govern his life and his conduct by it; how essential that the relation between cause and effect be understood, and the superiority of the truths of nature over the chimeras of superstition and ignorance, it would have been infinitely better than filling the minds of his illiterate hearers with vagaries about devils getting into men, women, and hogs; about the tale of Noah and his water five miles in depth, and about Jonah taking a three days' ride in the belly of a fish.

15. Had he possessed infinite knowledge and power, and had it been his purpose to impart the same to the inhabitants of the earth, how much good he might have done them by enlightening them upon hundreds of points of which they knew nothing! But he uttered not a new idea; he brought to light not a single scientific truth; he gave the world no new inventions; no improvements in agriculture, in mechanics, or in the arts.

16. He did not instruct farmers how to cultivate their farms to the best advantage; he did not say a word about the necessity of deep plowing, of the best breeds of sheep, cattle, horses, pigs, or fowls. He said not a word about the importance of good roads, of the best kind of farm wagons, of the necessity of good fences, good dwellings, good schoolhouses, or the best style of wearing apparel.

17. Though he is said to have been brought up to the carpenter's trade, and consequently must have known something of the use of tools and skilful workmanship, still he said nothing about any improvements that ought to be made in the business he worked at; he gave no hints of new inventions that ought to be introduced; not a word about improved modes of sawing lumber, of the planing-machine, the dovetailing-machine, nor any other kind of machine that carpenters would be especially benefited by understanding, and which they hav been obliged to work out by dint of their inventive powers, wholly unaided by him.

18. He did no more for other mechanics; he gave no information about the turning-lathe for iron or wood, nothing about a slotting-machine, nothing about improved spinners, nothing about improved looms, nothing about improved modes of manufacturing boots and shoes, nothing about improvements in making garments, nothing about making clocks and watches, nor did he give women the slightest instruction about the important matter of making good bread.

19. He also showed himself wholly ignorant of the great improvements which have since been introduced and brought to a high state of perfection by the ingenuity of man. First of all, he knew nothing about the great art of printing, of the use of types, or of the printing-press. The invention of these has been of incalculably greater value to the world than all the homilies upon theology that have been inflicted upon mankind.

20. He knew nothing about the nature of electricity, magnetism, chemical affinity, or any of the subtle forces of nature. He knew nothing of the power of steam, nor its application to the engine for running machinery; nothing of the steamboat, nothing of the railroad, nothing of the telegraph, and nothing of scores of other great inventions which have been of inestimable value to mankind.

21. The application of steam to the running of machinery, of electricity, and magnetism in all its applications for similar purposes; the introduction of coal as fuel, the making of gas for illuminating purposes, the discovery and uses of petroleum, the telegraph, and other kindred discoveries, have been a million times of greater value to the world than all the talk about devils, ghosts, angels, and gods that Jesus and the hundreds of thousands of his priests have indulged in for eighteen hundred and fifty years.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1882.

The Catholic Church.

The growth of this establishment in this country in the last few decades is calculated to make every thoughtful and liberty-loving person feel alarmed. When we consider its methods of propaganda, the sly, crafty, and jesuitical manner in which it quietly and effectually furthers its aims, we cannot but see in it the worst enemy this nation has. We know what it has done in the past, and although its power has been in a large measure taken away, it is fair to presume it would do the same again should it regain its lost influence.

This country, with its free institutions and non-recognition of any one particular church sect, is an easy one for the crafty papists to subjugate to their master at Rome. The heavy influx of the Irish, who are all slaves to the Romish church, is giving the pope thousands and thousands of adherents, who regard his will as of more importance than their duty to their adopted country. They are being naturalized and given citizenship as fast as they come, and by this means the pope has now thousands of votes as absolutely at his command as though he cast them all himself. More that that, he has the material for an army should he desire one. The Catholics in this country, although a part of the sovereign people, know no master but the pope, and regard their allegiance to the church above their duty to the country. In Europe the people and governments are familiar with the machinations of this power, and the tendency for many years past has been to deprive it of its fangs. The United States has never had a holy Roman inquisition, and but very few of our people besides the Freethinkers know what it has done. So they rest in idleness; and it is this condition of affairs that gave Pius IX. the opportunity to say, with more truth than popes are in the habit of expressing, that he had more power in the United States than in any other country.

A Russian Catholic priest has recently written a book (published in St. Petersburg) which shows that it is no idle fear that takes alarm at the growth of the Catholic church in our land. The increase of the different churches has been large, but none has grown so fast as this, and the question is coming up, Shall America become a Catholic country? That Italian who said he would rather see Rome in ashes than again under the dominion of the pope, felt as all patriots must feel when considering this question. Yet, for many more years than people are aware, the Romish church has been quietly conquering first a foothold, then a commanding position in our affairs, and if not checked may finally be powerful enough to shape its own laws and legislations in its own favor. Indeed, in New York, which is a greater Irish city than Dublin itself, it has controled legislation and taxation for many years. Does any one suppose for a moment that a political leader of this city could hold his 50,000 voters in absolute command if he were not a Catholic and the nephew of a cardinal? Great as is their love for democracy (although half of them do not know the meaning of the word), they fear their priests more. With them church is paramount to party.

In tracing the growth of Catholicism this Russian priest has recalled to mind many facts of importance bearing upon this question. The first religious pioneers in the New World were the Catholic monks, and particularly the Jesuits. During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries many thousands of Indians became Catholics. In the eighteenth century, along with the foundation of the English rule in America, came hard times for both the Indians and the Catholics. The former were either annihilated or pushed westward, and the latter were paralyzed by the stringent anti-Catholic laws dictated by the Protestants. The Puritans in the Old World suffered much at the hands of the church for their religious views. In the New World they became prosecuting fanatics, and the Catholics were the victims of their religious intolerance. The Catholic priests were forbidden to liv in New England under penalty of death. Out of the thirteen original states, only four were without state religion; the rest of the states officially supported the Protestant church. The papists were everywhere denied the right of free exercise of their religion. Even in the state of Maryland, founded by Catholics, they were often persecuted by the Protestant settlers. In the war for independence the religious war among the settlers was considerably abated.

Thus religious tolerance was but the child of political necessity, and not the offspring of humanity. The jealousy of the sects, one of another, gave us religious liberty at first, and led to the incorporation of this article into the Federal Constitution: "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." Though a hot opposition was raised against this article, the political wisdom of a few heretical statesmen went even further. In 1791 the state and the church were still further separated, and this was introduced into the Constitution: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Thus the Protestants apparently lost the state support, and were put on the same footing with the Catholics.

The growth of Catholicism in the United States for the last hundred years has been, indeed, alarming. In 1776 there were in this country about 25,000 Catholics all told, or one-one-hundred-and-twentieth part of all the inhabitants, and now there are over 7,000,000 of them, or one-seventh of the whole population. At the end of the last century the Catholics of the city of New York held their services in an old carpenter shop, and now they hav in that city the grandest and costliest cathedral on the American continent. They hav in the Union nearly 6,000 churches and over 2,500 chapels and mission houses. In 1776 there were 23 Catholic priests, and now there are 6,402 priests, 69 bishops, and one cardinal. Toward the end of the last century the property of the Catholic institutions was a mere nothing, and now it is believed to be worth $100,000,000. In the last century the Catholic priests could not appear among the Protestants without endangering their lives, so much did these children of "one God" love each other; but since 1829, when the first council of the Catholic clergy was held, they hav had such numerous and resplendent councils as hav rarely been seen in Europe. For instance, at the Plenary Council in Baltimore in 1866 there were present 7 archbishops, 37 bishops, 1 apostolic administrator, 2 abbots, 22 general vicars, 19 priors of different monkish orders, 31 functionaries, 7 rectors of theological seminaries, and 93 other theologians. To collect $26,000 as Peter's pence, as was done in 1849, has become a trifling matter for the Catholics of the Union. The Catholic financiers nowadays deal with millions of dollars, as the notorious example of Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, who swindled hundreds of his confiding dupes out of all they had, proves. The servant girls, hod-carriers, street sweepers, and other adherents of the church support in this country over 3,000 Catholic monks and over 15,000 nuns, who are zealous, able, and highly educated emissaries. They constitute a powerful religious corps, moved by the autocratic hand of the pope. No other church in the United States can conduct missionary work on such a grand scale as the Catholic church. Furthermore, the Catholics have 107 male colleges, with over 20,000 pupils belonging to different religious denominations, and their profits from this source amount to millions of dollars. They hav 511 female academies, where girls of all beliefs are admitted, bringing them in annually about $10,000,000. Besides money, these schools bring them converts. It is believed that of every ten non-Catholic pupils who attend the Catholic schools, seven are converted to Catholicism. Besides these schools, they hav protectories and reformatories, to whose care are consigned all the vagrant children they can get, for whose support the state pays. These children are run through the religious mill and come out strong Catholics. Thus the state is made to pay for converting secular scapegraces into religious rascals. There are in the United States 267 Catholic asylums and 119 Catholic hospitals supported by the people. The Union is dotted with Catholic convents belonging to 71 orders. The Catholic monks and nuns everywhere giv benediction with one hand and with the other draw dollars "for the great glory of God." There are over 10,000 Catholic churches, schools, and other institutions where the agents of the pope daily teach that the church's authority is from God and the government is from men, and true Catholics must obey God rather than man. In Rome, even now, the priests call America the "continent of Mary."

It is sure that what the church has been she will continue to be. She pretends that she has found the whole truth, that she is infallible, that whatever she has done or may do is and will be right. What she did in France and Portugal, Spain and Italy, she will do in the United States if she gets the opportunity. Many believe that the next war in this country will be between Rome and Reason, two forces with nothing in common, and between which there can never be anything but hostility. In the struggle the Protestant church will be swallowed up. The lovers of rituals and long-gowned mummery will go back to the arms of their harlot mother, and the rest will be forced into the ranks of the great army of progression, the Freethinkers. There can be no half-way ground, no neutral territory. Those that dare not come out for Liberty will be counted against her, while those who manfully battle for the right will wear the crown. The cardinal principles of Catholicism do and always will come in conflict with the institutions of a free republican government. A man cannot serve two masters without betraying the interests of one. The Catholics constitute a state within a state, for the orders of their master at Rome are more binding than the laws of any country; and when they serve a master as cruel and unscrupulous as the Romish church, they cannot but be a force dangerous to the welfare of any country. The remedy is in free schools and free thought, and in taking away from institutions conducted in the interests of any religion every penny of state aid, and in taxing the millions of property they hav accumulated in so shameful a manner. But it will hav to be done while they are still in a minority, or the very freedom of our institutions will prove their ruin. And the work will hav to be done by Freethinkers, for the Protestant churches stand side by side with the Catholic at the public crib and steal dollar for dollar with her. Their yoke is as heavy as hers to bear, and their dominion, if not as debasing, is as odious and tyrannical. They force their filthy Bible into our schools, and flaunt their rottenness still more boldly. The two churches are both as bad as bad can be, and the only useful way they can serve mankind is by doing as did the fabled Kilkenny cats—eat each other up and leave nothing but a tale behind.

One Liberal State.

E. Campfield, of Wetmore, Kan., writes to a Boston paper in answer to a query regarding the right of Atheists to testify in the different states, that in Kansas Atheists are qualified to testify by Sec. 7 of the Bill of Rights, as enumerated in our Constitution. It reads as follows: "SEC. 7. The right to worship God, according to the dictates of conscience, shall never be infringed; nor shall any person be compelled to attend or support any form of worship; nor shall any control of, or interference with, the rights of conscience be permitted, nor any preference be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship. No religious test or property qualification shall be required for any office of public trust, nor for any vote at any election, nor shall any person be incompetent to testify on account of religious belief." The statute respecting oaths, Sec. 3, reads, "Any person having conscientious scruples against taking an oath may affirm with like effect." Sec. 4 reads, "Affirmation shall commence and conclude as follows: You do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm, etc., and this you do under the pains and penalties of perjury."

The Devil as the Tempter.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you be kind enough to giv through THE TRUTH SEEKER the number of passages in the Bible where God is said to hav sent the devil to tempt mankind? P. H. B

The devil derives his title and reputation as a tempter of men from several passages. He is called the tempter in Matthew iv, 3. He is said to be as a roaring lion in 1 Peter v, 8. Matthew (iv, 1) records how Jesus was led up into a high mountain to be tempted. The first two chapters of Job show how God made a bargain with the devil (under the name of Satan) to tempt Job, and endeavor to get him to curse God. Luke iv, 2, says Jesus was "forty days tempted of the devil." All these things were done by God's command. Further information about his devilish majesty can be obtained by consulting the New Testament, especially the four gospels.

ERIE, Feb. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: A man says he heard Prof. Agassiz say that geology and the Bible substantially agreed, or that the Bible is proved to be true by geology. Is this correct? Can you quote what he did say? Many friends are interested in the truth on this subject. Very truly, C. L. HAWES.

Mr. Hawes's Christian man has made an assertion, and he should prove it. We do not know where to find Prof. Agassiz's language, and it makes no difference whether he said so or not. Geology and the Bible do not agree, and if the Christian takes issue with us we will prove it.

Chapter and Verse.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of Feb. 18, 1882, page 107, and No. 834 of "What I Don't Believe," Mr. Bennett quotes: "Those mine enemies that would not that I should not reign over them bring them hither and slay them before me;" and in No. 338 of the same, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." Please giv me the chapter and verse. Respectfully, E. CHOPE.

The charitable command first quoted will be found in Luke xix, 27. The second kindly sentiment is recorded in Mark xvi, 16.

Heredity.

Interest in this subject increases. The second parlor meeting of the New York branch of the Institute of Heredity was held at 120 Lexington ave. on the evening of the 23d. The parlors were so crowded that there was not an inch of standing room. Mr. S. P. Putnam presided. Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., read an interesting letter from Mr. Loring Moody, going to show that people everywhere are waking up to the importance of the subject. Dr. Foote, Sr., called attention to an address before the Liberal Club at Chicago, by A. J. Grover, on "Heredity, or the Gospel of a New Salvation." Extracts from the address were read by the secretary. Then came addresses by Dr. Sara B. Chase and Dr. Reuben Garter, followed by a lively discussion by many present upon some of the positions taken by the two speakers named. Everybody seemed to enjoy the meeting and exchanged congratulations at the close, much as the good sisters and brothers used to do after a revival meeting some twenty or twenty-five years ago, showing that there are some subjects besides those of a theological character which can cause an "awakening." The third meeting will be held at the same place on the third Thursday evening in March.

MR. BENNETT lingered in Bombay rather longer than he intended, making short excursions out into the country to visit notable points and objects of interest. But he hoped to get through India so as to leave Calcutta on Feb. 12th for Ceylon, where he was to stop two weeks, and then proceed to Singapore, Hong Kong, Canton, and thence to Yokahama, Japan. He reports that his health is splendid, not having had the slightest indisposition while in India, although the heat in the middle of the day is terribly oppressiv.

Owing to the storms on the Atlantic, the plates we ordered from England for the first volume of travels hav been delayed, and a couple of weeks more can be allowed for those who wish to hav their names appear in the first of the three volumes. The book is printed, with the exception of the pictures and names, and pending the arrival of the former we shall be pleased to add many more of the latter. Five dollars secures the three volumes postpaid to any address.

WE are glad to see that the Freethought regents of the Nebraska University do not propose to tamely submit to be bullied by their Christian fellow-regents, who clearly acted without authority of law in forcing them out of the board. It is provided by the state that no professor of the institution shall be discharged without a fair hearing and proof against him of incompetency or misconduct. It is known that the orthodox element has been scheming some time to get entire control of the university; and there are a great many Liberals in the state, including men of position and influence, who will sustain the dismissed professors in a suit to test the legality of the board's action in the courts of the state.

THE Banner of Light says its files were purchased by an agent of the late czar of Russia for his august master, and evidently thinks the Russian autocrat was a Spiritualist. We hope not, for we are slow to think any Spiritualist could be such an infernally cruel tyrant as was the late ruler of Russia. It would hav been better for him to hav thought less of the next world and paid a good deal more attention to the welfare of his unfortunate subjects in this.

A. B. MEACHAM, editor of the Council Fire, died last week. He was a stanch friend of "Lo, the poor Indian," and that much-abused race will sadly miss his labors in their behalf. The Council Fire will be continued under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. Bland.

MARRIAGE AND PARENTAGE, and the Sanitary and Physiological Laws for the Production of Children of Finer Health and Greater Ability. By a physician and sanitarian. Price, $1.50. For sale at this office.

This book is an attempt to show the world how to improve upon the present race. It seems to the author that the race might be greatly improved by wiser and more sanitary marriages, and by more physiological parentage. If the average standard ability of the race, he says, were raised one degree during each century, the results could hardly be estimated. We should in a comparativly short time get rid of our thieves, our drunkards, the licentious, the feeble and insane, and we should hav so many more able men and women than now—far abler than any the world has yet produced—that life, with all its drawbacks, would still be grander and better. To do this, men and women must marry more scientifically, and not rush into the connubial state upon the impulses and passions of youth. Man, being the highest of animals, should certainly take as much pains to perfect his species as he does to develop the best qualities in the lower brute world. The aim of the author is the same as that of the Institute of Heredity, and while they are discussing the desirableness and practicability of the thing he has gone laboriously to work and pointed out how it may be done. It is a book that should be read by all married people and those contemplating marriage.

PREVENTION OF CRIME, INSANITY, IDIOCY, DRUNKENNESS, PAUPERISM, AND DISEASE. By M. E. Billings, Waverly, Iowa. Price, 10 cents.

This pamphlet is rather a treatis on the desirability of preventing crime than an extended pointing out how it may be done. Some of the more prominent causes of wretchedness are shown, among which Christianity stands foremost. "Wherever," says Mr. Billings, "Christianity has been the ruling religion, there pauperism, debauchery, and crime hav been fostered, and in juxtaposition and ratio. In Italy, the home of Christian superstition, paupers abound on every hand and crime is equally prevalent. Convinced that the bankrupt court of divine atonement has provided them a scapegoat to rid them of the consequences of crime, they hav become the moat devout of Christians and the most hardened of criminals. A most natural result of such a doctrin. So, too, with pauperism. More than one half of the population are mendicants of some sort; either priestly drones, convent or monastery beggars, or lazzaroni, brigands, beggars, and sneak thieves." He also finds ill-considered wedlock a prolific source of idiocy and disease, and the propagation of their species by adult criminals one of the main causes of crime. By better regulated marriages and the enforcement by the state of celibacy among criminals he would deprive these two causes of their power. He further summarizes his remedy under eleven heads, which are all good and would undoubtedly tend to make the world better. His little book should be circulated widely, especially among the orthodox Christians.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I clip from the Washington Republican of Feb. 21, 1882, the following:

"A bill of divorce has been filed by Nettie Cheeks against Peter C. Cheeks. They were married in Baltimore in 1879. The charges alleged are cruelty and non-support."

The Post of the same date givs the charges in detail. In 1877 the revivalist Hammond was in Washington, and Mr. Cheeks was numbered among his converts. In 1881 the revivalist made the following statement in Toronto:

"While in Washington he extended an invitation to the president of the Infidel association there. The invitation had been accepted, and the result was that the Washington association had been broken up, the secretary being now engaged in Christian work. The name of that secretary was P. C. Cheeks, and he hoped if there was an Infidel present who doubted what he said, that he would write to Washington and inquire for himself if what he said was true."

At the request of Mr. Allen Pringle, of Selby, Ont., I ascertained the facts of the case, and published them in THE TRUTH SEEKER, April 23, 1881. The "Infidel association" was a "Philosophical Club," whose president, then a government clerk, had been a preacher, and, while president of the club, received a call to preach again, which he afterward accepted. Mr. Cheeks was not secretary of the club, but he took part occasionally in the Sunday discussions. The club was not broken up by Hammond, nor was its attendance diminished. A committee of the club waited on Hammond in regard to a discussion, but failed to get the preacher to agree on any terms. Mr. Cheeks was educated for the priesthood, but had long since renounced Catholicism and become a Methodist preacher. But in 1872 or 1873 he became a skeptic, and so continued until he got reconverted in 1877, under Hammond. Soon after that he got a government office. In February, 1879, he married a second time. In October following his wife left him for alleged cruelty, but afterward returned and forgave him; but in September, 1881, she was compelled to leave him finally.

Only a day or two before the public announcement of the application for a divorce, Mr. Cheeks came to my house and tried to sell me a book, which he said demolished Darwinism. During our brief conversation he had the effrontery to assert—1. That Thomas Paine was an Atheist; 2. That when he wrote the first part of his "Age of Reason" he had not read the Bible; 3. That Colonel Ingersoll had not read the Bible until he began to prepare his lecture on the "Mistakes of Moses."

Mrs. Cheeks says she was compelled to leave her husband soon after their marriage on account of his threats and abusive language toward her, but returned when he promised to do better. Again, Oct. 2, 1879, she left him because he struck her, but when he got sick she returned and forgave him. At last, Sept. 30, 1881, when he kicked her, she left him, and now sues for a divorce.

Vaccination a Humbug.

The extravagant claims set up on behalf of vaccination hav their parallel in the case of inoculation a century ago. In the first thirty years of the eighteenth century, before inoculation was at all general, seventy-four deaths in every thousand were from smallpox; but during the last thirty years of that century, when inoculation was general, the mortality had increased to ninety-five in one thousand. The disease reached its acme about 1780, and then for fifteen years grew slowly milder. Edward Jenner in 1796 made a pretentious discovery, which, I venture to say, is an unmitigated evil. Already the disease had grown milder, and by the year 1809 had nearly disappeared. But inoculation had been abandoned as a frightful curse, and another worse humbug had begun to usurp its place. I say humbug, and I will now prove it. Up to the year 1808 only about 160,000 individuals were vaccinated in England; and yet the subsidence of smallpox was ascribed to Dr. Jenner's discovery, and he received a reward from Parliament in 1802 of £10,000, and in 1807 of £20,000. If the vaccination of one person out of one hundred and twenty-five (it was a much smaller proportion in 1802) produced the miraculous effects commonly pretended, why does the disease exist at all, now that compulsory vaccination prevails in England? Vaccination was made compulsory in Great Britain in 1853, again in 1867, and still more stringent in 1871. Now let us see the results: Since the first year named England has been visited with three epidemics of smallpox, each more severe than the preceding, as appears from the following statistics:

	DEATHS.
Epidemic of 1857, '58, '59	14,240
" " 1863, '64, '65	20,059
" " 1870, '71, '72	44,840

The increase of population from the first to the second epidemic was seven per cent; increase of smallpox mortality in the same period nearly fifty per cent; increase of population from the second to the third period, ten per cent; increase of smallpox mortality in the same period, one hundred and twenty per cent. The foregoing figures are from the "Vital Statistics" authorized by Parliament. Take now the results of the first and second decades of enforced vaccination:

Deaths from smallpox, 1854–'63	33,515
" " " 1864–'73	70,458

And yet people uninformed of such facts as these are clamoring for compulsory vaccination in this country. SENEX.

More Reason and Less Law.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It seems that every sect or combination who gain position and power at the head of government attempt to hedge themselvs in by some form of law. The church, which had the first dip, is pretty well fortified, and among the most objectionable of its institutions, to my mind, are a Sabbath, so-called by law; the no-tax law, the liquor law, and many other laws enforcing certain claims. Of late days we hav our railroad combinations, our telegraph combinations, our manufactory combinations, our stockmen's associations, and every other kind of a combination hedged in with laws of all shades. And I often wonder, if Liberals should happen to get into power once, would they be an exception. But of one thing I am certain, the inhabitant of this globe is well surrounded with laws. What a climax! the wisdom of a great nation sent to the seat of government to frame a code of complicated laws which keep the average American about half the time studying to evade them. Which is the greater genius, he that makes it, or he that breaks it? is an interesting question.

But here is what I am driving at: "Liberta" says, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 18th, "With eager hands and hearts the apostles of liberty, guided by science, reason, and love, rallying to her rescue and driving this foul demon from our glorious country, will, by legal enactments and constitutional amendments, giv him notice never again to return."

Now, Mr. TRUTH SEEKER, I hav just got out of the old Christian groove, and if I fall into another right away I shall certainly be fossilized, and I wish to hav a few free breaths before I die; nor will I be as easily led as I hav been. I will fight for every inch of ground, now that I hav a foothold.

I am not sure that man has a right to say that I shall rest upon the 26th of February, or any other Sunday. I am not sure that man has the right to say that I shall not drink this or that.

But, it is enough to make one sick to hear of a Liberal proposing to advance some good scheme by the old mode—Law. If the American people must be controled as slaves, then wo unto America! If Liberals seek to advance their cause by law, then wo unto Freedom! And if Reason should attempt to advance her views by law, then damn Reason!

Liberty, Science, Reason, and Love will never consent to such a farce as this—never; but give us laws shadowed by the principles of equity, then science, reason, and love will do the rest. We may boast of the purity of our laws, and of our government, but the feeling of security in the western wilds, without the bane of what is called "a neighborhood law," would make the Goddess of Justice hang her head with shame in the gilded halls of our capitols.

I am only a "cowboy," but feel that I can be taught easier by reason than by force. It is not just to raise the star of hope, and then hide its light under some ill-shaped law. Let Reason prune the laws of this country, as well as those of the Promised Land, and we will get there sooner. A COWBOY.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

THE RELIGIOUS VALUE OF THE INFINITE.

It is quite clear that this scientific and modern conception of the Infinite as the Unknowable practically destroys its religious value. An unknowable God can be neither the solution of the world nor the guide of life.

That the attempts to entertain this conception inevitably lead to the feelings of wonder, fear, awe, and reverence may be true. These feelings may have been connected with old conceptions of God, but they were only the emotional curtains of the Infinite One; they were not the Judge that governed or punished, nor the God that was loved and worshiped.

Mr. Herbert Spencer seems to hold the opposite view, to wit, that the God of the future will be the same as the God of the past, only more "spiritually" or ideally conceived. There is great truth in view as to the feelings. But intellectually and practically this conclusion must be greatly modified. This will become apparent from a short notice of the history of the reception of the new view.

The conclusion compelled by science, that the Infinite is knowable only as Infinite, and is otherwise entirely beyond tbe reach of the human faculties, was received with hostility by all Theologians as soon as it was announced by Hume and confirmed by Kant and Sir Wm. Hamilton. They have followed the only two courses left open to them.

The first course was to deny the fact, as has been stoutly done by Calderwood and McCosh.

The second course was to admit the fact, but then to proceed just as if it did not exist.

This last was the course of Sir Wm. Hamilton himself and his principal disciple and editor, the learned Dean Mansel, the well-known author of the "Limits of Religious Thought," a work deserving of attention. To overwhelm both it is only necessary to let loose one of these schools of Theologians upon the other.

For instance, Dean Mansel justifies his position as to the "Limits of Religious Thought" by these words taken from his "Lectures upon Kant," in which he disposes of the school of Theologians of which Dr. Calderwood and Dr. McCosh are leading exponents.

In the language of these disputants the Infinite appears as the Absolute, the Unconditioned, the Unrelated, or the Uncognoscible. These terms represent the different aspects of the mind in regard to the Infinite.

The Dean says (we quote from his "Lectures on Kant," p. 38):

"Mr. Calderwood defines the Absolute, which he rightly identifies with the Infinite, as that which is free from all necessary relation. It may exist in relation, provided that relation be not a necessary condition of its existence. Hence he holds that the Absolute may exist in the relation of consciousness, and in that relation be apprehended, though imperfectly, by man. On this theory we have two Absolutes, the Absolute as it exists out of consciousness, and the Absolute as it is known in consciousness. Mr. Calderwood rests his theory on the assumption that these two are one. How is this identity to be ascertained? How do I know that the absolute is my absolute? I cannot compare them, for comparison is a relation, and the first Absolute exists out of relation. Again, to compare them, I must be in and out of consciousness at the same time; for the first Absolute is never in consciousness, and the second is never out of it. Again, the Absolute as known is an object of consciousness; and an object of consciousness as such cannot exist, save in relation. But the true Absolute, by its definition, can exist only out of relation; therefore the Absolute, as known, is not the true Absolute. Mr. Calderwood's Absolute in consciousness is only the Relative under a false name."

The conclusions of the learned Dean have been carried toward if not to their legitimate results by Herbert Spencer in his introduction to his "First Principles," and Prof. Fiske in his chapter on Anthropomorphic Theism, and with these results Profs. Huxley and Tyndall; and the Liberal scientists generally seem to be in substantial agreement. It is the final divorce of Personality from Infinity.

The other school of Theologians, above referred to as that of Doctors Calderwood and McCosh, dissent from the foregoing in premise and conclusion. They plainly see that the course taken by Sir William and the learned Dean will not do, for it "limits religious thought" to nothing intelligible if it is to have the Infinite as its basis. The inconceivable, unrelated, unknowable, absolute Infinite is an intellectual negative impossible to think of or to get around, so as to tie to, and therefore it is practically useless except as the thinking about it may be the source of indefinable and unspeakable emotions.

Such a conception of the Infinite is not God nor religion, and never has been, nor can be. As our practical Theologians well say, those who pretend otherwise are like the mower who should go out to mow, and after cutting his own legs off at the first stroke of his scythe, should boast of it as the beginning of his work.

This criticism seems to be invincible. The Theologians began with a Fetichism that ascribed will and intelligence to finite objects, as in the case of the Indian's Tree. It was always a personal will and intelligence incorporated in a definite object, or conceived of as a definite "spirit," which was the source of religion, because it was the God by which the relations and the fate of the worshiper were determined or influenced. It was only as the God was knowable that he was worshipable. There is no use in worshiping an unknowable God—and no savage was ever knowingly guilty of such fruitless nonsense. The general empirical progress of true science pressed this habit of attributing personal will out to more remote objects, finally to the gradually acquired personal conception of the Infinite.

In this way prior to the new system of Astronomy there was quite a rational adjustment of the matter. The universe rotated around the Earth as its center in twelve heavens or spheres, and beyond these there lay the infinite space. In this empyrean space dwelt the Great Spirit, with his spiritual throne and world—he the creator and ruler of all other spirits and worlds. This was then satisfactory to the reason and highly religious. It determined the relations of man to the world, and his duties in it to his fellows and to his God. It accounted for Man and his World by referring them both to a common Author, who made and controlled both for his glory.

The New Astronomy has rendered this conception impossible. The Empyrean has vanished, with its revolving universe, into the Infinite. The idea of creation, or annihilation, has become unthinkable under Chemistry. Biology has shown the phenomena of wise intelligence and personality to be known only as the results of organic life, and has remanded the idea of Spirits to the realm of imagination—the limbo of vanity. There is no conceivable place, nor way, nor time left, when, or how, or where a creator, prior to the Infinite, could have created it. But before the new Astronomy and its resultant sciences that relation was quite consistent.

The practical anthropomorphic Theologians, being deeply conscious of the necessity of a human God in order to sustain their Theology, ignore the difficulties referred to, and proceed just as if they did not exist. They summon "belief," or "hope," or "faith," or "intuition," and thereby pretend to have a conviction of a personal God, entirely independent of any relation that could come within the scope of the scientific method.

The unanthropomorphic Theologians, to use a contradictory term, reply that belief, hope, faith, and even intuition, can only be possible as to knowable relations, and that all of our supposed knowledge of the Infinite is but the ascription to it of relations we have from the Finite, and which are certainly wholly false when considered as being in any way relation of or to the Infinite.

Thus since the time of Kant the more intelligent and earnest Theologians have demolished each other. The blissful ignorance of the rest have enabled them to pursue their devotions and the care of their flocks without any disturbance; that is to say, they have no realizing knowledge of what has happened.

It appears from what has been said that the breach between these two schools is irreparable, and yet that both are partly right, the first laying stress upon the Scientific position, and the other insisting upon man's religious needs, without regard to the possibility of supplying them within the possible or scientific conceptions of the Infinite. It should be frankly confessed that man's religious wants can no longer be supplied from this anthropomorphic conception of the Infinite. All attempts to render the Infinite to human consciousness as personal, or as otherwise than Infinite, are denials of it, and therefore false and immoral. We may, indeed, make symbols of what we do or can know, and they may express to us, to some extent, an approximate or an ideal truth. But all symbols of the Infinite are wholly false, and just as much idols as though figured and worshiped in forms of wood and stone.

"To believe God to be as one can think him to be, is the highest blasphemy;" or, to repeat Faust's words,

> "Feeling is all,
> Name is but mist and smoke
> Clouding o'er the Heaven's glow."

The Infinite is a plenum to the feelings only; as soon as the intellect tries to touch it—it is gone. To the hand of practice and of life it is no longer there!

THE subjoined answers to a Christian correspondent by the Secular Review will be of interest to the Freethinkers on this side of the water as showing that the English Secularists agree substantially with us: "1. What are the points of agreement among Secularists? 2. What advantage has Secularism over Christianity? To the first question we reply that all Secularists are agreed that man's supreme attention should be given to the duties of this life; that improvement is to be sought by human means alone; that science is more trustworthy than faith in the alleged supernatural; that reason is a surer guide than revelation; that the variety of systems called Christianity are the productions of the human mind; that punishment in another world for the rejection of any faith in this would be unjust and useless; and that honest disbelief should not incur the displeasure of any God. To the second inquiry our reply is: The right to reject, without peril or condemnation, whatever appears to us to be erroneous in any or all religions; the full liberty to regard Christianity as merely the outgrowth of the human mind; the advantage of accepting the Bible as nothing more than a human production; the absence of any fear of being punished 'hereafter' for this legitimate exercise of reason in its true sphere of absolute Freethought; and that all persons are not compelled to believe in the perfection of one person, through whom alone redemption can be obtained."

Straws for Theology.

"Help me, Cassius, or I sink."

What a voracity the followers of Christianity display for recantation! With a wolverine avidity they seize upon the smallest manifestation in that direction as a coveted victory to be heralded with all possible haste to a hungering world. Let any one, through the weakness of lingering disease, or imbecility of advanced years, succumb in the slightest degree to the vehement protestations and persistent pleadings of these importunate soul-savers, and against the case gets through the chicanery of exaggeration, perversion, and misrepresentation, it has become a well-prepared addition to the dearly-prized list of recantations. Nor do these eager watchers always wait for even a feeble admission of former error. Many Infidels die fully convinced of the integrity of their opinions, rejecting with undisguised scorn and disgust the pious proffers of these officious meddlers, when no sooner are their bodies deposited in the grave, precluding all possibility of confuting what they would consider gross imputations, than whisperings of repentance, conversion, and fabrications of a similar character become audible. But suppose these triumphantly claimed recantations were really such, what in substance do they amount to? If a truth is told to-day and pronounced false to-morrow, this neither invalidates the one nor substantiates the other; the falsehood will remain false just the same, and the principle of truth will not be altered one particle. It is not simply the assertion, but conclusiv evidence, that makes the garden of paradise a ridiculous fable, nor would the acquiescence of every Freethinker of the present day convert it into a verity. Mere words have never yet made fact out of fiction, nor turned water into wine. Had Mr. Frothingham refrained from his recent concessions the pulpit would as carefully hav refrained from designating him. He would only hav been known to religious auditories through the disseminations of slander and the casual allusions of abuse. Now, since he has tacitly avowed a waning respect for his grandest and most truthful utterances, his avowal is blazoned forth as an additional trophy for exultation. But there is really no cause for perturbance in the ranks of Liberalism. To them belong the fruits of his strong reason and his healthful mental activity. The emanations of lucidity are greatly to be preferred to the vagaries of expiring intelligence; and church institutions all betray unmistakable marks of decline. The great consequence attached to recantation by the church but too clearly evinces to what extremities it is driven. Inspiration and the efficacy of prayer—two of its strongest points—are doomed to the wall, despite the ingenious subterfuges of the defense. Recantation, or, in other words, an exchange of strength for weakness, is a dernier resort, to say the most of it; and when closely examined is found to be little else than a gloomy commentary upon ministerial veracity.

VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

Concord, Ky., Jan. 10, 1882.

THE following story is told by S. P. Heineken in the Franklin, Ind., Jeffersonian: "A few days ago I received a visit from a friend of mine in Wisconsin. He is well acquainted with Robert Ingersoll, and has often been at his house; and he related to me the following little anecdote concerning him (which transpired only a few weeks ago), which may be interesting to many of your readers: 'Bob' took it into his head to pay a visit to Henry Slade, the celebrated slate-writing medium, and who, my friend says, is the handsomest man he ever saw, full of energy and magnetic power. Ingersoll purchased a double slate, and tying it together, proceeded to Mr. Slade's residence, who, being acquainted with him, asked him if he wished to get a communication. 'That is what I came for,' said Bob, placing the slate on the table and covering it with his arms to prevent Mr. Slade from touching it. 'Mr. Ingersoll,' said Slade, 'you do not believe in a future state; how can you expect to have a message sent you from that world?' 'Never mind,' said Bob, 'I want to test your skill in this matter, and if you are successful, I may perhaps change my opinion.' They then sat down, one at each end of a long dining-table.

Presently Mr. Ingersoll placed his ear to the slate and said he heard some scratching going on, and in a few moments Slade told him to open the slate. He did so, and, to his astonishment, found the two inside leaves of the slate covered with writing. 'Good heavens!' he exclaimed, 'this is my brother's writing, and signed by him. Where did it come from? Who wrote it?' 'That,' replied Mr. Slade, 'you are best able to decide. No one has touched the slate but yourself.' 'Mr. Slade,' he said, 'I am exceedingly obliged to you for this beautiful test; there is much room for thought here.' And, taking up the slate, he wished him good-morning."

Ingersoll to Talmage.

[John L. Ingersoll, a brother of the colonel, has addressed to Talmage the following open letter, which was published in the Chicago Times:]

REV. T. D. TALMAGE, D.D., Sir: I hav before me a copy of the Cincinnati Enquirer containing the report of a sermon delivered by you on the 5th inst. upon the "Meanness of Infidelity." In the course of your remarks you say you had just received a letter from some one, informing you that the Rev. John Ingersoll, father of R. G. Ingersoll and myself, "was abstemious to a fault, and the family suffered accordingly. The children were commanded to eat, drink, and dress sparingly. He never spoke a kind word of his wife, who was a noble Christian woman, nor of his children, within the knowledge of persons now living here, who were familiar with the family. At last the mother died. She was cared for by friends in her sickness, and on the day of her interment gentle hands carried her form, and rested it for a time on the catafalque. Mr. Ingersoll, to the astonishment of all present, deliberately removed his cravat and gloves, stepped on the rostrum, and delivered a eulogy over the body. He attempted to extol her virtues and panegyrize her conduct. It was the first time he had ever been known to speak well of her in public."

Now, reverend sir, will you be kind enough to tell your informant, for me, that he or she is a malignantly cruel, heartless, and infamous liar? Our father was poor; I will not deny it. In the days of my childhood a minister was forced to practice strict economy to support a family and educate his children upon a salary of $500 per year. We had abundance to eat and were well clothed, and certainly no man ever better enjoyed ministering to the wants of his family than did our loved and honored father. I believe him to hav been an eminently good and conscientious man—I do not say faultless. As for Robert, I will say he was as good and obedient a boy as I ever knew; but all this is neither here nor there He denies that the Bible is the inspired word of God, and givs his reasons. Here you take issue with him. Now, is it not possible to successfully combat his errors without opening the tomb and spattering with calumny our loved and honored dead? Speaking of your father and mother you say: "Would it not hav been debasing in me to hook the horses to the plowshare of contempt to turn up the mound of their graves?" True. Now let me ask you if you don't think that the Golden Rule requires you to unhook your horses before you ruthlessly turn up the sacred dust that hides from the light of day our father's snow-white hair. But "Ingersoll assails the belief of his father." Well, sir, had your father been an Infidel, would you now, entertaining the views you do, combat his opinions? That would probably be a very different thing. Ingersoll says he can not believe that God, the father of us all, ever commanded the Jews to wage wars of extermination against their neighbors, and was delighted at the sight of a babe's blood trickling down the handle of a Jewish spear. Moses said that when a woman gave birth to a son, thirty-three days were necessary to purify her; but if she gave birth to a daughter, sixty-six days were necessary. Ingersoll says that looks to him like nonsense, and he really cannot believe that God ever ordered any such thing. He says he cannot believe that God, who winked at polygamy and established slavery, ever ordered a man to be pounded to death with stones simply for picking up sticks on the Sabbath day. He says he cannot believe that God ever gave express permission to one part of his family to sell diseased meat to the other.

When David says of somebody, "Let there be none to extend mercy unto him, neither let there be any to favor his fatherless children," he says it is impossible for him to believe that either the words or thought was inspired by the good God. Now if you will draw your theologic belt one hole tighter, and answer these things, you will do everybody a favor. You ask Ingersoll to retire to his chamber, lock his door, and read the fourteenth chapter of John. It is good reading. Let me ask you to read the fifteenth Psalm: "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill? He that backbiteth not with his tongue nor doeth evil to his neighbor, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbor." With all due respect, I am Yours,

JOHN L. INGERSOLL.

Bigotry in Russia and Hypocrisy in England.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Much commiseration is being expressed for the persecuted Jews in Russia, and large meetings are being held in London and other cities for the purpose of collecting considerable sums of money to send to the sufferers. Dignitaries of the churches of Rome and England meet with Dissenters on the platform to condemn the action of the Russian government in the matter, and are unanimous in condemning persecution in the territories of the czar, yet at the very same time they are doing all they can to crush Freethought and Freethinkers, sinking their own differences to form a combination to destroy their opponents. Of a verity, they see clearly enough the mote in the eyes of others, but fail to see the beam in their own. Hypocrits, indeed! They clearly want to have the monopoly and sole power of persecuting those they deem their enemies. With the Romish church and Protestants it was always the same. In past times, whenever they had the power, they would burn, torture, and destroy those they chose to call heretics. The Jews had short shrift at the hands of God's vicegerents in the middle ages, and are very properly shocked that the Greek church should take a lesson from their book.

It is not for the love the Christians bear toward the Jews that they make this stir, but that it now answers their purpose to pose as the friends of oppressed humanity, it answers as a big advertisment. As usual, they misrepresent facts. The attacks on these Jews are not of a religious but a social nature. The truth seems to be that an exasperated peasantry, roused by their poverty and wretchedness, caused by bad harvests and excessiv taxation, which they might hav managed somehow to hav struggled through, hav been utterly ruined by the excessiv usury of the Hebrew money-lenders, who may be found in all the large villages, and in the madness of despair hav revenged themselvs on those they consider hav been the finishers, if not the authors, of their misery.

From the time of Abraham to the present day the Jews hav always made it their business to despoil all the nations with whom they hav been brought into contact, and whenever an onslaught has been made upon them the cause has been the same, although the clergy hav always been willing to help in the work, and turn it into a religious question.

A young man was recently brought before the magistrate in London for creating a disturbance by preaching from the steps of St. Paul's cathedral and other public buildings, foretelling the destruction of the modern Babylon, unless its inhabitants speedily repented of their sins. Not so well off as Jonah when he held forth to the Ninevites, who were represented as heathen, this modern prophet had the misfortune to express a desire to convert people so righteous that they needed no repentance. Consequently he was accounted as one mad, and consigned to safe keeping. The inconsistency of the godly is here well exemplified. Who could say that this man had not as much authority for his denunciation as Jesus or Paul? Yet they place him in an asylum, and go on denouncing the Romans, Greeks, and Jews of the past and Atheists of the present time, for not believing in the divine inspiration of those they are pleased to consider possessed it.

That those calling themselvs Christians, sharp enough in other matters, can believe all they profess, cannot be for a moment credited, though there are some simple-minded people who can swallow anything; but, with the majority, it is found to be a good paying game, and would, no doubt, be thrown overboard if it were not so.

Let us, each and all, do what we can to uproot the fatal upas-tree of superstition, whose branches hav cast so deadly a gloom over the human family for so many centuries, and when men's minds are free and unfettered we may look forward to a far brighter millennium than ever dreamt of by Christian.

Yours faithfully, J. S. D.

The Movement in Favor of Ignorance.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I wish to add my affidavit to the excellent article, "The Movement in Favor of Ignorance," by C. L. James, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 28th, every word of which is more than true, if that were possible in this age of exaggeration and lies. We may be called "alarmists" by the more hopeful and enthusiastic, but, as Mr. James has indicated, nothing but the most vigilant watchfulness, persistent effort, and earnest protestation on the part of Freethinkers will prevent our religious liberties being wrested from us, and all the ground lost which has been so tardily and painfully gained. Must the bloody battle of the past be repeated, the dark ages throw another pall over the world, and superstition veil intelligence ere mankind will wake to effort, duty, progress, and reform? No; not if each Liberal will do his or her whole duty in this hour of peril and need. Never a better opportunity than to-day to stem back the tide of superstition and speak a word against a false theology, or to perform a deed which shall stab the monster in the heart. Science—invincible science—will perform the work, if we will use her piercing sword of defense and offense, and thrust through and through the flimsy assumptions of the church with her keen blade of truth. Strong minds, noble hearts, and willing hands are required for the task, unheeding alike popular opinion, selfish lucre, and church anathema. Where are the devoted many who will work as hav the loyal few hitherto done, for it is whole armies that are now needed to beat back the slanderous charges made, not only against our dead heroes but against our living warriors, by every third-rate lyceum lecturer or half-fledged preacher in the land. The ignorant who never read a Freethought article or heard a Liberal speech will clap, and half-asleep congregations will smile and nod assent to these foul-mouthed utterances from lecturer and priest, false as hades.

Some say this should not trouble us, that it produces no effect, that Freethought is bound to triumph, and we should not mind such trifles. We might be indifferent were these errors and calumnies met and answered before those who listen and read, but thousands never hear a refutation, never hear but one side; consequently, never hav an opportunity to judge; but swallow as truth the lecturers' and clergymen's assertions as if they were infallible. Only we ourselvs read our Freethought literature, and attend our Liberal gatherings, many of us not needing the lesson, while those who are perishing for lack of knowledge will not read our books, go to our meetings, or even remain in the room where these tabooed subjects are discussed or conversed upon.

What shall be done to remedy this? How can we circulate our books and papers, how induce the masses to attend our lectures, and thus fortify their minds against "the movement in favor of ignorance," and open the understanding to the reception of truth? Perhaps some astute philosopher of our school can devise measures, and some practical executiv can set the plan to work that shall overcome these obstructions and pour a flood of light into the benighted mind of many a dissatisfied one, hungering and thirsting for just what we hav to giv them. All that the multitude need is the opportunity, with the fear of heresy and ostracism removed, to come into our ranks by the thousands. Furnish them, then, with this bread of life, by distributing our tracts and papers, lending our books, urging them out to our lectures, engaging them in conversation, reasoning with them gently but firmly; thereby producing Freethought investigation, conviction, conversion, and such a recruiting from the ranks of the enemy as never known before, to the end of preventing the disasters we fear—God in the national Constitution, and the final triumph of the worst religion that ever cursed the earth. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Universalism—Universalist.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Andrews's idea on the use of these words I think correct. They hav been used limitedly by a few, and the adjectiv to quite an extent. Train gave it to the public in the phrase, "Evoluted to the universal." Mr. Andrews sees so many thus evoluted that full terms are demanded. Some scientists hav long called me a "universal reformer," seeing further than many who judge that external reform ends my list, instead of beginning it, and sustaining the whole circuit. Many will second the call for the use of these terms. But why not revendicate without bringing suit? Nor leaders nor followers took patents for sole rights; by the time the terms are known to mean the revising of all human wrongs, natural modifications will obviate confusion, and our taking as a right may be more acceptable than asking as a courtesy, sparing formal concurrences.

MARY E. TILLOTSON.

Vineland, N. J.

THE North American Review for March presents a striking array of articles, every one of which possesses the characteristic of contemporaneous interest. First we hav a contribution from Senator George F. Edmunds, on "The Conduct of the Guiteau Trial." Ex-Minister Edward F. Noyes communicates the results of his observations of political affairs in France under the title "The Progress of the French Republic." In "Trial by Jury," Judge Edward A. Thomas describes the social conditions under which our jury system had its origin, and notes its defects in view of the altered relations of modern life. Mr. John Fiske makes an able and ingenious analysis of that great intellectual movement, the Reformation, educing therefrom the "True Lesson of Protestantism." In "Law for the Indians," the Rev. William Justin Harsha endeavors to demonstrate that the one rational and effectual cure for our Indian troubles is to extend the jurisdiction of the civil and criminal courts over all the social relations of the red man. Prof. A. B. Palmer writes on the "Fallacies of Homeopathy." Finally, the Hon. Neal Dow contributes an article on the "Results of Prohibitory Legislation."

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $8.00—$3.00 for subscription, and $5.00 as additional propelling power to send the truth seeking editor around the world.

I hav been reading your paper for the last seven months, and am much pleased with it for the strength of its articles. But what a task to undertake to make rational and Liberal impressions on the great mass of religious bigotry in the world! Yet, to the labor of these Liberal and independent minds is to be attributed all the religious liberty we possess.

MELROSE, MON. TER., Feb. 12, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: J. S. Stone incloses $5.00 for the Round-the-World fund. Not truth seekers only are enamored with the letters from abroad, but all who read them, although they may not be in accord with the teachings of Liberalism. There is sufficient cause to rejoice and be glad of the victory of Liberalism over the persecutions and prosecutions of modern bigotry, intolerance, and fanaticism at present, so strikingly exemplified in our day in Mr. Bennett's case.

With continued good wishes for your prosperity, I am Very respectfully yours, WM. KINSELLA.

FARMINGDALE, ILL., Feb. 18, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $6—$3 to apply on my subscription for the present year from the 1st of January; the other $3 for a new subscriber. I think every subscriber ought to make an extra effort to get at least one new subscriber, for when Uncle Sam sent the editor on that mission to Albany they made an extra effort to obtain each one, and now that he is sent again on a different errand and by different people, we should not forget THE TRUTH SEEKER. I find a good plan is to take a copy containing one or two of his best letters, and loan it to some one that you might think would be apt to want the rest. And then again, Mr. Editor, don't let those fellows that come in for the book after the twelfth hour hav it without paying extra for it. They were too weak-kneed to risk their "V" on the result, but when the book is complete and the old scribe has returned peradventure many will want it.

The letters are good. Send them along. I anxiously wait every week, and the first thing is the Scribe's letters from abroad. ALEX. ROGERS.

MILLERSTOWN, PA., Feb. 15, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $10.00 from two novices. We hav only taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for one month, getting it through a newsdealer. H nce we may be considered excusable for not sending in our mite sooner.

If old Yahweh is willing to accept those who come at the eleventh hour, and pay them the same price that he givs those who hav labored through all the heat of the day, Liberals should not blame those who come on the last call, although it may be a late hour. The letters and Chronicles are what hav done the business, and we must hav the volumes. Of course there will be two or three. The more the better.

This is the first time that this place was ever disturbed by a ripple of Freethought. Having seen a copy of your paper a few months since, I had occasion to visit the city, and called at the office, but could see no one nor get any information; and, as an experiment, I had our news agent send for two copies, which we hav now had for three weeks. Look out for a good League in this benighted region soon. Hundreds are Liberals, but are afraid to avow themselvs, but do attend church and cast in their mite every time the plate passes lest they might fail to sell a pound of tea or a yard of print.
Yours for the truth, DR. T. W. HOPKINS.

SHAWANO, WIS., Feb. 7, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: For the inclosed ten dollars send one copy of the Round-the-World volumes to Mr. Hiram Westcott, and one to Charles J. Westcott, this post-office. The latter, when Mr. Bennett gets to the identical spot, would like him to procure and send one of those bulrushes that the adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter was hid beneath some years ago, when he was a small chap, and before the "mistakes of Moses" had begun to be so manifest as they are now. And if he should pass near where the Lord made a man lie on his left side three hundred and ninety days without a rest, as a means of salvation, it is suggested that he procure a piece of the bed, or one of the pillows he used, according to Ezekiel iv. But he is not recommended to partake too freely of the bread and butter mentioned in the same chapter, nor of the holy fodder prescribed in 2 Kings, xviii. He might not like it, although it is found described in the "inspired" and "infallible" holy Bible which good Christians want read to their little girls and boys in the schools, as a model book. In passing through the Holy Land Mr. Bennett should carefully inspect the food he eats, because the Lord told his chosen people not to eat stinking meat of animals that died of disease themselvs, but said they might sell it to aliens, and strangers, and Infidels, and such characters as Mr. Bennett, within their gates to eat. As the same God required that the choicest lambs, goats, and kids, "whose savory odors ascended to heaven," should be nicely roasted and placed upon the altars for his own eating. But if Mr. Bennett should happen to meet Ahaziah, son of Jehoram, a former ruler over Jerusalem, and who, according to the "inspired" and "infallible" record in 2 Chronicles and 2 Kings, was two years older than his father, he will please bring home a lock of his hair. And if Mr. Bennett should travel from Gilead to Mount Carmel, by the way of Bethel, and forty-two little children should begin to cod him and say' "Go up, thou bald-head; go up, old baldy," I beseech him not to follow Elijah's revengeful and pious example, and let loose two she-bears to tear the forty-two poor little children to pieces for so small an offense. If he does he may be served as Elijah was, and be jerked up into heaven by a whirlwind, and we should hav him no more forever to travel around the world and write such valuable and interesting letters to THE TRUTH SEEKER. If Elijah has got back Mr. Bennett might get—but, no! he could not get a lock of his hair, for he had none—but he might bring a piece of his scalp to present to Talmage, Dr. Crosby, and Comstock. After being cleansed with some of Colgate's soap, it would be held as a precious relic. I should not refer to this thing if I did not find them in the "infallible" record, and of course no one who ties to the record can object or complain at the rehearsing of inspired truths. W. S. WOOD.

WELLAND, CAN., Feb. 15, 1882.
FRIEND MACDONALD: Find post-office order for $8.45—$5 for D. M. Bennett's book of travel and $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER up to April, 1883, and 45 cents as interest.

This day I am seventy-six years of age, and feel like having arrived pretty near the bottom of the hill of life. I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER some years, and admire the principles which it advocates, and its honest, straightforward way of doing it. I am induced to write you at this time from the circumstance of my lot having been cast for a short time amongst those whose religious views were different from my own, and could not see how it was possible for any one to object to join in prayer to the throne of grace, which suggested to me the following: Can the Jew or Mohammedan conform to the religious ceremonies of the Christian, or can the Christian conform to the ceremonial worship of the Jew or Mohammedan, without doing violence to his own conscience, or acting with some measure of deceit or hypocrisy? Yet they are each and all of them just what they are by their birth and education, all having been made by the same power and come into existence in the same way, only under different circumstances, and these different circumstances and early training are just what make them different in their views and consciences. And is it just, is it right, is it reasonable, that any one of these should be held accountable or eternally punished for not believing that which he could not, or for not doing that which in his conscience he had been taught to believe was wrong? Is it reasonable to believe that a loving father would punish his child for doing that which he himself had taught that child to conscientiously believe was right for it to do?

I hav heard it said from the Christian pulpit that a person can believe anything that he wishes to. I deny the assertion. There is no person that can believe more than their own senses tell them is believable. When a person professes to believe in impossibilities it is pretty evident that what he takes for faith is the result of an ignorant, superstitious training; but, as I believe, as he is not accountable for his birth and early training, he has come honestly by his religious views, and until he is led to investigate into their truthfulness or otherwise, he cannot be expected to change his views; and so long as he acts conscientiously to what he believes to be right, what more can be expected, although he may be in error; but how is he to help himself until his judgment is convinced of his error?

The ruts of ignorance and superstition in which the human family hav been brought up and trained are deep, and it is no easy matter to get out of them. Our prejudices in favor of our own creeds are so strong that we dare not doubt their correctness nor seek for the foundation upon which they rest. To become acquainted with the sciences and the laws of nature, and an abandonment of priestcraft, is the road out of ignorance and superstition. JOHN RAY.

CENTRAL, S. C., Feb. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Rev. Joseph Simmons, a Baptist clergyman of considerable ability, living in Anderson county, S. C., has got out of the "wilderness," and wishes to be identified with the sons of reason and common sense. I hope the patrons and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will extend to him the right hand of fellowship, and invite him to a seat at our holy communion. Fraternally, R. M. CASEY.

OPEN LETTER TO WM. BLACK.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Feb. 14, 1882.

FRIEND WILLIAM: I am very glad thee is willing to be one to help requite the debt all Liberals owe to Mr. Hacker. I received a letter from him yesterday. He has been very sick—near unto death's door—and I hope many friends will send him their mite as well as cheering, kind, and friendly words of interest and sympathy. It is better to help living laborers than to worship dead heroes. I hav just sent him my mite, and also write him every few weeks. His address is Berlin, N. J. ELMINA.

DENVER, COL., Jan. 31, 1882.

PROGRESSIV FRIENDS: Recovering from a severe illness that has kept me from business several weeks, I hav, while waiting for health to come, been very much interested in the excellent letters written by D. M. Bennett, describing his experiences in the somewhat ancient country. Not long since I made mention of your paper and his letters in the Great West, which article I am glad to see is being somewhat extensivly copied, as you will see by the inclosed reprint coming from the Blade at Concordia, Kansas.

If you will let me know when his book of travels will be out I will try to dispose of a few or more copies, and send the orders to you in time to be filled. Very busily thine, M. M. POMEROY.

BALTIMORE, MD., Feb. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in "Letters from Friends," of your issue of Feb. 11th, a short communication from William Black, calling attention to the impoverished condition of that heroic old war-horse of Liberalism, Jeremiah Hacker, of Berlin, N. J., now over eighty years of age. Mr. Black proposes for you to start a subscription list in his favor and puts his name down for ten dollars.

Now let us giv the old hero a benefit. There are enough of us to do it, each one contributing a little, as he may feel able, and I think there are but few who can feel that a dollar is above their ability. I think I can afford to giv a dollar, so down with my name, and here is a greenback. Mr. Black feels able to giv ten dollars. I am glad of it; so much the better. Who is the next? All speak at once, but speak promptly. Any amount, more or less, will be acceptable; and you, Mr. Editor, will keep tally. Liberals, remember this is an old man fast approaching the grave, who has fought superstition these many years, and is now past activ work, yet whose voice can occasionally be heard still on the war-path. Let us see if we cannot cheer his old heart with not less than five hundred dollars. If we will only think so, we can do it, and not feel impoverished either. Send in your names and amount promptly. I trust you will giv a liberal response.

BERLIN, N. J., Feb. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: When THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 28th arrived I intended to offer you a few words at once in relation to the letter of Wm. Black, but was prostrated and brought near to death's door, where I hav been lying in agony and weakness until to-day; and now having got my head above water again, and not being able to liv or die easy out of the harness I hav worn so long, I turn to perform the duty that disease cut short, if you will spare me a little space.

Mr. Black, speaking of Guiteau, says: "What a terrible blunder he made in killing such a noble man! But mean as he is, crazy as he is, I cannot giv my consent to hav him hung. I think it will be a blunder if the government hangs him, and still a greater one if the mob destroys him, although I look upon him as a perfect nuisance."

In the above I agree with Mr. Black exactly, and really wish every Liberal in the nation would say the same; and the time is coming when all Liberals will look with as much abhorrence on all wars and all hangings, for whatever cause, as we now do on the persecutions of former ages.

Whenever a state or a nation hangs a man it condemns itself. It virtually confesses that it has not grace, godliness, nor humanity enough to reform and save him; and I want to see Liberals leave behind them all the paganisms, savagisms, barbarisms, and cannibalisms of the Bible and churches, and aim for perfection—to reform and save rather than destroy—and leave the blood and carnage to the churches. War and capital punishment hav been handed down from the dark ages; the Bible is full of such savagery, and the people are full of it. Go into a church and once a month you will see the priest and his church around what they call the table of their Lord and master, eating what they call his flesh and blood.

How can we expect fanatics to respect life with such examples of cannibalism before them? If a Christian nation kills a hundred thousand people in war, how can they expect the Guiteaus to respect an individual life? We should clear our skirts of blood at wholesale before we condemn others.

Put Guiteau where he will be safe, and let him liv out his time. But of all things, let Liberals leave the churches and their barbarisms behind, and trav on in advance of war, and the gallows, and the thousands of other abominations practiced by the churches. Yours, J. HACKER.

TOLEDO, OHIO, Feb. 19, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Our city of about 50,000 inhabitants, on the placid old "Maumee River," is still in existence, notwithstanding the raging of the elements. We hav a thoroughly-organized grain-gambling headquarters under the nom de guerre Produce Exchange, and its little side-show for those who are made insolvent in the main tent; which is known in this region as the Boody House bucket-shop. And we hav also our nine hundred dens where all kinds of intoxicants and tobacco are sold. And be it known that we hav also sixty churches in operation in this city, and really but one medium-sized book-store. And yet we seem to enjoy ourselvs tolerably well.

We were blessed with another of those beautiful Christian manifestations of brotherly love during the past week, in the trial of a case in our Court of Common Pleas. One of the attorneys, Deacon P——t of the Westminster wing of the Calvinistic church, astounded the entire community, and especially the court, by calling on the witness-stand between twenty and thirty good respectable citizens of this town to impeach the character of Deacon D——r of the First Presbyterian church of this city. Now why should we despond or feel that we are wasting our lives in a dull monotonous style when we are blessed with such loving manifestations in the Christian camp? This same Deacon P——t was one of the little band of loving followers of the meek and lowly Calvin, who but a short time since burst his Westminster church wide open because Mr. Bacon, their pastor—and he is a gentleman—did not wear a "plug hat," and Mrs. Bacon did not sport ostrich plumes. Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity, and see the precious ointment come down upon their heads. And, strange as it may seem, these fellows and their pastors, after all these manifestations of loving kindness toward their fellow-men, earnestly advise all the members of their churches to avoid Robert G. Ingersoll, and in no case attend or read his lectures.

Yours truly, M. O. WAGGONER.

MODESTO, CAL., Jan. 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: On my arrival at this place, over three weeks ago, I found that preparations were being made for a grand celebration of the birthday of Thomas Paine. Judge A. Schell, of Knights Ferry, was lecturing to a large and enthusiastic audience, and making priestcraft tremble. In short, I found Liberalism booming.

Since we wished to dance after the close of the exercises of the occasion, we held our celebration on Friday evening, so that we might not offend the sun worshipers by dancing on the day which they hold sacred to their God. Roger's Hall, the largest hall in our town, was crowded, and all were delighted, as Dr. York thundered and lightened upon the trembling ranks of priestcraft and scattered their time-rotten dogmas to the four winds of heaven. The doctor was followed by Judge A. Schell in a short but able discourse. I was then called out, and, by request, gave a brief account of my trip to the East. My remarks were well received. A few of my orthodox friends, however, winced a little because I had not been able to find any Infidels or Spiritualists in the Ohio penitentiary. If you can find any there, please do so for the comfort of these friends of mine.

On Saturday evening I visited Ceres, a town six miles from Modesto, to hear a discussion in the Literary Society of that place, on the Sunday question. By a strange coincidence, however, the champions of the Sunday imposition failed to put in an appearance, and thus prevented any discussion. I was then called out, and, in a short lecture, extempore, of course, gave them such a lesson on the Sunday question as will leave no room for future discussion.

The severe cough that caused my sudden return to my beautiful California has nearly ceased, and yet I shall not speak much for some time. My friends are all eager to see my book, and I will be glad when their wishes can be gratified. Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months. I am likely to remain here that long.

Yours truly, JOHN R. KELSO.

IRWIN STATION, PA., Feb. 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I find in an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 11th headed, "Is it Special Providence?" some misrepresentations concerning the conduct of Mr. Knox toward Irwin Liberals. I will here state the part of W. F. Barkley's article wherein he has certainly been wrongly informed: "But here comes a reverse, the Rev. Mr. Knox, pastor of the Baptist church at that place (Irwin Station), made himself very conspicuous in the cause of Christ by lending his time and tongue against the Irwin Liberals, so much so that his church became involved in debt to such an extent that it had to be sold at sheriff sale." Now I believe I know more about this affair than any other man at this place who dares to tell the whole truth about it, being a member of the same church at the time, one of the chief instigators' of Mr. Knox coming here to preach, and one of his most intimate friends until he left, although I had left the church several months before he left Irwin Station. I also paid my monthly contribution to his salary after I had left the church and publicly renounced the faith. For some two or three months I handed it to him myself. Both he and his wife continued to visit us, and we gave them a hearty welcome, believing them to be honest in their opinions. I could not do otherwise and be a true Liberal. I made bare my heart to him as soon as I became aware of the fact that the whole thing was a fraud, and told him all about it.

But to come to the main question, we held an election after trying Knox a month, and he was duly elected pastor according to Baptist rules. The vote stood 19–6, which was a full three-quarter vote in his favor. One of the deacons who was chairman of the meeting, after giving in the vote as above stated, wrote to him him at Ebensburg, he being there at the time, that he need not come, as he had not been elected, and signed his name to the falsehood; while some three of us sent him a note stating the truth about his election. He came on, and when he came to preach his first sermon after his election part of the society forbade him the rostrum, and he quietly gave it up that day. But they gave in, and I think he was allowed to fill it in a week or two. So you see the society had dwindled down from some two hundred and sixty members to some forty or fifty before Knox came here. Also the heavy debt on the church was caused by one Richard Morgan, founder of the Baptist church at this place, brother of the notorious Lloyd Morgan. Richard Morgan is the man that both built up, and, as soon as he saw that his work would not stand, let fall, the society, on somebody else. I will inform your readers that the ruin of the Baptist church was accomplished before B. F. Underwood lectured here, and Knox did not take any part in the denunciation of Liberals, to my knowledge, publicly, and I hav every reason to believe he was too Liberal for the church, which was part the cause of his failure. I believe he was honest in his views, and that is more than I would say about the majority of preachers. Mr. Knox of the Baptist church, and Father Murphy of the Catholic church, were too wise and prudent to take any part in the meetings held here monthly for some time for the purpose of skinning Infidels. But their members did not bring their knives and torches and do the skinning and burning, and I believe they quit holding their meetings for fear their members might get in the notion and try their hand on them. The Rev. John Titzel, a namesake of the man of great indulgence fame in Martin Luther's time, is the man who is blamed for trying to put down Infidelity by brute force, but he acted wisely and resigned his charge and departed to Altoona, where I trust he will act wisely, as I understand there are enough Liberals there to keep him straight. N. G. Miller, another of the wiseacres of the Methodist persuasion, took an activ part in the flaying business. He has also sought other fields to work in. Also Rev. MacElrea, United Presbyterian, has since left for other fields. He was also one of the Infidel-skinners. Rev. Christy, of the Lutheran church, the best one of the white-choker flock of skinners, has also left since the great Underwood excitement for other fields. May they all grow wiser in the future.

Now your readers can see that Rev. Knox was not the man who caused the Baptist church to be sold. The debt was on the church when Rev. R. Morgan left it. He is the man to blame. Nor did the Rev. Knox do the Liberal cause any harm. Neither did he do it any good, for he kept too quiet upon the subject. Titzel, Miller, and MacElrea are the men to giv the credit to for publishing ignorantly the Liberal cause about here, and I venture to bet a summer coonskin they made ten skeptics to one confirmed Christian by their monthly union meetings for the purpose of denouncing Infidelity. You can inform your readers that there are plenty of skeptics both in and out of the church here, and it is a pity they are not organized into a League. I did make an effort to get up a League, and we organized one with twelve members, but our League lies dormant at the present time. I, for my part, hav never seen the charter, though it has been here nearly three years.

Yours for justice, WM. N. RIDINGER.

THREE New Leagues hav been organized—one at Burlington, Iowa, Max Stempel, secretary; one at Hebron, Nebraska, T. J. Hasbrook, secretary; and one at East Lebanon, Maine, Samuel P. Fall, secretary. Mrs. H. S. Lake has been lecturing at Burlington, and the League there is one result of her work. The League in Maine is the first one organized in that state.

EDWARD W. SEARING will giv the next lecture in the Society of Humanity's course at Science Hall, March 5th, on "Humanity and the Progress of International Law."

Paine Anniversary Hymn.

SUNG IN FLINT, MICH., BY C. FANNIE ALLYN.

Oh, say, can you see, through the faith-haunted years,
The thoughts flashing forth from the prophet of reason?
Thoughts gleaming like stars amid ignorant jeers,
When "to think was a crime, and to doubt was a treason;"
Through old error's dark night, and stern bigotry's blight,
Oh, say, can you witness their progress to-night?
Till they lifted the hearts of the king-fettered slave,
To the hight of the free and the rank of the brave?

When the heroes of old, through storm, fire, and snow,
Marched on to the aid of our country's defenders;
It was Paine's fearless words that taught friend and foe,
Freedom knows not the word, or the right to surrender.
'Mid the dangers of fight, by day and by night,
"Common Sense" and the "Crisis" inspired men for right,
Till the star-spangled banner in triumph could wave
Over liberty rising from tyranny's grave.

By Washington's sword place the pen of a Paine,
And when nations shall ask whom liberty trusted,
Let the true "Rights of Man," with an undying fame,
Be the answer to all when the old sword has rusted.
Men's souls hav been tried, and o'er hatred's dark tide
His memory glows in our national pride;
And the patriot grand, who lived but to save,
Is revered by the free and esteemed by the brave.

And thus be it ever, till over each sod
The bright "Age of Reason" shall uplift each nation;
Truth, wisdom, and love be the new triune God,
Uniting us all in a common salvation.
With injustice down-hurled, and our country the world,
Doing good our religion, where'er life's unfurled,
Till one banner of freedom in glory shall wave,
Over liberty's children made happy and brave.

Guiteau.

BY ALHAZA.

An age of golden miracles, new-dressed,
Something quite racy, it must be confessed,
Is needful now for mortals yet to Awaken their best life comes Guiteau.

Reason is yet a power undefined,
To raise us in the scale it is designed;
It can, no doubt, develop without limit,
Yet certain things corrupt, distort, and dim it.

There was an age of justice long ago
Inflexible, their sages thought it so,
Nought between sin and fate's revengeful frown,
And then a Thor-like hammer held you down.

Next bleating victims poured out seas of blood,
Till the last pleader before Pilate stood;
Who got up quite a melancholy pageant,
Though no sane person said he was God's agent.

Sometimes we find a man in lofty station,
An exponent of some great aberration,
Or else an individual lower down
Will kiss the dust to find a pinchbeck crown.

The age of prophets ne'er will be abolished—
Some mild, or like Elijah, quite unpolished,
And when he will return no one can tell,
But Guiteau probably will do as well.

He bears the nation meekly on his arm,
And shields within his heart a secret charm—
The hidden glory of dark providence,
The silver lining of a shaky fence.

A noble army of preachers stand around,
And goodly salaries keep them fat and sound;
A bloody toy, no doubt, the nation pampers,
But blood must flow from somewhere to feed vampires.

The holy spirit seems to grow quite stingy,
The flame on sacred altars waxes dingy,
But Guiteau's words on providence, I ween,
Will work like oil upon the old machine.

How soon evangelists will seem quite tame,
And the great Talmage be an empty name!
Even God and jeweled Juggernaut may die too,
And Guiteau will be all they'll hav to pray to.

He is heaven's mouth-piece—let him speak or die.
Such thorny rods are showered from on high,
And whether the nation reasons well or ill
He bears a holy mission in his will.

And then such dreary mysteries as these,
They can pray over on their bended knees.
So sacred opiates lull both saint and sinner,
While priests are smiling o'er a sumptuous dinner.

Thus opium eaters reach a "higher plane"
When reason dies and they become insane;
Nor of truth's visage see one heavenly feature,
While meekly listening to the reverend Beecher.

The New Apostle of Freethought.

The Rev. George C. Miln, late Congregational pastor in Brooklyn, and until recently of Unity Unitarian Church of Chicago, addressed Prof. Felix Adler's Society for Ethical Culture, and a large audience besides, at Chickering Hall, Sunday, the 9th ult. In introducing the Chicago preacher, Prof. Adler said that Mr. Miln had just passed through a period of storm and conflict. A few weeks ago he was the clerical head of a Christian body in a large city. He had imperiled the future of his family and himself in order to stand by his convictions. It was a sign of the breaking of the lines, and of a new era of truth. Mr. Miln is a strongly-made, good-looking man of middle age. His face was clean shaved. His thick, straight dark hair was parted well on the side, and fell negligently across a broad forehead. His eyes are dark and deep-set. He said that he had prepared and preached in Chicago three discourses. He was afraid that the attempt he was now about to make, of putting three into one, would result in the old-time disaster. He was to speak of the church of the past, of the present, and of the future. He did not believe that the church was of divine origin. The church was because man was, and because man could not exist without an institution analogous to the the church. The root of the church was religious impulse. Man observed, but did not comprehend, the forces of nature, and sought for the final cause, which he never found. Men hav now grown strangely tired of hearing themselvs described as heirs of hell, and the deity pictured in revolting terms. We hav to confess ourselvs Agnostics. We don't know, and we haven't been able to find anybody who does, though there are some folks who hav a grand time in pretending to know. He did not believe that the church was set down ready made, a bride dressed for her husband. As he saw her she was born naked, and gathered her clothing, some grotesque and some beautiful, from all epochs and all climes. The church no longer retains, the speaker said, the influence or the hold upon the human heart which she used to possess; and in illustration of this he quoted from Robert Ingersoll, who said, "Only those attend prayer-meeting who wish to be alone." The Chicago churches are not half filled on Sunday, and Chicago calls herself a religious town. Of an Episcopal church in Chicago the speaker said, "Only the most ingenious of ushers could hav spread out the people who were there into the semblance of a decent congregation." He contrasted the different ways of operation of the Catholic and the Protestant churches. The Catholic holds firmly on to the terrors of hell, while the Protestant believer is introduced into heaven with all the eulogistic platitudes which custom has embalmed. Of the churches of to-day the speaker placed the Roman Catholic and Greek on one side of a line, and the Protestant on the other. Regarding the Catholic, he said that the drawing of the "awful circle" no longer stays the hand of power. The age is against Rome. School books and the pen will at length effect its downfall. The Episcopalian "High church" reminded him, as compared with the Catholic, of the insipidity of private theatricals as pitted against the legitimate drama. The Episcopal church tells us that Christ was born of a human mother, and that his father was divine, and that he is something that is not God and not man, and the tale is too much for our credulity. The church of the future, Mr. Miln said, will be marked by the entire absence of speculativ belief as a basis of agreement. He meant all beliefs not susceptible of sensible demonstration. Of the beliefs that will not be urged are the belief in hell, in inspiration, in a personal deity, and in immortality. Hell already by most Protestants has been relegated to the category of oriental nightmares. But the speaker advised orthodox ministers to guard well the gates of hell. Without hell the orthodox lash loses its chief scourge, for the foundation of orthodoxy is laid in the bed of hell. The church of the future will catalog the Bible as an ancient book, worthy only on account of the good that is in it. A personal deity is an inference, unsusceptible of demonstration, and therefore not necessary to the church of the future. The speaker could not see a glimmer of reason to support the idea of immortality. On none of these beliefs will the church of the future insist as a basis of agreement. Moreover, he did not believe in an effort to upset the course of events by prayer. He said that he has abandoned prayer. The ideal and motiv of the church of the future will be goodness, by goodness being meant the conduct which builds up and makes happy the individual. The two glorious motivs that will actuate those belonging to the church will be experience and the future of the race. Experience will reveal to them that the man who is good is happy, and the perfection of mankind will be an incentiv than which no stronger need exist.

CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR,

The oldest reform journal in the United States,

Is published every Wednesday at the Paine Memorial Building, Boston, Mass.,

By JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

Edited by HORACE SEAVER.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. 3m53

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case; some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, aided by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Gems of Thought.

It is well said, in every sense, that a man's religion is the chief fact with regard to him; a man's or a nation of men's. By religion, I do not mean here the church creed which he professes, the articles of faith which he will sign, and, in words or otherwise, assert; not this wholly, in many cases not this at all. We see men of all kinds of professed creeds attain to almost all degrees of worth or worthlessness under each or any of them. That is not what I call religion, this profession and assertion, which is often only a profession and assertion from the outworks of the man, from the mere argumentativ origin of him, if even so deep as that. But the thing a man does practically believe (and this is often enough without asserting it even to himself, much less to others); the thing a man does practically lay to heart, and know for certain, concerning his vital relations to this mysterious universe, and his duty and destiny there, that is, in all cases, the primary thing for him, and creativly determins all the rest.—Carly'e's Hero-Worship.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT did not hearken to his preceptor Aristotle, who advised him to bear himself as a "prince" among the Greeks, his own people, but as a "master" among the Babarians; to treat the one as friends and kinsmen, the others as enemies or chattels. . . . But conceiving that he was sent by God to be an umpire between all, and to unite all together, he reduced by arms those whom he could not conquer by persuasion, and formed of a hundred diverse nations a single universal body, mingling, as it were, in one class of friendship the customs, the marriages, and the laws of all. He desired that all should regard the whole world as their common country, the good as fellow-citizens and brethren, the bad as aliens and enemies; that the Greeks should no longer be distinguished from the foreigner by arms or costume, but that every good man should be esteemed a Hellene [a Greek], and every evil man a barbarian.—Plutarch.

WHEN we talk of men of deep science, do we mean that they hav got to the bottom, or near the bottom, of science? Do we mean that they know all that is capable of being known? Do we mean even that they know, in their own special department, all that the smatterers of the next generation will know? Why, if we compare the little truth that we know with the infinit mass of truth which we do not know, we are all shallow together, and the greatest philosophers that ever lived would be the first to confess their shallowness. If we would call up the first of human beings, if we would call up Newton, and ask him whether, even in those sciences in which he had no rival, he considered himself as profoundly knowing, he would hav told us that he was but a smatterer like ourselvs, and that the difference between his knowledge and ours vanished when compared with the quantity of truth undiscovered, just as the distance between a person at the foot of Ben Lomond and at the top of Ben Lomond vanishes when compared with the distance of the fixed stars.—Macaulay's Speeches.

ATHEISM claims the right to think, and the right to speak the thought, without any penalty being imposed on the thinker. It denies that there is any subject so sacred that it should not be investigated; any assertion so authoritativ that it may not be tested. While Christianity proclaims that hell is the preordained punishment for unbelief in doctrins incapable of verification by experience, Atheism asserts that unbelief is a duty when evidence is insufficient, and that faith in dogmas relating to the unknown is foolish credulity.—Besant's Gospel of Atheism.

IF the nature of all things is known, we are by that knowledge relieved from superstition, released from the fear of death, exempted from being perplexed by our ignorance of things, from which ignorance horrible fears often arise.—Cicero's Chief Good and Evil.

THE new church will see and proclaim that all truth is God's truth, whether the truth of Buddhism or Mohammedanism, or wherever or whenever spoken. The Bible is divine only so far as it is good and true. The atrocious things which it ascribes to God, or as approved by God, are slanders upon his character. Our children are as much his children as any mythological angels.—M. J. Savage.

WHILE Christianity deifies the unknown, Atheism studies it and offers to truth but one homage—the homage of investigation. While Christianity fears God, labors for heaven, strives to avoid hell, obeys revelation, Atheism goes on its way, fearless of aught save untruth; it knows no God, it works for earth alone; it recognizes utility as its only guide; human happiness as its only aim. It bids all men think, without dread of damnation; it bids all men speak, without dread of human punishment; it proclaims that all men owe to society the duty of thought, and the duty of uttering thought. —Mrs. Annie Besant's Gospel of Atheism.

THAT an opinion is the opinion of the multitude is to some men a powerful recommendation; to others it appears an infallible criterion of error; to those who are truly rational, it will be neither.—Dr. G. Campbell.

THERE are as many different opinions as there are men; and, therefore, we may be in error ourselvs.—Cicero.

THE master of superstition is the people; and, in all superstition, wise men follow fools.—Bacon's Essays.

A CHRISTIAN correspondent says, "Some one had to do the work that Jesus did to make a radical departure." The Essenes probably did it, not suddenly 1881 years ago, but by long, slow, and patient labor; and at last their religion was first called Christian at Antioch, but not born there. No religion is born all at once. Spiritualism was not. Of course many were put to death for teaching Christianity, or Essenism, because it was not radicalism compared with the Jewish faith and customs. The gospels are said to have been the secret books of the Essenes, and, as a sect, they taught every prominent form, rite, ceremony, or tenet that Christ taught, even to the healing by laying on of hands.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

A RED or green-plush young girl,
A Russian hair-muff young girl;
A little fur capery,
Æsthetic drapery,
Ten-acre-hat young girl.

A BRIGHT youth undergoing examination a few days since for admission to one of the departments found himself confronted with the question, What is the distance from the earth to the sun? Not having the exact number of miles with him, he wrote in reply, "I am unable to state accurately, but don't believe the sun is near enough to interfere with a proper performance of my duties if I get this clerkship." He got it.

A COOLNESS has arisen between Mr. and Mrs. Fitznoodle, one of the most respectable families in Austin. One day last week a Mexican donkey was run over in the outskirts of Austin and killed by a freight train on the International Railroad. Next morning, just as Mr. Fitznoodle was about to start down town, his wife threw her arms around his neck and said: "Dear Alonzo, promis me not to go near the railroad track. How can the engineer distinguish between you and a donkey in time to stop the train?"

"THERE are two sides to everything," said a Christian lecturer. "I repeat it, there are two sides ——" At this juncture a tired-looking little man stood up in the front seat to say, "Well, if you've no objections, I will just step out and see if there are two sides to this hall. I know there is an inside, and if I find there is an outside you'll know it by my not coming back. You needn't be alarmed if I shouldn't return." And as he walked up the aisle he was followed by the admiring eyes of the whole audience. Their sympathies were with him, but they were deficient in moral courage.

"I SUPPOSE I might as well destroy this," said a tailor, disconsolately, to his wife, taking up a bill due him from one of the deacons of the church to which they belonged.

"Not a bit of it," returned his wife. "Giv it to me."

The next Sunday morning when the plate was passed around for subscriptions to pay off the floating debt, she dropped the bill into it, and before the middle of the week it was paid.

"Marriage is a lottery," remarked the happy tailor, as he pocke'ed the money, "but I advise every man to take the chances."

A STRANGER who appeared to hav seen much of this cold and unfeeling world entered a ferry-dock saloon recently, and after warming himself for a moment at the stove, around which was a large circle of mariners, he advanced to the bar and called for whisky and two glasses. A stiff drink was poured into each, and, taking up one in his fingers, the man turned to the crowd and said, "Gentlemen, if there is a liar present I invite him to step up and drink with me." A sort of tremor ran through the crowd, but no one moved. The stranger gazed around in blank astonishment, and finally said to one old tug captain: "Well, that beats me. What's the matter?" "The matter is," slowly replied the captain, as he took his legs off the stove, "that any man who expects fourteen liars to drink out of one tumbler at the same time is altogether too fresh for this locality! You are no gentleman, sir; no gentleman!"

A MAIDEN who lived at Accord,
The sight of a spider abhorred;
But her lover made bolder,
Brushed one from her shoulder,
And she gave him a kiss in reward.
Next night, as he sat by her side,
And let himself artfully glide
Round her trim, belted waist—
"O George, now make haste
And pretend there's a spider," she cried.

But this bold young man who adored
This frolicsome maid of Accord,
Though he hugged her trim waist,
Didn't seem in much haste
To take her up at her rash word.
"Where's the need of pretense?" he cried,
And he sadly and deeply sighed—
"For isn't it quite clear
That a spider is near
When a fly's in a web at your side?"

"YES, SIR, I'D SHOOT HIM."

Six or eight congenial spirits sat around a stove in a Grand River grocery the other night, and after several other subjects had been exhausted some one introduced that of panics in churches, theaters, and halls. This gave Mr. Hopewell a chance to remark,

"Gentlemen, I just long to be there."

"Where?"

"Why, in one of those panics. Yes, sir, I'd giv a new twenty-dollar bill to be in the theater one night when there was an occasion for a panic."

"Why?"

"Why, because one cool, level-headed man could stop the thing as easily as you could end up that barrel of flour."

"Well, I dunno about that," observed one of the sitters. "There is something awful in the cry of fire, and hear it when and where you may, it startles and frightens. What would you do in a theater in case there was a cry of fire and a rush?"

"I'd stand upon my seat, pull a revolver from my pocket, and shout out that I'd shoot the first man that attempted to crowd or rush. One cool man would check the panic in ten seconds."

While the subject was being continued the grocer went to the rear end of the store, poured a little powder on a board, and gave three or four the wink. Directly there was a bright flash, yells of "Fire!" and "Powder!" and every man sprang up and rushed. Hopewell didn't spring up and talk of shooting. On the contrary, he fell over a lot of baskets piled between him and the door, got up to plow his way over a rack of brooms, and when he reached the sidewalk he was on all fours, white as a ghost, and so frightened that he never looked back until he reached the opposit side of the street.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE,

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

Notes and Clippings.

PROF. HUXLEY is writing a book on Bishop Berkeley, and his friends anticipate it will prove his magnum opus.

TOMBSTONE, Arizona, is growing so rapidly that they soon expect to be big enough to change its name to Sarcophagus.

THE Ladies' Aid Society (Spiritualist), of Boston, comprises one hundred and thirty-six members. They hav aided many needy families during the last year.

CHARLES A. REED, of Newton, Mass., devised $40,000 each to his own town and Salem, to be used in picnics to children, scientific lectures, and relief to poor widows.

ON the house 7 Craven street, Strand, London, a circular tablet has been fixed, with these words: "Lived here, Benjamin Franklin, Printer, Philosopher, and Statesman. Born 1706. Died 1790."

A TORONTO man was arrested for whipping his grown-up daughter. His plea was that, being a pious man, he desired the girl to keep Lent, and only struck her a dozen times with a cane for punishment.

APROPOS of Bradlaugh, it has been proposed that the custom of opening Parliamentary sittings with prayers should be discontinued. An Irish paper recommends that the present government should use "The Form of Prayer for those at Sea."

ANNA HORMAN, who is starving herself to death in the poorhouse of Clark county, Ind., believes that she is obeying a divine command to fast forty days and forty nights. She has no idea that she is dying, but thinks her life will be miraculously preserved.

THE Rev. George H. Pecke, of the Leavitt-street Congregational church, Chicago, declares that Bro. Rossiter habitually sits in a rear seat and makes wry faces at him in order to disconcert him while he is preaching. Rossiter is to be tried by a church committee.

THE Presbyterian says that it has no objection to a modified liturgy for the Presbyterian church; but that the fact is patent that there is no more power in modified liturgies than in modified whisky. The Presbyterian evidently takes its religion and whisky straight.

THE Christian religion, wherever it obtrudes itself, is a chronic and shameless beggar. The Protestant Christian Chinamen hav been relieved from taxation for religious festivals in China. They number about 15,000. The Roman Catholics secured such exemption many years ago.

THE Ontario court of common pleas has decided that the shaving of customers by barbers on Sunday is a violation of the laws, it being not a work of charity or necessity. The locomotion of the crab is progressivness personified compared with the direction the Canadian government is traveling.

SOME of our friends are inclined to censure us for the part we took in procuring the pardon of a poor woman, sentenced for a long term in jail. Well, it may not be good religion or good church doctrin to err on the side of mercy, but its good common sense and good humanity, "and don't you forget it."—Torch of Liberty.

A SUNDAY law passed in 1702 remains on the statute-books of Connecticut. It has long been ignored as to its more severe provisions, but occasionally its prohibition of travel is brought into notice by a prosecution, as in the case of excursions last summer. The Germans of New Haven and Hartford are moving for such modifications as will allow them a moderate amount of recreation on Sunday. The legislators are squirming between two fires, for there is a strong and activ sentiment of Puritanism in the state. The bill under consideration would remove all restrictions from Sunday travel, and permit concerts after sunset.

THE English secretary of legation at Buenos Ayres reports that when visiting the interior lately he found that all agricultural implements and machinery were supplied by the United States. "In the School of Agriculture in Mendoza," he says, "I do not remember seeing a single article of English manufacture among all the machines, etc., except one for threshing."

POMEROY'S paper throws this brick at hypocrits: Church-members may bang away against theaters, but we are quite certain that an actor or actress who affords enjoyment to thousands of tired, worn, weary persons, does more good than do one thousand long-faced, whining, hell-fearing followers of priestcraft who were happy and who made others happy till religion made them miserable, or apparently so.

THE Lakeview (Oregon) Herald says that the remnants of the Modoc Indians that were transferred from the lava beds to the Indian territory are now among the quietest, most peaceable, and industrious in the country. There are only 100 left, but they cultivate 460 acres of land, hav established schools, and are thriving generally. Scarfaced Charley, one of the heroes of the Modoc war, is now a respectable farmer.

EVERY criminal law claims a clergyman among its violators. After recent examples of theft, arson, seduction, and embezzlement in the church of England, we now hav one of suicide in the person of the vicar of Welland, the Rev. Lionel Brown, who shot himself in his bedroom the other day. He had lately been in low spirits through pecuniary difficulties arising from agricultural depression and the cost of erecting a new vicarage.

POPE LEO XII. has addressed a letter to the bishops of Italy, which is applicable to the Episcopacy throughout the world, directing attention to the secret work of the enemies of the church, who aim at the destruction of all religion. The clergy are exhorted to rouse the laity to defend the independence of the Pontifical See, to organize the Catholic press, and to educate the clergy to the hight of the present emergency. We shall probably now see what the Catholics can do in the Talmage line.

THE New York Sun, in speaking of the anniversary meeting of the Theosophical Society at Bombay on Jan. 12th, at which time Mr. Bennett replied to the Joe Cook's scurrilous attack, calls him the apostle of "American Infidelity and Freelove." We would remark to our lumimous contemporary that Mr. D. M. Bennett is not an apostle of Freelove, and further that he never attended Freelove gatherings at which at one time Charles A. Dana (popularly believed to be in some way connected with the Sun) was a bright and shining light.

REV. E. D. TOWLE, a New Bedford Methodist clergyman, preached his farewell sermon last Sunday, in which he gave orthodoxy a wipe by stating that according to Methodist belief Garfield had gone to hell because he did not believe in the Trinity, while Guiteau would go to heaven if he repented of his crime. This is what we call wounding his friends in their own house. If the ministers keep on in the way they hav been going lately, it will soon be necessary for the newspapers to come out as defenders of the church.—Dubuque Times.

"A PITCHED battle is certain to be fought very speedily," says the London Times, "over the revised version of the New Testament. Already a respectable organ of Conservativ opinion has sounded the war cry against its new readings with as much feeling as if it thought Mr. Gladstone had been among the revisers. Vituperation and taunts will not arbitrate finally between contending scholars. If at the end of the wordy warfare the public be able to perceive what is the actual amount of questionable matter, something will hav been gained. The high probability is that a majority of persons who speak the English language will be content to regard the uncertainties as still uncertain, provided they may keep so much as remains behind admitted."

THE London Freethinker says: The Unitarians hav 344 churches in America. They are not, however, progressing like the Universalists and Free Religious association, and none of their preachers can draw audiences like Ingersoll. In this country they seem almost stagnant. No ardent nature finds Unitarianism anything more than a half-way house on the road from orthodoxy. Half-way houses on a long and difficult journey are very useful in their place, and because we wish well to Unitarians, we tell them that they would succeed far better if they were not so sublimely cold and respectable.

MOODY says that Christians "don't want book-knowledge to enable them to meet skeptics" Oh, dear, no! When the good Christian hears the naughty skeptic state that Moses and Darwin don't square, he must answer with a pretty, sweet, pious story about an Infidel who fell down and broke his leg, and then was nursed by a kind Christian lady, and at last recovered and renounced Darwin and all his works, and now journeys heavenward, singing "Holy Moses." That's the style. You'll soon convert skeptics in that way.—London Freethinker.

THE editor of this paper has on his place, corner Grand Boulevard and Backus street, North Denver, quite a variety of choice fowls. Among them are brown leghorns, black Spanish, black cochins, partridge cochins, black Hamburgs, Pite game, Seebright bantams, and game bantams, all pure strain and kept for increase of pure stock. His Pite game cock killed nine birds in his last match in Albany, N. Y., and is able to knock the wind out of any other rooster in Colorado. It is the intention of its owner to lend him to churches when they get up lotteries, grab-bags, dog fights, foot races, and card parties for the benefit of the churches so that cock-fighting can be engaged in as a safe, religious pursuit, and thus, perhaps, stop the fighting continually going on between different denominations. They come high, but we must hav them.—Great West.

THE Judge, an illustrated weekly of this city, heads an editorial "Anthony Comstock," and proceeds as follows: The Judge always has and always will either hesitate or refuse to raise his voice or giv a decision against a worthy object, or anything that tends to the improvement or good of society, but against the shams of our social, moral, and political progress his face is ever set. And after knowing him and his methods for several years, the Judge emphatically repudiates the contemptible hypocrit whose denounced name heads this article. In the first place, he is most undoubtedly a notorious monger, and that alone unfits him for the office of a moral mentor; and in the second place, his methods are as questionable as his own moral character is said to be, for when the notoriety business is dull, and he fears that his backers will not think he is earning the fat salary they pay him—and all because he does not keep the name of this society before the public—he goes out and drums up business in this suppression-of-vice racket, taking care to hav all his doings written out and copies sent to the papers, so that all may read about what a great, good, watchful guardian of our public morals this A. C. is. But if his ferret nose cannot scent out anything that is sufficiently rotten to appease his unnatural maw, he goes to work and bribes poor men into the commission of a technical crime, by offering them large prices for some indictable article or act, and then with loud whoops of triumph he drags his entrapped victim before the courts and before the world, where by his methods he manages to blast their lives and reputations forever. What an official centipede this creature must be, when even only this much out of a long career of wickedness is known; and yet he fawns and spawns upon the reformers and would-be good people, trying to play the part of their chief and moral pilot. This man must stop. The Judge has a rod in pickle for him.

News of the Week.

AN immense anti-Chinese mass-meeting was held in San Francisco on the 4th.

ALLEN T. RICE, editor of the North American Review, has fallen heir to half a million.

THE birthday of Robert Emmett, the Irish patriot, was celebrated in this city on the 4th.

THE widow of Daniel Webster, his second wife, died at New Rochelle, N. Y., last week, aged 85 years.

QUEEN VICTORIA was shot at one day last week, but escaped unhurt. The would-be assassin was a tramp, and uninspired.

GUITEAU'S counsel has filed a bill of exceptions, and Gen. Butler has consented to argue the case for the defense before the court in banc.

FORTY thousand persons in the lower Mississippi counties are destitute, owing to the floods. Congress has been asked to appropriate $400,000 for the relief of these and other sufferers from floods in the West and South.

TALMAGE is quiet for the present on the subject of Ingersoll and Infidelity, and a revival meeting is in progress at the tabernacle—a sort of semi-annual winding-up of the concern, which has been rapidly running down for some time past.

THE picture of a virgin, supposed to be that of Mary, long since defunct, is said to appear on the walls of a house in Troy, N. Y. Many hav seen it. Some attribute the phenomenon to the presence of phosphorus in the plastering of the room.

THERE is a rumor afloat that Brigham Young is still alive. It is claimed that a corpse was procured and passed off as his. His alleged object is to gain new power over the people of Utah by appearing to them again and claiming a resurrection.

A PARTY sent out by Gen. Butler to survey a large tract of land in Virginia of which he had come into possession, were attacked, captured, and warned out of the state by an armed band of deer hunters and farmers, who regarded the surveying party as invaders.

CONKLING'S nomination for associate justice of the Supreme Court has been confirmed by the Senate. Mrs. Scoville has addressed a letter to President Arthur, protesting against the appointment of Conkling, whom she denounces as morally responsible for Garfield's death.

GEO. HENDRIX, a printer, has been arrested, charged with having defaced the monument erected by Cyrus W. Field to Andre, the British spy. Public opinion is very strong against Field and in favor of Hendrix, the only fault found with the latter being that he did not blow the preposterous stone into eternal fragments.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH has been for the third time elected member of Parliament from Northampton. He will appear again at the bar of the House and ask to hav the oath administered. How the wooden-headed bigots will get rid of him this time remains to be seen. S. Northcote has, as usual, moved that he be not admitted.

GEO. HAZAEL won the six-days walking-match last week, making a little over six hundred miles, beating the best previous records, and carrying off the championship belt, a chair worth $125, and a pair of valuable shoes, together with some $19,000 in money. Rowell broke down after making 415 miles in less time than that distance was ever made before.

AT a recent meeting of the Medico-Legal Society, the subject of discussion was "Reasoning Mania." The remarks applied chiefly to Guiteau. The majority of the medical and legal gentlemen thought the President's assassin should be hanged. Dr. Spitzka contended that he was insane, and had no doubt that Guiteau would expect the Almighty to descend and cut the rope when he was hanged.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

The Book of Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh.

22. But Jesus showed himself entirely ignorant of all these discoveries; he knew nothing of any of these improvements, he was unable to give the world anv useful, practical information; but he was profound in the matter of devils getting into people, for he was able to cast seven devils out of one woman, and two thousand more out of one man, or perhaps enabled one devil to so divide himself up as to enter into two thousand swine.

23. He was able to descant upon the lake of fire and brimstone which burns somewhere in the nether regions, where unfortunate persons must burn forever who cannot believe that he was the creator of the heavens and the earth, together with the infinite number of suns and worlds that are in existence.

24. He was able to talk about the devil and his augels, about the fire that is not quenched, about the worm that never dies; he was able to dwell upon the great excellence of belief, whether blind or intelligent; he was able to pronounce eternal blessings upon those who believe, whether they are convinced or not, and to doom to eternal torture those who are unable to believe. He took the position that belief is optional with the person who exercises it, and that a person can believe anything he pleases, regardless of proof.

25. He was able to instruct his followers to cut off their hands and pluck out their eyes if the same, from any cause, became so affected as to give offense. He was able to teach the doctrine that mendicancy, and idleness, and poverty are the greatest of virtues; that to provide for the morrow, for next week, or next winter, or for old age, is a great wrong, while to be improvident, thriftless, thoughtless, idle, penniless, and as poor as Job's turkey or a church mouse, is the highest of virtues, entitling one to a lodging-place in Abraham's bosom throughout the endless ages of eternity.

26. What condition would the world be in to-day if his injunctions were strictly followed—if everybody were to be like the lilies of the field, which never leave their places, but draw what they can from the earth and the air, without the slightest exertion or effort toward intellectuality or the improvement of the mind; or like the birds of the air, which know nothing beyond catching what flies and insects they can, which manage to pick up what worms and seeds they can find, and, when the cold weather and frosts of winter approach, fly away a thousand miles or so to a warmer southern climate?

27. It would be in a state of savagism and barbarity fearful to contemplate; men would have no houses to shelter them from the storms and tempests, no shield from the frosts and snows of winter, no clothing to protect the body, no food to satisfy the demands of nature, no schools or books for the education of children and the rising generation, no fabrics, no manufactured articles, no merchandise, no supplies of food, no roads, no railways, no steamboats, nothing that pertains to advanced civilization and the progress of the human race. The lilies and the birds have none of these.

28. There is certainly no good sense in demanding that intelligent men and women should govern their actions with regard to future wants and necessities by plants or animals. They should strive to be thoughtful for future wants, and make all the provision in their power for the necessities that must arise. In the morning and through the day men should labor for the comfort and rest to follow at night; in spring, and summer, and autumn, they should rear crops and lay up stores for the winter; in youth and during the middle age of manhood they should provide for declining health and the feebleness of old age.

29. There is no evidence that, besides Jesus knowing nothing of the sciences, discoveries, and inventions, he possessed even the commonest literary acquirements. Nothing has been handed down that he ever wrote; there is even no account of his writing a word at any time, save what he did on a certain occasion in the sand, and then it is not known that he wrote a word.

30. He might have been making only unmeaning marks in the sand, done for diversion while he was listening to what was being said by those around him; and whether what he did was writing or not, it was not of the slightest use to any human being, for there is no claim that any person read it, or was in any way benefited by it.

31. There is just as little evidence of his ever reading any book or manuscript. If he ever read a word, no account of it has been handed down, nor has any claim been set up in reference to it. The fairest conclusion that can be arrived at is that, if such a person existed, he was not only devoid of general information, devoid of scientific information, devoid of the knowledge of discoveries and improvements, but devoid of the commonest branches of education.

32. But I will not dwell longer on the subject this time. A great deal could be said. The subject could be elaborated and the remarks extended almost indefinitely, but it will not be worth while. I will now bid thee good-night, and wish thee the sweet repose that thy efforts and hardships entitle thee to. Peace be with thee!

CHAPTER XXVI.

THIRTEENTH DAY—ON TO JERUSALEM.

1. And it came to pass on the the third day of the month, that the pilgrims were up betimes and on their horses, with their faces set toward the Holy City, rejoicing that this was the last time the tents would be pitched for them, for after this they were to sleep in hotels and no more in the camp.

2. After riding for a mile or more along the edge of the valley, and looking at the remains of the walls and structures of the Romans after they came into possession of the Land of Yahweh, when they essayed to rebuild Jericho (but of which nothing is left withal worthy of special notice), the pilgrims soon began to rise the rough and steep hills of gravel and rock on the eastern confines of the plain.

3. The road is very steep and the hills are very high, nearly four thousand feet having to be ascended to attain the hight of the Holy City; but when the summit is reached the view is very grand, when looking back at the Dead Sea, the plain, the valley of the Jordan, the mountains of Moab and Gilead, the country up towards the Sea of Galilee, and even Mount Hermon, more than a hundred miles away, which are in sight through the clear atmosphere.

4. Once the road between Jericho and Jerusalem was far rougher than now, and one almost risked his life in clambering over the ledges and scaling the precipices of jagged rocks; but now the road is very much improved, owing to an accident which befell a Wallachian princess, who, to save her poorer pilgrims on the journey to Jordan from falling and being killed, presented a munificent sum to have the road put in better condition.

5. By dint of blasting and quarrying, and building walls along the steep precipices, the road is so much better that, for a good share of the distance, a carriage could be driven, were it not for the terraces or steps left in the steeper places, which, being eight or ten inches high, utterly prevent a carriage passing over them; but for horses and donkeys the road does very well, only for its steepness. It was twenty years ago or more that the road was improved.

6. It is a very hilly road all the way to Jerusalem, and the country is sterile and worthless. This is the portion said to have been allotted to Benjamin, and the Scribe is decidedly of the opinion that Benjamin was badly swindled in the division. The country consists of hard, steep, rough, and abrupt gravel hills, which grow nothing but a miserable, prickly little herb or brush that nothing will eat.

7. The Scribe gave it as his opinion that ten thousand acres of this land are not worth the sum of ten farthings; and as he journeyed over it, and cast his eyes to the right and to the left as far as he could see, he groaned out these sorrowful words: As my soul liveth, if the streams of milk and honey ever flowed over these gravel hills, they washed the soil entirely away and left the whole country not worth a cent.

8. For miles, as the pilgrims journeyed along, they found the soil so extremely poor that not even a poor, starved Bedouin can be found insane enough to try to live upon it; the howling, dreary desert is better for him and more desirable; but after nearly ten miles had been past occasional spots were reached where, though the rocks again chiefly covered the hills, little patches were seen here and there where some soil existed, and where half an acre, or possibly an acre, is found that is plowed, and once in a while a miserable stone hut is seen.

9. While passing through these rough and cheerless hills, some thirty or forty Russian pilgrims were seen reclining by the roadside, resting while on their way to the Jordan, which they visit with nearly as much religious enthusiasm as the Moslems feel with regard to their pilgrimages to Mecca. A thousand or more of these Christian pilgrims pass over this road every year.

10. To the south of the Jerusalem road, on the way from Bethlehem to the Dead Sea, perched up among the crags and precipices of the most barren and desolate of mountains, is a Christian monastery, containing about seventy of as positive fools as exist upon the face of the earth. The stone structure in which they live is said to be nearly as wild as the rocks, and it is not very clean; and here, year after year, they drag out a useless existence, under the supposition that they are thereby doing God a favor.

11. The monastery was founded by St. Sabas in the fifth century, and his holiness was so great that it is claimed he was enabled to perform many most wonderful miracles. He was buried upon the ground, and his bones are still thought to possess remarkable virtue. No woman is, upon any consideration, allowed to enter the monastery.

12. After some three hours' ride from the valley of the Jordan, the pilgrims passed an old, ruined khan, but it is a deserted place, the water being unfit for use. This is the traditional scene of the parable of the Good Samaritan, but as the parable was only an imaginary figure at best, the valuelessness of the tradition can be appreciated.

13. Two hours more brought the band to another old khan or stopping-place, where there is a spring of good water. This has the name of the Apostles' Fountain, from the legend that the Apostles used to call there to drink when on their journeyings. The legend, however, is without value. The fountain is on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin, and is supposed to be identical with the En Shemesh (Spring of the Sion).

14. Turning up from the fountain by the roadside, where several of the natives where stationed, selling oranges, etc., the pilgrims made their way up a long and steep hill, the top of which is the noted Mount of Olives. The hill is more like the rocky hills further north than like the gravel hills toward Jericho. It is principally rock, with some soil in places on the top; but the whole appearance is whitish, sterile, and barren.

15. It takes forty minutes to climb the hill to the summit of the Mount of Olives, and on the east side as the ascent is made the old village of Bethany is passed through. It has much the appearance of a modern Mahommedan village, composed of unsightly stone houses. A company of Moslem women were in a cemetery howling and praying for the dead.

16. In passing up the principal street the captain stopped before what looked like an entrance-way to a vault or cellar, and said that was the place where tradition asserts that Jesus raised Lazarus from the dead; but Tradition makes so many papable errors that the Scribe has very little confidence in what she says, and regards her as a lying old hag.

17. In fact, he has no confidence in the fable about the raising of Lazarus or any other man from the dead by Jesus or any other person. He regards it as one of the larger stories. But he looked down the cellar-way all the same, though his faith was not increased thereby.

18. He thought, Here, if the story is true, once lived Martha and Mary, the younger of whom ardently loved Jesus, and whose love seems to have been returned. The scene was recalled when Martha was doing up house-work, and Mary hung around Jesus, putting ointment on his feet according to one evangelist, and on his head according to another (while possibly the truth was between those extremes), and wiping his feet with the hair of her own head. That she was very affectionate cannot be denied, if the truth of the story is admitted.

19. From Bethany to Olivet is some ten or fifteen minutes' ride, and, as one passes along, he has time and opportunity to recall the incidents of the story connected with the entry of Jesus into Jerusalem, his ascension, etc. Here he must have been cordially welcomed by the multitude; here, or a little to the south, at Bethphage, he sent his disciple to take a man's ass without leave, with which to make a triumphal entry into the city.

20. Here the branches were broken from the olive-trees and thrown into the path; here garments were thrown down, and here the hosannas were shouted to the son of David, who was soon to be crowned king of the Jews.

21. Here is also where, on another occasion, Jesus approached a fig-tree, and because it did not bear figs in a season of the year when he had no right to expect them—when the time of figs was not yet—he got angry and cursed the tree so severely that it died about as soon as a snake will when his head is mashed—before the setting of the sun.

22. Here, near the summit of the mount, Jesus is said to have sat and mourned over the coming doom of the city, bewailing its sad fate, and a little to the right the very place is pointed out where he made his ascension; and there is a depression in the rock, said to have been made with his foot when he gave the final spring as he went up into the ethereal blue.

23. The Scribe is very incredulous about this ascension story, because it has a bogus appearance, to say the least. Matthew and John must have regarded it in the same light, for they had not a word to say about the marvelous incident. Mark and Luke are the only ones who seemed to know anything about the little circumstance; but, unfortunately, they disagree in their statements as to where the ascension was made.

24. Mark narrates how Jesus appeared unto the eleven while they were taking a meal (in a house, of course), and told them to go forth and preach the gospel to every creature, saying, He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned. The signs that were to follow those that believe were that they should become snake-charmers; or, in other words, they should be able to take up serpents, and to drink any deadly thing without being hurt; and then Mark simply says:

25. So, then, after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand side of God. Not a word about going out to Bethany, or to any other place. But Luke says, He led his disciples out as far as Bethany, and lifted up his hands and blessed them; and, in the operation of blessing, he was parted from them and went up.

26. The writer of Acts describes the ascension, but differently from the others, and he makes the conversation of Jesus at the time to be unlike that described by Mark; but he says nothing about Bethany being the place where he went up. There is an unfortunate disagreement in many particulars of the gospel story.

27. Coming upon the summit of the Mount of Olives, Jerusalem bursts suddenly upon the view, and there, three hundred feet lower than the Mount, it lies somewhat like a map spread out before the beholder.

28. The first feeling is one of disappointment, and the first thought is, Why, what a small place! It is not larger than a good-sized American village. It is inclosed by a wall some thirty feet high, and a good walker can walk around on the outside of it in an hour.

29. The city is on high ground, which descends to the south and east, and looks like a town rising up out of two ravines on the east and south, with similar hills on the opposite sides of the ravines. The valley of Jehosaphat, or the brook Kidron, and the valley of Hinnom, or Gehenna, are the two ravines, the latter continued in the valley of Gihon. The devout take the first view of it with intense admiration, but the Scribe could see but little in the appearance of the place to call forth special enthusiasm.

30. It looks like a dull, compact Moslem town, with several mosques, with minarets, several churches, a few large buildings, and a mass of small buildings. It is without the appearance of streets, without shade-trees—a condensed mass of two-story stone houses, with numerous small stone domes all over the town.

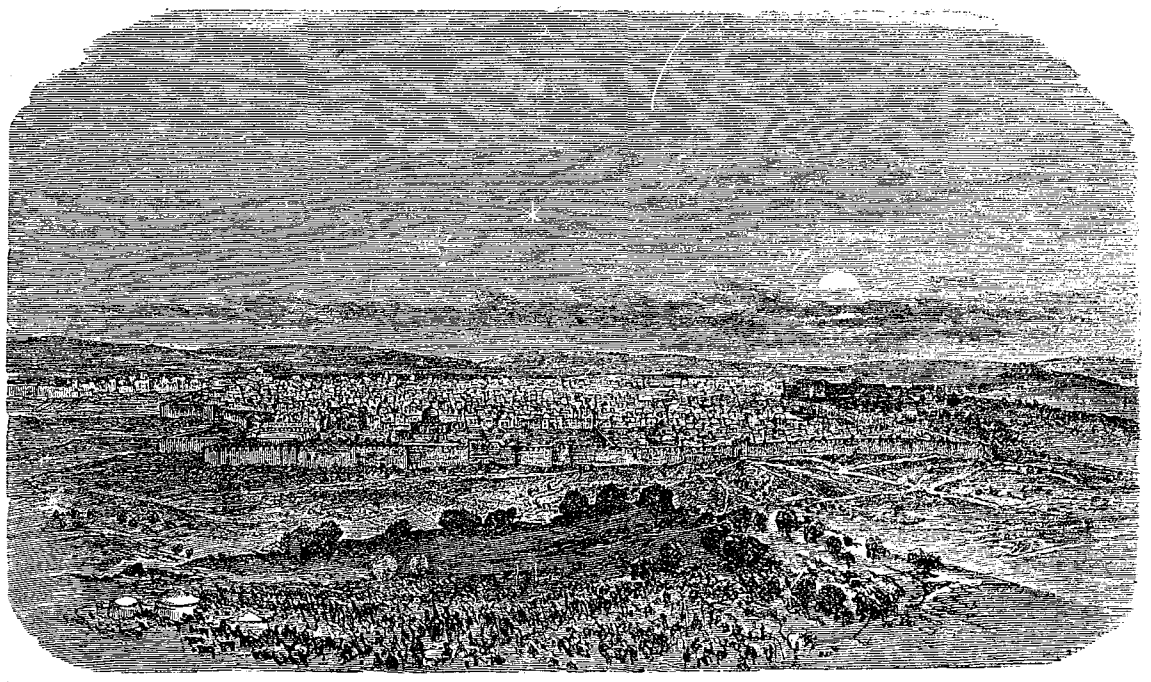
31. The Scribe was also disappointed in the appearance of the Mount of Olives. From his boyhood days he had pictured in his mind that the Mount of Olives was a round, smooth, even-swelling hill, with a profusion of olive-trees growing upon it. This was his idea; but the reality is that it is a raw, rough, rocky, barren, dried-up, cheerless hill, with an olive-tree or a fig-tree growing here and there.

32. He used to fancy the hill was nicely turfed over, or that a greensward covered it, which contributed fine feed for sheep; but there is no sod there, and the appearance of the hill is nearly as arid as the cone of a volcano, or more like the ruins of a thousand lime-kilns, for it has a white and burnt appearance. Oh, how the fancies of childhood take flight, one after another! The Mount of Olives will no longer be to the Scribe what he used to dream it was.

33. The valley between the Mount of Olives and Jerusalem is deep and steep; it is the valley of Jehosaphat, or the brook Kidron, which also used to sound like a delightful place; but it is an unsightly ravine, with the jagged rocks projecting through the scanty soil on both sides, though it is now much more filled up than it used to be three thousand years ago, and at the bottom the soil has considerable depth.

34. This ravine has been largely used for burial-places, and the old Jewish and later Mohammedan tombs, with their flat, crude, horizontal gravestones, cover a good share of the east side of it, where the high ledges do not usurp the space. To look down upon it, the view is not a pleasant one. Yes, a deep feeling of disappointment seizes the beholder. The distance by air line from Olivet to the site of the temple is probably about a mile.

35. On the Summit of the Mount of Olives is a haggard village, with two somewhat imposing establishments—one a monastery, or nunnery, with a high, strong wall inclosing it, the other a Mohammedan building, with a small mosque and large court-yard, and a minaret is on the very summit of the hill. In an upper room, near the minaret, lunch was spread upon the stone floor in full sight of the city, and here the pilgrims took their last meal before entering Jerusalem.



36. After this they ascended the minaret, and from the look-out place a splendid view is had. The city is spread out below on the west like a scroll, and beyond the western wall are the Russian buildings, of somewhat imposing appearance, and several rather fine-looking residences, which, within a few years, have, by the help of foreign capital, risen up outside the city.

37. Far to the north is seen the white caps of Hermon; nearer by are the hills of Naphtali, the hills of Galilee, Mount Tabor, Ebal, Gerizim; Bethel, fifteen miles away; and, nearer still, Gibeah, where the home of Saul is said to have been, and three miles north is Ramah, where Samuel was born.

38. On the east, twenty-five miles distant, is the long dark range of the hills of Moab and Gilead, with Nebo and Pisgah raising their heads a trifle above their neighbors. The north end of the Dead Sea is seen, and the valley of the Jordan; the course of the river being marked by a green line from the trees and small growth upon its banks.

39. To the south is the round Frank Mountain, where Herod is said to have built a mountain residence; the Judean hills of almost naked rocks, and the wilderness of Judah, which is more properly a wilderness of rocks. Nearer by, and almost below, is the hill of Evil Counsel, and west of it is the valley of Rephaim. Still nearer the city, and connecting with the valley of Jehosaphat, is the valley of Hinnom, or Gehenna, or Sheol, or Hades, or Hell, a place where the rubbish of the city was thrown and burnt. That is where the worm died not, and where the fire was not quenched.

40. West of the city rise the prominent rocky hills which lie off toward ancient Philistia, and the western bounds of the Land of Yahweh are easily seen. It was never a large kingdom, and one unavoidably entertains the opinion that a deity who made the whole earth and owned it all might have selected a larger and better part of it for his own use, and being infinite and omnipotent, he ought to have made better steerage in managing it. As it looks to-day, as it is and has been, it is a most miserable failure. Yahweh and his country cannot by any stretch of language be classed among the successes.

JERUSALEM.

41. In descending the Mount of Olives into the vale of Jehosaphat, the road is so steep that the rider finds it difficult to wait for his horse, as the tendency is to pitch headlong and hurry down toward the valley on all fours. But at length the bottom is reached and found to be very narrow. A circumbendibus detour is made among the modern buildings, and the pilgrims are halted before a doorway and told that they have reached the garden of Gethsemane.

42. It is all inclosed, and a strong doorway and a walled passage lead to the garden. It was not so when Jesus passed an unhappy night there. Upon entering the place it looks rather pleasant, being actually laid off as a garden; and the Catholic monks who have the place in charge are watering the plants and flowers that struggle for existence here.

43. The garden contains half an acre or more, and is divided into two or three parts by fences, and a walk surrounds it. In the center are two or three olive-trees of the old-settler type, and one of them is pointed out as the veritable tree under which Jesus felt such agony touching his approaching fate and sweat great drops of blood. Some olive-trees are said to live two thousand years, and this looks as though it was among the oldest of its kind. The body is gnarled and full of holes. Possibly the blood that was sweat under it so enriched the soil as to give the tree a luxuriant growth. That blood is said to possess most extraordinary qualities.

44. It was here that Peter and James and John could not keep awake that memorable night, but fell asleep while their master was feeling so badly and asked his father three times over to let the bitter cup pass by him if he could possibly find it convenient to do so, but the father would not hear to it; he wanted the dear son to die that miserable death that it might have a sweet effect upon his own mind. It has always seemed like a most lamentable pity that Yahweh permitted his affairs to get so tangled up that he had to cause his own son to be put to death to place matters in a little better situation.

45. Around the garden, against the wall, are placed twelve paintings of Jesus on his way from the judgment hall to the place of execution, bearing his own cross, and falling under the weight of it. The Scribe subsequently learned that the Hall of Judgment was but three squares from Calvary, where the crucifixion took place, and it seemed to him that falling twelve times in that distance under the weight of a plank or post large enough to crucify a person upon was not doing very well for an almighty, infinite, and omnipotent God, though possibly that is the way an omnipotent God ought to act.

46. Timber was so scarce in the Land of Yahweh (as it is to-day) that not a foot more than was necessary would have been used in making crosses, hence it would not be a heavy load for a man to carry a cross. Besides, Matthew, Mark, and Luke say Jesus did not carry his cross at all, but that one Simon, of Cyrene, was made to bear it. John contradicts the other three and says Jesus bore it himself; and on that kind of evidence—one against three—the story has been told, and put upon canvas thousands of times over, that Jesus fell twelve times under the weight of his own cross. Such is the result of having inspired records.

47. In passing down the valley of Jehosaphat numerous tombs, some outside graves, and others in the rocks up in the side of the hill, were noticed. Among others were the tombs of the prophets Zechariah, St. James, and Absalom. That of Zechariah is a square structure of stone, with four pilasters on each side, and a roof of pyramidal shape. It is, however, no tomb at all, as it is absolutely solid rock and no place inside for anything. Some pious and lying Catholics probably christened it as Zechariah's tomb, and it has gone by that name since. It has no internal chamber, and no doorway. That Zechariah was put into it is one of the impossibilities.

48. The tomb of Absalom is a somewhat elaborate building, square, with columns in partial relief standing out against the wall, and with a round and tapering roof. The tomb of St. James is composed of a verandah or screen, cut out of the rock, with two Doric columns. The tomb of Jehosaphat is behind that of Absalom, and hidden from view. The interior of Absalom's tomb has been filled with stones by the Arabs, who feel a great resentment toward David's ungrateful son. The little structures called the tombs are Roman in style, and are believed to have been done under Roman rule.

49. The Fountain of the Virgin, so called, in this valley is an artificial fountain. Two flights, one of sixteen steps, and the other thirteen, lead down to it. The basin is eleven feet square. It is said to be connected by an aqueduct with the Pool of Siloam. It rises and falls at frequent intervals. It had a dozen different names; the Dragon's Well, Well of the Sun, Spring of Gihon, King's Pool, etc. The name Virgin's Fountain came from a legend that here the Virgin washed the swaddling-clothes of Jesus, which imparted very healing qualities to the waters.

50. The Pool of Siloam is further on. It is fifty-three feet long, eighteen broad, and nineteen deep. Some broken columns and other fragments show that an edifice, probably a church, was once erected over it. Tradition points out this as the place where Jesus cured the blind man, anointing the eyes with clay and bidding the man wash in the Pool of Siloam. If the same were tried now for a thousand cases of blindness, it would undoubtedly fail in every case, and nature's laws are precisely to-day what they were eighteen hundred and fifty years ago.

51. A building was pointed out to the left as the place where Adonijah caused himself to be proclaimed king and coronated. He caused great numbers of sheep and oxen to be killed, and invited many people to come in and partake in honor of himself. But he made a great mistake in not inviting the prophet Nathan and some others, for Nathan, not being invited, went to Bathsheba and directed her go to see David and cause Solomon to be king. She did so, and David decided that Solomon should be king, which decision was carried out.

52. Adonijah asked pardon, and Solomon let him off; but when Adonijah had the temerity to ask for Abishag the Shunamite for a wife, it touched Solomon in a tender place, and he had his brother assassinated that very day. It is probable that he fancied Abishag himself.

53. Now where the ravine called the valley of Jehosaphat turns into the valley of Hinnom, or Gehenna, on the left, is pointed out the Field of Blood, claimed by some to be the Potters Field bought with the money obtained by Judas for betraying his master. When his conscience troubled him for the deed he had done he took the silver back to the priests and threw it down in the temple and went out and hanged himself; and with that money the priests bought this burying-ground.

54. The writer of the book of Acts tells a very different story, contradicting that of the evangelists entirely. He says Judas bought the field himself, and instead of hanging himself he fell headlong, and bursting asunder in the midst, his bowels gushed out. It looks very much as though the inspiration which dictated these two accounts was very much at fault. If one is true the other is false, and there is no escape from that.

55. The Hill of Evil Counsel is right here, and tradition has it that here was the house of Caiaphas the high priest, and here the Jews met and conspired against Jesus to put him to death. Tradition is a great liar. This story is especially unreliable, and dates no farther back than the fourteenth century. The person who undertook to settle the matter knew no more about it than the man in the moon.

56. Many tombs are all along here, some of them of hermits who dwelt here in early times, some of Crusaders, and some of people who died at a more recent date. One of the tombs is called the Apostles' Cavern from another legend that when the disciples all forsook Jesus, and fled the moment he got into trouble, they went to that cavern and hid themselves. Of course those who located it knew nothing about whether it was the place or not.

57. In the ravine a sycamore-tree was passed which is called Isaiah's Tree, and tradition again has it that here the prophet, becoming unpopular with his people, was put to death. This legend is as valuable as the other.

58. Turning to the right, the pilgrims passed up Hell, or the Valley of Hinnom; it is a deep, narrow ravine, with steep, rocky sides, to the southwest of the city, but looks no worse than the Valley of Jehosaphat. Upon the outer hill Solomon is said to have built high places to Molech. Then did Solomon build a high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem, and for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon. (1 Kings xi, 7.) Others of the kings followed the practice, and many children were made to pass through the fire in Hinnom or Gehenna to be sacrificed to Molech.

59. The roadway up the Valley of Hinnom leads into the Valley of Gihon, on the west side of the city, and to the Jaffa gate, where the pilgrims made their entry into the holy city. Without the gate a dozen or so of horrid-looking lepers were sitting by the roadway, who held out their deformed and shrunken hands and begged with their husky voices, reminding one of the pictures of lepers seen many years ago.

60. Twenty rods from the Jaffa gate stands the Mediterranean Hotel, at which the pilgrims were provided with quarters of good quality. The horses easily walked to the front of the hotel, but carriages never enter the gates; the streets in the city are too narrow to admit of carriages, though donkeys and camels are seen moving about at all hours.

61. Here, at last, the Scribe found himself in the holy city of the Jews—the city he had learned about in Sunday school when a child, that he had heard of in sermons, and read about since he was knee-high to a tea-kettle. Here he was in the city of David; the city where the wrrrior and amorous monarch is said to have reigned in regal state, and in the term of his reign to have accumulated gold and silver enough to pay off the national debt of Great Britain.

62. Here is where the man after God's own heart forgot himself one evening and got after another man's wife. The rest is easily imagined.

63. David's sons seemed to inherit their father's leading traits. It was in this city that Amnon, one of David's boys, assaulted his own sister. Another of his boys, Absalom, went in unto his father's concubines on the house-top and in the sight of all Israel. Solomon was another nice young man; he managed to get along with seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines. Had he not been so very wise he might have thought he needed two thousand women. There is nothing like a good gift of wisdom.

64. Being here in the city of David, the little things pertaining to David naturally are brought to mind. Yes, being in the holy city, holy thoughts easily come into one's head.

65. An hour or two spent in looking over the town revealed the narrow, contracted streets, small shops or bazars, the dirt and untidiness of the people, and the general cramped and oriental appearance of the place. A large share of the streets are covered over, the second stories projecting so as to nearly meet above. It is one of the most cheerless places of its size yet seen.

66. The population is variously estimated at from twelve thousand to thirty five thousand. No census is taken, and it is mere guess-work at best. There are supposed to be from ten thousand to fifteen thousand Jews, three thousand Christians of all kinds, while nearly all the balance are Moslems. The people are of decidedly mixed nationalities, including Turks, Syrians, Bedouins, Polish Jews, Persian Jews, German Jews, and some Europeans. The Jews support themselves only in part, living upon donations sent them by their brethren in Europe. As a class they look effeminate, half-starved, and half-demented. They are chiefly the religious class of Jews, who think if they live in Jerusalem, and spend their time in lamentation and prayer, they ought to be supported.

CHAPTER XXVII.

JERUSALEM REVIEWED.

1. Jerusalem, being surrounded on three sides by deep ravines, afforded the site the natural means of defense, and doubtless led to its selection for a city by the ancient people of Canaan before the children of Israel were in the country. It was called Jebus, the stronghold of the Jebusites, a tribe or division of the Canaanites. The Amorites and Hittites were very near, and perhaps shared in the defense afforded by the city. But it had not become holy at that time, for Yahweh and David had not then captured it.

2. Joshua was a very valorous warrior, and made nothing of defeating, despoiling, and putting to death the thirty or forty kings—more properly chiefs or sheiks—that once flourished in this diminutive country of rocks; but he seems not to have prevailed over the Jebusites, or, at all events, he did not retain possession of their chief city.

3. It was not till three hundred years later, when the son of Jesse came to be king, and had a fighting general by the name of Joab, that the city was finally taken, for even then the Benjamites, as good fighters as they were, were unable to dispossess the Jebusites from the stronghold of Mount Zion, and were forced to occupy the lower part of the city until David and Joab, by persistent fighting, were able to take the citadel, when Mount Zion became the city of David, and of course became the holy city, and Yahweh took up his residence there.

4. Previous to that time David had made his capital at Hebron, a town some thirty or forty miles to the south, in a little valley among the rocks; but when he had captured Mount Zion he moved his capital and his wives and concubines there; he transferred the ark from the threshing-floor of Chidon, and it became the holiest city that ever was known, with possibly the exception of Benares, Memphis, or Mecca.

5. David did a great deal for his captured capital, and decided to build a fine temple there; but he had been such a shedder of blood, such a wholesale murderer, that even Yahweh was unwilling that he should build the temple, preferring the man who kept a thousand women.

6. Solomon is said to have greatly beautified the city, and with the help of 153,000 mechanics of other nations for seven years, and timber from an adjoining country, was enabled to build a house for Yahweh one hundred and ten feet long and thirty six wide, with a porch eighteen by thirty-six. But there are those who deny that Solomon ever built such a temple, and even that there ever was such a man as Solomon. He seems, at all events, to have been very little known by the people and historians of other nations. As, however, his temple was a small affair compared with many others built at that period of the world, it is not wholly improbable that the Jews might have engaged in such an enterprise.

7. In Rehoboam's reign, the next after Solomon, Jerusalem was besieged and plundered by Shishak, king of Egypt. This was the beginning of a long series of losses and disasters, in which the city was involved in civil wars and contentions, and suffered repeated attacks from surrounding nations—the Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, and Egyptians.

8. After it had been pillaged by the Philistines and Arabians in the reign of Jehoram; by the king of Israel, Amaziah, and the temple despoiled of its treasures at other times, the city was threatened with utter ruin by the Assyrian army under Sennacherib. Though the danger was averted for the time while Hezekiah was king, his son Manasseh was overcome by the Assyrians and carried captive to Babylon. On his return he repaired the city.

9. Josiah having been slain while warring against Pharoah Necho, king of Egypt, while the latter was on his way to besiege the Assyrian city of Carchemish, Necho visited Jerusalem on his return, took the king, Jehohaz, to Egypt, and exacted a tribute from the city.

10. Soon afterward Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, in his turn, took and pillaged Jerusalem three times. On the last occasion the temple and palaces were burnt down, the walls leveled to the ground, and King Zedekiah and what people there were left were carried off captive to Babylon. This was 587 B C., and is the sum of the Bible story.

11. There are those who deny the truth of the account and that the Jews were ever such a strong and wealthy people as is claimed in the Bible, but claim rather that previous to the Babylonian captivity they were an insignificant, semi-barbarous people, without a history and without a literature, and that what are called their sacred writings were written after their return from Babylon.

12. Upon the return from Babylon, after a captivity of fifty years, a temple is said to have been built by Ezra and Nehemiah by consent and with the assistance of Cyrus of Persia, who in the mean time had conquered Babylon, but the Jews were weak and had much trouble with the mixed races of Samaria and other parts of the country.

13. In 332 B.C. the city, without a siege, passed into the hands of Alexander the Great, who, however, proved a generous conqueror and allowed the feeble people their civil and religious rights. Some years later, Ptolemy Soter, king of Egypt, beseiged it on the Sabbath, and the Jews, being too religious to defend themselves on that day, were captured, and a large number taken into Egypt.

14. Again it was wrested from Egypt by the Seleucidæ of Syria, and one of them, Antiochus Epiphanus, desecrated and oppressed the city with such unendurable tyranny that the insurrection of the Maccabees broke forth 166 B.C., leading to a national revolution and the restoration of the Jews to independence under the sway of Maccabean princes. The tower of Antonia, at first called Baris, was built by Simon Maccabeus in the early part of the contest.

15. In the year 63 B.C. Jerusalem was taken by the Romans under Pompey, made tributary to Rome, and part of its fortifications destroyed. Crassus again plundered the city, and it also suffered from a Parthian army, which Antigonus, the rightful heir of the throne, had called in to help him against Herod, son of Antipater, whom the Roman influence had raised to a position of authority.

16. Herod obtained a decree of the senate appointing him king, and by aid of a Roman army he took the city and put his enemies to death, built a new palace and a splendid temple, and otherwise adorned the city, a great part of which had been destroyed with much loss of life by an earthquake in the year 31 B.C. He also enlarged the Baris, calling it the Antonia. It is claimed by many who have examined closely into evidences upon the subject that Herod really built the first temple that ever existed in Jerusalem, and that there is no proof that one stood there before. The Scribe knoweth not how it was.

17. Herod's son Archelaus succeeded to the throne, but was soon deposed, when Judea became a Roman province, within the prefecture of Syria, presided over by a procurator, who resided at Cesarea Philippi, and left Jerusalem to be governed by its own high priest and sanhedrim. Coponius and Pontius Pilate were the first two procurators. Pilate built the aqueduct crossing the Valley of Hinnom.

18. Pilate was deposed from office, as has been asserted, on account of his tyranny, and Herod Agrippa succeeded to the rulership of the entire country over which his grandfather Herod the Great had ruled. Upon his death, however, his son being too young to reign, a procurator was again appointed, and seven in succession, of which Felix and Porcius Festus were the fourth and fifth, aggravated and enraged the Jews by their oppressions.

19. At length the standard of revolt was raised. A success gained over the governor of Syria encouraged the Jews in their resistance, and compelled Titus to bring his legions from Egypt. In the year 70 of our era occurred the siege and utter destruction of the holy city, accompanied by scenes of extraordinary horror and suffering. Internal feuds and fighting raged intensely among the Jews, and when they were not fighting the Romans they were fighting one another. They were divided into three deadly factions, and between April 1st and July 1st fifteen thousand people were buried at public expense.

20. The Roman general wept as he saw the misery, calling heaven to witness that not his enmity but the madness of the Jews themselves was the cause of these unheard-of sufferings. At length by the latter weeks of July the Antonia was stormed. The daily sacrifice had ceased; no hope seemed left, and the defenders of the temple were exposed to an irresistible assault from the fortress which commanded its courts. But their furious zeal made them defend the sacred precincts inch by inch. Titus himself watched the assault, and urged on his soldiers, but to little purpose.

21. It was not till the 10th of August that all was lost. Titus was anxious to save the magnificent temple, and this accounts for the slow progress of the victory. But on this fatal evening a soldier, against orders, cast a brand into a small gilded doorway on the north side, and in a few moments the whole temple was in a blaze.

22. A loud shriek of horror from the defenders announced the catastrophe to Titus, who had retired to rest, intending to renew the assault the next morning. Wildly rose the uproar; blazing rafters lighted up the darkness, while all around the crackling of the flames and the crashing of the falling roofs mingled with the shouts of the victors and the death-cry of the Jews.

23. Titus rushed forth and in vain gave orders to stay the conflagration. His soldiers were in the Holy of Holies; they seized upon the treasures which were scattered around. Not even Roman discipline sould restrain them, and the destruction was complete. When the flames subsided nothing was left of the temple but a small portion of the outer cloister.

24. Even in this hour of horror the wild fanaticism of the Jews was scarcely quelled. The messiah had been looked for as a deliverance by many, even in this last extremity. The small remainder of the cloister was now burned by the Roman soldiers, and six thousand unarmed people, with women and children, were destroyed in it, who a short time before had been led up by a false prophet to what was left of the temple, and with the delusive hope that a great deliverer was near at hand.

25. The total destruction of the temple was a death-blow to all their hopes; the spirit of the wildest enthusiast was broken; utterly disappointed in the salvation expected from their God, they now sunk in abject despair. The upper part of the city —the stronghold of Zion—still indeed resisted; there Simon had been joined by his rival John. Some time was necessarily lost before the Romans could raise their engines against the steep valley of the Tyropæon. When they did commence their assault they found that the Jews had lost their wonted courage, and, on the 17th of September, the Romans, with shouts of triumph, burst into the stronghold of the poor Jews and found little but deserted streets and houses filled with dead bodies; while John and Simon long baffled all search, being concealed amidst the ruins and in subterranean passages.

26. Thus ended the reign of Yahweh in his chosen land, and thus his people lost control in the country they so dearly loved, and when they expected such wonderful deliverances. They were utterly defeated, with a small remnant left to scatter among the nations of the earth, where they were destined to meet continued suffering and affliction. The experiment which their God had made in this circumscribed country of rocky hills and narrow valleys thus seemed to result in total failure, none greater having been known in the world.

27. Jerusalem was completely cast down; a portion of the western wall and three towers were left standing to shelter the Roman soldiers; but all the city, Zion, Akra, and the temple, was thrown into a mass of utter ruin. According to Josephus, 1,300,000 persons lost their lives in the siege, and the bloodshed and carnage that ensued, though this is undoubtedly an exaggeration.

28. The Jews, however, began to return and inhabit the ruins, but upon their raising a rebellion under Bar-chochebas, against Hadrian, the latter expelled them all, and building palaces, temples, and a theater, transformed it into a Roman city, under the name of Ælia Capitolina. A temple was erected on Mount Moriah, to Jupiter, precisely on the spot where the temple of Yahweh had previously stood.

29. The Roman power declining, Constantine and his mother having embraced Christianity, which at the beginning of the fourth century began to give promise to persons of ambition like theirs, by considerable effort transformed the Roman town into a Christian city, with the purpose of setting up there again the rule of Yahweh.

30. Julian gave permission to the Jews to rebuild the temple, but they were too much broken in wealth and unity of action to accomplish it. However, in the year 614 they came in considerable numbers, with the Persian king Chosroes, and destroyed the churches and massacred the Christians.

31. The Emperor Heraclius afterward occupied it, but in the year 637 it surrendered to the Khalif Omar, and became a Mohammedan city, the mosque of Omar, probably the grandest and richest mosque in the world, being built upon the site of the temple of Yahweh, and the temple of Jupiter, the succession of the rule of gods being in this order: Yahweh, Jupiter, Allah. The mosque still remains in all its glory, having enjoyed a longer rule and more uninterrupted prosperity than the temples of Yahweh and Jupiter combined. Thus do the gods succeed each other, and perhaps will until the power of the last is utterly spent.

32. In 1076 Jerusalem fell into the hands of the Turks, but the wild zeal and fanaticism of the Christians of Europe was aroused because the holy city and the holy sepulcher were in the possession of the worshipers of Allah, and they determined that the banner of Yahweh and his crucified son should again be set up there.

33. The first crusade was organized in 1097, and the Christian host commanded by Godfrey de Bouillon entered Palestine. One by one the chief places were taken. After two years Jerusalem itself was besieged and captured, the garrison and inhabitants massacred with the cruelty which Christians have many and many a time shown themselves capable of exercising. The Crusaders, however, for a while attained the end of their persistent and bloody warfare in the possession of the holy city and the holy sepulcher.

34. Godfrey was elected king of Jerusalem, and was succeeded by his relations and descendants until the year 1187, when the reigning king Guy de Lusignan was taken prisoner in a desperate battle with the Saracen Emir Saladin, and the city fell again into the power of the Moslems. Saladin erected strong fortifications around it only to be again demolished.

35. Richard I. of England, and Philippe Auguste of France, who headed the third crusade, were unable to retake the city, though they went through the farce of appointing kings to rule of it. The last of them, John de Brienne, obtained the aid of his son-in-law Frederick II. of Germany, against the Moslems. The city was yielded to the emperor, through a treaty with the Sultan Meledin of Egypt, in the year 1229, on condition that the walls should not be rebuilt; but the Christians, with characteristic bad faith and false honor, disregarded this stipulation.

36. Ten years later Jerusalem again fell under Mohammedan rule, being taken by the sultan of Damascus; but four years from that time his successor yielded it to the Christians, with other cities, to purchase their assistance in a war which he was meditating against the sultan of Egypt. In the year 1244, however, a Tartar horde, the Kharezmians, took it by storm and treated the inhabitants with true religious cruelty.

37. Shortly afterward they were dispersed by the Mohammedans of Syria, and it has continued to be a Moslem city since that time. In the year 1517 the place was taken, with the rest of Syria and Egypt, by the Ottoman Sultan Selim I., and in 1542 its present walls were built by Suliman the Magnificent.

38. Napoleon planned a siege of the city, but probably concluding that it was not worth the trouble of taking, he abandoned it in the year 1800. In consequence of a revolt, induced by over-taxation, it was bombarded by the Turks in 1825. In 1831 it submitted to the pasha of Egypt, Mahomed Ali, but by European interference he was deprived of his possessions in Syria, and in 1840 Jerusalem again owned Turkish sway under the Sultan Abdul Mejid.

39. Thus the gods and their devotees have had terrible and long-continued conflicts over this almost worthless city and country. Yahweh set up his reign there, after David conquered it from the Jebusites, and proclaimed his purpose with a great flourish of trumpets and declared again and again that his power there should continue forever and forever. But after the reign of two kings the small country became divided and its people several times carried away into captivity. The power of Yahweh grew weaker and weaker, and at last the contest for supremacy was closed in eternal disgrace.

40. The terms of the different gods and rulers which have ruled over the city may be roughly stated as follows: The rule of Yahweh under David and Solomon, 80 years; a divided, fitful, and disgraceful rule of their successors 500 years; the Jews away in captivity at different times, 75 years; the weak rule of the priests Ezra, Nehemiah, and others, say 200 years; under the Greeks, 25 years; the Syrians, Antiochus, etc, 150 years; Jewish chiefs, as the Maccabees, etc., 100 years; the Romans, off and on at different times, 200 years; Herod and his descendants, 50 years; Persians and others, 150 years; Constantine and his mother, say 50 years; Mohammedans of different types and at different times, 650 years; Christians under the Crusaders, 150 years; mixed, uncertain, and unclassable, 200 years.

41. Thus it may be seen that of the over 2,500 years that have rolled by since Yahweh captured Jerusalem from its previous owners, the glorious rule lasted 80 years, and the weak and precarious rule, without honor or credit, 700 years; under Christians, 200 years. So out of the 2,500 years it cannot be said to have been under the partial rule of Yahweh & Co. any more than 980 years, while their opponents have had it 1,600 years. This is rather of a bad showing for the firm, the head of which made such great boasts and promises, and such a pretentious effort.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE BIBLE ON JERUSALEM.

1. The Bible of course has much to say of Jerusalem. The name of the city is mentioned eight hundred and eighteen times in the Old and New Testaments. David, or rather Psalms, describes it thus: Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together. . . . Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces (Ps. cxxii. 7). Of Zion it says: Walk about Zion, and go round about her; tell the towers thereof. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces; that ye may tell it to the generation following (Ps. xlviii, 12). In Solomon's Song it is used as a metaphor—Comely as Jerusalem.

2. The lamentations over it in its misfortunes have been loud and deep. The following are specimens: How doth the city sit solitary, that was full of people! how is she become a widow! She that was great among the nations, and princess among the princesses, how is she become tributary! She weepeth sore in the night, and her tears are on her cheeks. . . . She dwelleth among the heathen, she findeth no rest, . . . and from the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed. Zion spreadeth forth her hands, and there is none to comfort her (Sam i, 1, 3, 6).

3. Jesus spoke thus mournfully of the city: O Jerusalem! Jerusalem! thou that killest the prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold your house is left unto you desolate.

CHAPTER XXIX.

MODERN JERUSALEM.

1. A feeling of disappointment, as already indicated, inevitably seizes the beholder as he realizes the small and in fact contemptible size of the city about which so much has been said, and concerning which such great boasts have been made. It is but about a mile across the longest way. It probably does not now cover all the ground it once did, but it was never very much larger.

2. One is surprised, also, to find how little remains of the material of the ancient city. The present walls were built in the sixteenth century, and but a few courses of stones in parts of them belonged to the ancient city. The present buildings are nearly all new, though a foundation here and there gives evidence of former times.

3. The ancient rock crops out in the temple arena, at the church of the Holy Sepulcher, and on the brow of Mount Zion; but the gorgeous city of Solomon lies buried under the debris of twenty-seven sieges and captures. It is said that on an average the present city is twenty-five feet above where the ancient city stood, and by some excavations that have been made some parts are reported one hundred and thirty feet above the city of olden times.

4. It is said, too, that workmen sometimes dug through a series of buildings, one above another, showing that one city has literally been built upon the ruins of another, and that the present city is actually standing upon the ruins of several preëxisting cities.

5. All this necessarily throws much doubt upon the identity of places mentioned in Bible story, and no man is able to say, with any certainty, where many of the ancient localities were.

6. The natural features of the country, however, remain unchanged; the rocks of which it is compose and was composed three thousand years ago are still here as they were then. Kings and priests are sure to pass away; they are transitory and short-lived, but the rocks and the everlasting hills remain. Gods and their devotees are short-lived, but nature is eternal, and passes not away.

7. Jerusalem stands on four hills of not very large size, which were once separated by deep valleys, now pretty well filled with the debris of successive destructions of this unfortunate city. Zion, the most celebrated hill, is in the southwest quarter of the city, some three hundred feet above the hill or the valley of Hinnom, and about five hundred feet above the brook Kidron, or what was that insignificant stream, on the southeast.

8. Zion, as observed, was the old citadel of the Jebusites, and after its capture became the holy city of David. The Tyropæon sweeps around its northern and eastern bases, separating it from Akra and Moriah. It is by no means a pretentious part of the city now, whatever its claims were in the time of the man whose name it has borne.

9. Mount Moriah has a Bible history dating far back. That is the very spot where Abraham is claimed to have made the attempt to offer up his son Isaac to please his God.

10. Mount Moriah is in the southeast corner of the city, on the side toward the Mount of Olives; it is separated from Mount Zion by the Tyropæon, and from the Mount of Olives by the valley of Jehosaphat. It is probably one hundred feet lower than Mount Zion, and is nearer its ancient hight than any other part of the city. Here stood the temple of Herod, and the temples of Solomon and Ezra, if such edifices had an existence. The proud mosque of Omar now occupies the site.

11. On the northeast is Mount Bezetha, a higher hill than Mount Moriah, which was inclosed within the walls by Herod Agrippa. Mount Akra, the highest ground in the city, is on the northwest. It is separated from Zion by the Tyropæon, and from Bezetha by a broad valley running into the Tyropæon at the foot of Zion.

12. It will be seen, therefore, that the city slopes down from the northwest to the southeast, and standing on the northwest angle of the wall you are at the highest point, and see Moriah far below on the southeast, with Tyropæon on the west side of it, running down between it and Zion to the junction of the Kidron with Hinnom.

13. The wall of the the city is irregular, conforming to the hills over which it passes, but substantially the city lies four-square. The stone of the walls and of the buildings is of a light color; thus the city has a far from smoky or dismal appearance, though the absence of trees and verdure gives it a lifeless and arid look.

14. The Jerusalem of to-day may be considered the eighth city on the same site; the first of the Jebusites; the second of David and Solomon, which lasted four hundred years; the third of Nehemiah, which lasted three hundred years; fourth, the magnificent city of Herod, lasting less than a hundred years; fifth, the Roman city, which grew upon the ruins Titus had made; sixth, the Mohammedan city; seventh, the Christian city; and, eighth, the Mohammedan again.

15. The town covers an area of two hundred and nine acres. The Christians, including the Armenians, occupy the western half; the Mohammedans the northeastern portion, the Jews the southeastern. The whole population is probably 30,000. The circumference is less than two and a quarter miles.

16. The city stands on a bald, arid mountain ridge, surrounded by chalky limestone hills, glaringly white. The wall is about thirty-five feet in hight, and, although massive in appearance, is far from being substantial. Around the walls are thirty-four towers, and seven gates, two of which are closed.

17. The open gates are the Jaffa gate, on the west; the Damascus gate, on the north; St. Stephen's gate, the traditional place where Stephen was stoned, on the east; the Dung gate, on the south; Zion gate, or the gate of David, on the ridge of Zion. The Golden gate and the gate of Herod are closed.

18. The natives are principally Moslems, with a colony of Africans. Many dervishes are here. The Jews number twelve thousand, and are from Poland and other parts of Europe, and some from the East. Some come from religious motives, but more from a spirit of idleness, as they are here supported by charity. They are much inferior to the Jews of the United States.

19. A wealthy Jew of London, Sir Moses Montefiore, made a very munificent donation of a million dollars for the benefit of Jews in Palestine. But all Jews who are now doing tolerably well had better remain where they are.

20. The Greek Church is said to flourish in Jerusalem, the Patriarch of Jerusalem being at the head of it. They have some twenty monasteries in the vicinity. The Armenians number three hundred, and they also have a Patriarch of Jerusalem. The Copts, descendants of the ancient Egyptians, have two monasteries.

21. The Roman Catholics number nearly two thousand, and have a monastery, an industrial school, two girls' schools, and a hospital. The Protestants are few in number, though they are trying to get more foothold here. They are doing considerable of what they call evangelical work, and are spending considerable of the money contributed by those who think they are thereby doing God special service.

22. Jerusalem ought, from its locality and elevated position, to be a very healthy place, though slow fevers abound far too much. The debris of the former cities undoubtedly contain the germs of disease. If it has been a city four thousand years, and if that number of people have died in it every generation of thirty years, it would make a sum total of over 530,000 dead bodies buried here. That number of decaying corpses may well be supposed to cause some ill health.

CHAPTER XXX.

MELCHISEDEC'S THIRTEENTH VISIT.

1. The Scribe was not certain that his Venerable Visitor would find him in his new quarters in the Mediterranean Hotel in the holy city; but there seems to have been no trouble in the matter, for he made his entrance into the room and walked up to the bed-side the same as in the tent. Approaching the Scribe the phantom spoke thus:

2. Well, my juvenile friend, thou art in the holy city at last, and thou must not think strange if thou hast more solemn and sacred thoughts than thou art wont to have. Thou of course wilt let thy mind revert back to the various scenes that have transpired here, and see whether the deeds that have been performed in Jerusalem were materially better than in other cities of similar size, and at a similar period of the world's history.

3. In my own opinion, the Jews were no more free from the imperfections in the guidance of deity than other nations of people, among whom there is certainly some differences from a moral point of view, as well as in the intellectual, social, and religious domain; but in none of these does it appear that the Jews excelled either their neighbors or those at a distance.

4. In many respects they were really inferior to those who made no pretension to being a selected and chosen people of God. Considering the special advantages which the Jews claimed to have, they should have been a perfect people.

5. Thou wilt perhaps remember that my home is said to have once been here, that under the name of Salem I reigned as a king over Jerusalem, and that here Abraham became acquainted with me and paid me tribute; but just between thee and me I will remark that that old story is very thin—so thin that there is little or nothing of it. Those who invest in it will not get their money's worth.

6. This, however, is not my subject for this interview, but rather to continue the subject of my last visit by still farther commenting on the perfection and high morality of Jesus's teachings. Let us consider somewhat further the character of his morals which have so often been held up as perfectly faultless and superhuman.

7. It is certainly defective wisdom and morality to pay a premium for crime, and to command the giving of the cloak to one who takes the coat.

8. It is not the most excellent morality to advise one's friends to sell their garment and buy a sword. To cover one's nakedness is far better than to sport a sword by the side. It will be remembered he said he came not to bring peace, but a sword, and the chief characteristic of his professed followers has been to wield it mercilessly.

9. It is not usually regarded as moral to command that fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, and children be forsaken. Such teachers as Confucius and Socrates recommended love to them instead of hatred.

10. It was hardly moral, and certainly not gentlemanly, to call a woman a dog when she requested him to confer a kindness upon a sick child.

11. It was not the highest type of benignity to utter this sentiment. Those of mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay before me.

12. It was not love and goodness, if it was morality, that moved him to send helpless souls to everlasting torture. He is reported to have said, He that believeth not shall be damned. Belief is not a matter of choice, but is controlled by evidence. If a person cannot find sufficient to found a belief upon, it is very hard to damn him forever for it.

13. Truthfulness is a marked feature of morality. He did not tell the truth when he promised his disciples that they should sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. They never did, and never will. At the time the promise was made, ten of the tribes had long been scattered and lost, and nobody knew what had become of them. If it is pleaded that he meant the thrones should be in a future life, it does not help the matter, for they understood him to mean this life, and he undoubtedly did mean it, if he meant anything.

14. It was not kindness and goodness that made him curse entire cities in advance because they would not or could not accept as truth what his followers told them.

15. It was doubtful morality that prompted him to command his followers to take another person's ass without consent, that he might be able to make more display and be received with more eclat. It would have been more proper for him to walk along modestly and quietly, the same as those around him.

16. It was not moral for him to take a lot of his followers through another's cornfield, and allow them to gather the corn for their own use. And the doing of this on the Sabbath when he and they should have been at church or saying their prayers, should seem very culpable in the eyes of his Christian followers. But he never said anything about keeping the Sabbath, whether the seventh day or the first, and not a word about going to church can be found in his teachings. Now it is considered the very hight of immorality not to do both.

17. His conduct in the temple when he whipped and beat those who sold pigeons for sacrifice, and those who accommodated the purchasers by making change for them was no better. They were violating no law, human or divine; they were doing a favor to their fellow-men, and following a custom that had long been practiced without condemnation. The temple was not his, nor his father's, for that matter, for it was built by Herod, a very bad man, who tried to take the life of Jesus when he was first born. Herod did not build that temple for Jesus. In attacking the men so roughly he committed assault and battery, and in most countries could have been fined and sent to prison for it.

18. He did not forgive the woman caught in the act of adultery upon the highest moral grounds: Let him that is without sin cast the first stone. If she had sinned, and the law required she should die for it, it made no difference whether they had been faultless or not.

19. It was not kindness and love that moved him to say, Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I deny before my father which is in heaven. It shows a spirit of revenge and retaliation.

20. It was hardly moral practice, and certainly not gentlemanly conduct, after accepting an invitation to dinner, and neglecting the commendable and cleanly practice of washing his hands before sitting down at the table, to insult the man of the house by call him a fool and a hypocrite.

21. He did not speak the truth when he said the end of the world would come, and he be seen in glory in the heavens, before some standing around him should taste death. Not only that generation, but sixty others, passed away, and nothing of the kind has taken place or is likely to for several thousand years.

22. He uttered a falsehood, than which no larger could be spoken, when he said that those who believed on him should be able to handle poisonous serpents and to drink any deadly thing without harm. Not one of his followers has ever been able to do anything of the kind. If the pope of Rome, the archbishop of Canterbury, the Rev. Howard Crosby, or any clergyman, were offered ten thousand dollars to handle poison cobras or to drink prussic acid, he would not do it. How absurd and immoral, then, to make such representations and to give such promises!

23. Neither did he speak the truth when he gave the assurance that those who believed upon him would be able to lay their hands upon the sick and they should be healed. Of the two hundred and fifty millions who believe in Jesus, not one of them could cure the smallpox by laying his hands upon the afflicted.

24. It was not the correct thing to assure a frail and fallible man (Peter), who had proved himself guilty of lying and cowardice, that he should hold the keys of heaven, and whomsoever he bound on earth should be bound in heaven, and whomsoever he loosed on earth should be loosed in heaven. Such extravagant promises ought not to he kept.

25. It was very misleading and untrue to promise his followers that whatever they asked for, believing, they should receive. This has been falsified millions of times. Believing makes not the slightest difference as to what a person receives. Those who believe the most and expect the most are most liable to be disappointed.

26. He exhibited his ignorance or falsehood by giving the assurance that fasting would enable his followers to heal the sick. It would have been far more truthful to teach that the sick and afflicted should do the fasting themselves. Brown's fasting can be of very little benefit to Smith. To realize the true value of fasting, Smith must fast himself.

27. It was not just and correct to sanction divorce on the ground of fornication alone. There are other reasons and grounds equally reasonable.

28. He clearly lacked the prescience and discernment a god should possess to choose for a companion one who would betray him and cause his death. If the betraying was part of the divine programme, then Judas ought to have been honored and rewarded.

29. He was defective in moral teaching in not condemning oppression, slavery, or polygamy.

30. The same may be said of his not raising his voice in favor of the advancement and freedom of women from oriental slavery.

31. It was not the best way of imparting instruction to give his lessons in such enigmatical and blind language that simple people could not understand him.

32. It was not sound moral advice to say: Agree with thine adversary quickly—thy legal opponent—lest he prosecute thee and cast thee into prison. It smacks strongly of cowardice and temporizing. It would have been far better to say, Do what is right and just in all cases, let the consequences be what they may.

33. It was unreasonable to require fallible mortals to be perfect, even as his father in heaven is perfect. This was going as much too high as other precepts went too low. If God is not more perfect than poor mortals are capable of being, his goodness is not sufficient to boast about.

34. It was not filial or honorable in him to insult his mother before strangers, or at any other time, by such language as this: Woman, what have I to do with thee?

35. It was questionable propriety to command giving alms in secret only. The good example of benevolence often induces others to go and do likewise.

36. It is a time-serving, cowardly policy to command to abstain from judging that one may not be judged, and to do good to win the benefits that might accrue. The Stoics did better than that; they taught a higher motive. The reward should not always be the incentive to good conduct. Virtuous and good deeds should be performed because they are right.

37. In like manner it is doubtful propriety to be holding up the remuneration of a life to come for good deeds performed here. It would be more correct to portray the effects in this life. To direct attention to the laws of life is decidedly more wise than to be always ignoring them and calling attention wholly to another state of existence, and which cannot be understood and appreciated here.

38. It was very untruthful to assure those who believed on him that if they would say to a mountain, Remove to yonder place, it would be removed. No such thing was ever effected by any one who believed on him. All who believe on him to-day could not by that process, though they all spoke in concert, do so much as to remove an ant-hill.

39. To assure his hearers that the Supreme Being would bestow upon them whatever they might ask for in his name is of the same misleading character. Millions of pious devotees, with great confidence in this assurance, have tried the experiment only to find themselves deceived.

40. It was scarcely honorable to denounce the devil as a liar and the father of liars, when no lie he ever told was pointed out, and it was not shown that he had any children.

41. It was equally false to denounce the devil as a murderer, when he had never killed anybody, either in a sudden passion or with malice prepense.

42. He did not exhibit a brave, manly spirit in trembling at the fear of an arrest, in asking that the cup might pass from him—when he came down from heaven on purpose to drink it—and in sweating great drops of blood from simple dread of death, when it was the only thing that could close his unpleasant career on earth and permit him to return to his mansions above the clouds.

43. He could not have made a truthful promise to the good thief on the cross when he assured him that he should be with him that day in paradise, for he understood perfectly well that he had to make a three days' tour to hell, or the center of the earth, and be back at resurrection one day and two nights from the time he started.

44. He showed the white feather at the hour of death. He cried out in desperation, seeming unwilling to endure the necessary pain to produce dissolution, and unreconciled at the part he had to perform in the divine and mournful drama, although the consequences were to be so comforting to his father and so beneficial to the human family. He even thought his father had forsaken him, and was afraid to die. Thousands upon thousands have shown a braver spirit and a stouter heart at the hour of death.

45. I will say no more at this time, but will try to make it convenient to see thee again. I wish thee much joy in visiting the holy places in this old city, and trust thou mayest derive all the benefit therefrom that the sight is calculated to impart. Peace and tranquillity be with thee. Good-night.

CHAPTER XXXI.

FOURTEENTH DAY.—A VISIT TO THE HOLY PLACES.

1. And it came to pass that the day after the pilgrim's arrival in the holy city was the Christian Sabbath, the day of holy avocations and pious meditations. The men of God Getz and James, and one or two more of the pilgrims, attended the English church, but the Scribe remained in his room and wrote. And in the afternoon the captain took all the pilgrims to the church of the Holy Sepulcher, where so many holy places, in the most marvelous manner, and probably by divine appointment, are all congregated under one roof.

2. It would be wicked to do any sight-seeing on the Lord's day, but examining into the mysteries of godliness, and having pointed out the very places where God has moved in a mysterious way his wonders to perform, is all right enough. So with very pious hearts, and faces duly elongated, the nine pilgrims and the guide approached the holy sanctuary at the lower end of Christian street, but a few minutes' walk from the hotel. Every person who visits the place is expected to carry a very reverential feeling along with him, for millions of devout Christians worship at this shrine.

3. There are some differences of opinion and some disputes, even among the saints, as to the very localities where the wonderful events took place, but that should not influence the sincere soul. It is better to believe that the same event took place in two or three different places than to believe it did not occur at all.

4. Now the Scribe was about to see the place where Jesus was crucified eighteen hundred years ago, and the very spot where the cross was set up; he was to gaze upon the identical stone upon which he was laid to be anointed preparatory to being placed in the sepulcher; he was to behold the sepulcher itself, and the very stone which closed the door and which the angel rolled away; he was to cast his optics upon the ground where the angel stood, where Mary Magdalene stood when she thought she was speaking to the gardener; the soil where Jesus and the virgin stood on that occasion, and many more identical places equally remarkable. He hoped he approached the holy precincts with a due feeling of reverence.

5. A few squalid and deformed beggars, as expected, were seen about the entrance, for they are always to be met with around these holy places. Holiness and beggary seem to go hand in hand; but passing these encumbrances, the company soon found themselves in the holiest place in the world! Oh, how holy!

6. After entering, the Scribe was attracted by the sight of twenty devotees kneeling down and kissing a flat stone imbedded in the floor and projecting a few inches above it. For a moment he wondered what there could be in that stone that made those anxious people so eager to kiss it, but he soon learned that that was the stone of unction upon which the dead god was laid to prepare him for interment; but the stone in view was not the real stone after all, for it was found necessary to put a slab of marble over the real stone to prevent its being kissed away or otherwise destroyed. But the substituted stone answers the faithful devotees just as well as any, and the way they kiss it and weep over it is curious to behold.

7. Within ten feet or thereabouts is a circular iron railing, five or six feet in diameter, which marks the spot where the Virgin stood when the body of her dead son was anointed. The Scribe for a moment felt a desire to know how the very spot was learned with such precision, but remembering that spiritual things are not discovered by the carnal man, because they are spiritually discerned, he walked on, holding down his head and saying nothing.

8. The sepulcher of Jesus is in the rotunda of the church, and immediately beneath the dome. This is unquestionably the holiest spot in the universe, unless it is that quiet, dark cavern at Nazareth where Yahweh met the young virgin by appointment. Of course nothing can take precedence of that place and that event in real, simon-pure holiness. That bears the palm over every other spot in this world, and a few millions of other worlds thrown in.

9. The sepulcher is inclosed in a sort of small temple of light-colored stone, in sacred style, with a single door, and lighted with numerous lamps; and when the Scribe saw the dozens of pious devotees crowding in the narrow door, one after another, and crowding out again in few minutes, he knew he had reached the sacred spot. In a short time he was able to enter the little temple, and there, right before him, was a piece of the stone which the angel rolled away and then sat upon. What has become of the rest of the stone the Scribe did not learn, but presumes it was taken to Rome to work miracles with. The piece retained looks like marble, and is some eighteen inches square, and does not look as though it would take a very strong angel to roll it away.

10. The sepulcher itself is a small inner room, the very Holy of Holies. The doorway between the two rooms is small, and the way the devout worshipers were crowding in to kiss the holy sepulcher was most astonishing. Before the Scribe hardly had time to meditate he thought to himself, while seeing what was transpiring before him, You poor, simple fools, what good does that nonsense do you? But in a moment he bethought himself, and thus addressed himself: Don't call those people fools, because they don't know any better. You might have been just as big a fool as they had you not had better instruction.

11. After a while the pilgrims were able to get into the little room, six or seven feet square, where the sepulcher is located. The sepulcher is a stone shelf, occupying the length of the small room and half its width, and is covered with a marble slab, worn somewhat with the millions of kisses that have been given it. Over the sepulcher are some fifty gold and silver lamps, kept constantly, but dimly, burning, giving the place the air of exquisite holiness. The Scribe is now becoming so accustomed to holiness that he can tell it as soon as he meets it. He did not leave one of his kisses on that stone.

12. The Greeks, the Latins, the Armenians, the Syrians, and even the Copts, have chapels in this church—all forms of Christians save Protestants, who seem to be excluded, or else they take less stock in this tomfoolery than the parent churches. It takes the Roman and Greek Catholics to entertain the genuine reverence for these holy relics and places. If faith is a saving power they surely must be saved.

13. In an adjoining part of the church is a disk of white marble in the floor, where the risen Savior absolutely made his first appearance after his return from hell. Here is where Mary Magdalene beheld him and mistook him for the gardener, he having changed in appearance somewhat on his lengthy and heated journey. The feelings that come over one can be easier imagined than described. The Scribe passed thoughtfully on.

14. Another similar disk pointed out the spot where the erring Mary stood herself. Still another place is indicated where Jesus appeared to his mother after the resurrection. It is equally easy to imagine the event as to fix the spot where it occurred. For skill in this line Christians are hard to beat.

15. Farther in is a large and gorgeous chapel, fixed up and ornamented by the Russian Christians in very rich style, but in execrable taste, with much gilded work. Many very expensive pictures of different kinds are there, surrounded by diamonds, gems, pearls, and precious stones enough to dazzle the eyes of a Jewish lapidary. The room is lighted with fifty holy lamps, containing holy oil. There are three mortises in the marble floor, which are precisely over three corresponding mortises in the rock below, where three crosses are said to once have stood. The middle one is that on which Jesus was impaled when he gave up the ghost, and the others mark the places where the two thieves were crucified at the same time. Oh, how solemn to see the very mortise where the cross stood! This is the place for solemn meditation.

16. True, there is some dispute among good people as to where the crucifixion took place. Some say it was without the city, while this is nearly in the center of it. Even the evangelical authorities do not quite agree, and they evidently differ from those who located these places. One of the New Testament writers, in his account of the affair, says, The bodies of those beasts whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin are burned without the camp, wherefore, Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his blood, suffered without the gate (Heb. xxii, 11, 12). This is tolerably definite that it was not within the city.

17. Matthew says, He was taken from the judgment hall unto a place called Golgotha—that is to say, a place of a skull (Matt. xxvii, 33). That sounds as though the place was without the city. Luke says, A great company of people and women followed Jesus, which bewailed and lamented him, and they came to the place called Calvary, and there they crucified him (Luke xxiii, 27, 33). This disagrees with Matthew, but still sounds as though the place was not in the city. Had it been he ought to have said so.

18. Mark agrees with Matthew, and the place, according to him, would seem to be outside and away from the city. John agrees with Matthew and Mark about the place being Golgotha, and, further, shows that it was not in the city, but was nigh unto the city, and appears to have been beside some public thoroughfare (John xix, 20); and Matthew further indicates that it was at a place where many passed by, saying, They that passed by reviled him (Matt. xxvii, 39). John again makes the matter pretty clear by saying, Now, in the place where he was crucified there was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulcher, wherein was never man yet laid (John xix, 38). This makes the place without the city.

19. The unanimity of statement among these authorities is not great enough to justify any place being fixed upon as the scene of execution; at all events, there is very little reason for thinking that the site of the church of the Holy Sepulcher is the correct place, for some say it was without the gate and none say it was within the gate.

20. As a sample of the discrepancies which exist as to the story or legend, it may be stated that Matthew, Mark, and Luke say that Simon the Cyrene, as already noticed, was compelled to bear Jesus's cross from the Judgment Hall to the place of execution, while John says Jesus bore it himself. If they contradict each other in that manner they are not to be believed at all.

21. In view of the fact that after the expulsion of the Jews from Jerusalem to Titus and Hadrian, the serious changes and confusion that attended the many contracted sieges, and the utter destruction of the city, with the frequent changes of rulers and peoples, it must be seen that the knowledge where the execution took place would inevitably be lost, and the settling upon a spot as the place must necessarily be a mere arbitrary decision and without any shadow of authority.

22. It was not till along in the third century, two hundred years after everybody was dead who knew anything about it, that an attempt was made to decide where the crucifixion took place, and then it seems to have been settled by the aid of a dream or vision—the most unreliable and worthless of all ways in the world, and no better than drawing straws or throwing dice. Empress Helena, the mother of the vision-seeing, bloody-handed Constantine, after she and her son adopted Christianity, came to Jerusalem and had a vision or dream in which she was shown the place where the cross stood.

23. This mode of determining a locality must be very unsatisfactory to matter-of-fact people, unless they could be convinced that Helena's visions and dreams were strictly reliable. But at all events, her son indorsed her and built a series of edifices over the site in 326. These were destroyed by the Persians in 614 and rebuilt in 616. In 936 a fire destroyed the church, and the Moslems inflicted serious damage upon it in 1010. The present church was built by the Crusaders, and has gone through a long series of disasters and rebuildings.

24. Through all these adversities and changes there is about one chance in ten thousand of the right spot being selected, and it necessarily would require something like a vision or dream to set the matter at rest, and Helena was equal to the occasion.

25. The manner in which she determined which was the true cross was particularly interesting. After she had settled where the cross stood, she was blasting and rummaging around in the caverns in connection with the place—probably guided by a dream or vision—it is said she was inspired as good luck would have—it when she stumbled upon three crosses, one of which she knew at once was the very one on which Jesus was crucified. But how to settle which one it was troubled her sorely. It might be supposed she could have dreamed it out, or settled it by vision, but the charm did not work. She must needs try another ruse.

26. So she had the three crosses conveyed to a house where a noble woman was very ill, and who could find no releif. Cross number one was taken into the presence of the sensitive invalid, and she immediately became very much worse, and the pious Helena knew in a moment that one of the thieves was crucified upon that cross. It was removed and another taken into the sick woman's presence, and lo and behold, the poor woman went into convulsions which seemed must take her life, requiring six strong men to hold her. This cross was also condemned and removed as speedily as possible, lest the woman's life should be ended at once, and the empress knew that that was the other thief's cross.

27. But the poor, sick woman had been made so much worse by the two crosses that the saintly empress hesitated about presenting the third; but, wishing to test that also, it was a length taken into the afflicted lady's presence, when—wonder of wonders!—she immediately sprang up in ecstatic joy, singing, and praising the Lord, and restored in an instant to better health than she had ever before enjoyed. Thus the persevering Helena knew for a verity that the third cross was that of Jesus, and her joy knew no bounds.

28. If any are so incredulous as not to believe this pious narrative, the Scribe wishes to assure them there can be no doubt about it, for the Christians of Jerusalem assert that it is so; and it is to be hoped the world has not become so depraved that Christian narratives, especially of the Jerusalem type, cannot be accepted as truths. Rather let everybody rejoice that the true cross was thus found in such a miraculous manner, and by that means the cathedrals of Europe supplied with wood enough of the true cross to build a small house.

Bradlaugh and the Bigots.

During the last few weeks Mr. Bradlaugh has had an exciting time. His case will stand in history as memorable as the case of Wilkes. He has succeeded in placing the House of Commons in a position from which it must ultimately retreat and disavow its acts or England be no longer recognized among progressiv nations.

Mr. Bradlaugh was elected to Parliament as a member of the same party as Mr. Gladstone. He had a right to expect from him assistance in obtaining his seat. Indeed, Gladstone gave him reason to think that the government would interfere in his behalf. But Gladstone's conduct has been cowardly in the extreme. He has more than once as good as admitted that Bradlaugh's right to a seat in the House of Commons is as good as his own, but he not only refuses to take any activ steps for securing him and his constituents their rights, but givs as much negativ aid as he dares to the men who are bent upon violating a principle which cannot be safely violated by any parliamentary majority in this age of the world, in countries like England and America.

But as he is a Christian, perhaps it is too much to expect that he should be an honorable man. At the last session Mr. Bradlaugh waited for weeks for an affirmation bill to be passed by the government, but he waited in vain. So at the opening of the present session he went to the speaker's desk and offered to take the regular oath. But the Christians of the House, led by the intensely pious Stafford Northcote, would not allow this. Instead of waiving objections to this motion, and giving notice that he would immediately bring in a bill to allow members elect to substitute an affirmation for an oath, Mr. Gladstone confined himself to casting doubt on the power of the House to prevent a member's complying with the forms prescribed by law. The House had no right, he said, to institute an inquisition into a member's conscience, and decide whether, in a given case, an oath would be held binding, a view undoubtedly sound, and one, we are sorry to see, that Gladstone did not dare to back up by the power of the government. The House adopted Northcote's motion by a large majority, and Mr. Bradlaugh for the time withdrew. After waiting about a week to see what steps would be taken to relieve him from his disability, he instituted an inquiry touching Mr. Gladstone's intentions, and learning that the head of his own party shrank from any immediate attempt to right him by a change in the law, he determined to right himself.

He was neither in the House nor out, and he is not the kind of a man to hesitate when his duty calls. He owed it to his constituents of Northampton to do something. He began by giving the House a fair chance to extricate itself and him from the existing quandary by moving, through his friend Mr. Labouchere, that, since he had been disqualified, a new writ should be issued for an election in his constituency. This logical proposition was rejected by an overwhelming majority—the Conservativs opposing it because they knew that a new election would send Mr. Bradlaugh back again and compel them once more to virtually disfranchise a constituency, while the Ministry, some of whom were doubtless influenced by the same motivs, counseled in a perfunctory way their followers to adopt Mr. Gladstone's recent suggestion and permit Mr. Bradlaugh to swear, subject to subsequent legal liabilities. Convinced by the fate of Mr. Labouchere's motion that his opponents meant to leave him in an equivocal position, Mr. Bradlaugh determined to force their hands, and astounded the House by walking forward to the Clerk's table, drawing a Testament from his pocket, and, after kissing the book, pronouncing the Parliamentary oath. Having thus undertaken to qualify himself in accordance with the statute, Mr. Bradlaugh was about to occupy his seat, when the speaker ordered him to withdraw below the bar. This injunction he at first complied with, but subsequently disobeyed, obviously with a view of leaving Mr. Gladstone no pretext for not taking official notice of his act. No immediate action, however, was taken, and on Mr. Gladstone's motion, the House adjourned.

When the debate was resumed, Mr. Gladstone again exhibited a disposition to evade the issuance of a new writ. He declared that the House had exceeded its powers in forbidding Mr. Bradlaugh to take the oath, and that the latter's disregard of its prohibition was not such an offense as would justify it in declaring his seat vacated under the rules. The premier drew a distinction between disobedience of the House and disobedience of the speaker, and insisted that Mr. Bradlaugh, not having taken his seat, had not been guilty of the latter misconduct, which alone, he said, should carry with it the penalty of expulsion. Thereupon, the speaker, being appealed to by Northcote, averred that Mr. Bradlaugh had violated his express orders in the matter of his seat; but Mr. Gladstone still contending that the disobedience was at all events not flagrant when no force had been required to compel compliance with the speaker's will, Mr. Bradlaugh cut the knot of the tangled and insincere discussion by again advancing from behind the bar and taking his seat. In presence of this fresh and unmistakable act of insubordination, Mr. Gladstone was forced to abandon his efforts to defer any decided action in the case, and Sir Stafford Northcote's motion that Mr. Bradlaugh be expelled, and that a new writ be issued for Northampton was carried by a majority of more than three to one.

The heir to the British throne abandoned his yachts, horses, dogs, and mistresses long enough to go into the lobby and help support Mr. Northcote in his motion. Probably he was actuated in this conduct by the fact that Bradlaugh has repeatedly shown up the colossal stealings of the royal family from the public treasury, prominent among them being the self-same Prince of Wales, who spends more of the people's money upon a blooded bulldog or a single mistress than an English workingman sees in his whole lifetime. It was to be expected that this dissipated roué would be found on the Christian side. Mr. Bradlaugh's case was ostensibly a government case, but the government was defeated because they did not make the question a Cabinet question. They hav irretrievably damaged themselvs by the half-hearted help given, without giving enough real help to insure success. The case is not bettered in any way for the spineless Gladstone and his Christian cohorts. Mr. Bradlaugh was again triumphantly elected, on the 2d, by his Northampton constituents. He was opposed by the same Christian Corbett who ran against him at his second election. The opposition members of the House immediately held a meeting and decided to resist any attempt by Mr. Bradlaugh to take the seat to which he has been thrice elected. Northcote has moved the same resolution previously offered by him, and the motion has been carried by the House, that Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to go through the form of repeating the oath. So the same question comes up again to be fought out. Upon the issue of the contest depends the question of whether England is a free country, with representativs in Parliament elected by the people, or whether she is a country ruled by an aristocracy as dangerous to her liberties as the autocratic government of Russia.

After Joe Cook had delivered his five lectures in Bombay, India, the following card was circulated in that place, which, Mr. Bennett says, very fairly represents the effect the lectures had upon the nativ element. It was printed by a nativ, and freely distributed at Cook's last meeting:

"The nativ public of Bombay take this opportunity to thank Mr. Joseph Cook for the trouble he has taken to come to Bombay and preach Christianity to the English-speaking nativs and European residents of this great city. But at the same time they think it proper to inform the reverend gentleman that he should not leave them with the idea that his eloquent but flimsy, unargumentativ, and merely rhetorical lectures hav produced any impression whatsoever on their minds, with respect to the truth of Christianity. Many flocked to his lectures merely to witness the magnificent tamasha [show]. Hence the large numbers of hearers he succeeded in obtaining. Let him and his colleagues rest assured that Christianity will never succeed in India. Nothing more need be said.

"NATIV PUBLIC VOICE."

A Private Letter or Two from Mr. Bennett.

The following letters were not written for publication, but as they giv the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER a better idea of how the traveler is at present engaged than we could, we print them:

JEYPORE, INDIA, Jan. 29 (Thos. Paine's Birthday), 1882.

DEAR EUGENE: I am now going through India by rail. This is the first town I hav stopped at since leaving Bombay. A ride of nearly forty hours brought me here and gave me a chance to see a good deal of the country, a part of which is good and wet and marshy and a part dry and sandy. India is a very large country, and it is not all good land by considerable. The aggregate crops of India, however, are immense, and the number of people engaged in raising them immenser. I arrived here yesterday morning and fell in with an English colonel and an Irish doctor, stationed in the service here in India, and we went sight-seeing together in the same carriage. They are good, jolly fellows, and don't believe much more than I do. We visited the Mahrajah's palace, the menageries, the beautiful and extensiv gardens, the school of art, the museum, the bazars, a dozen god-factories (I bought a few gods), etc.

This is a province which the English interfere but little with, save drawing the regular revenues, so everything is nativ—original—only a dozen or so Europeans being here. It is called one of the finest cities in India. It is quite interesting. To-day I am going six miles into the country to see a palace and the beautiful scenery. I hav four miles' ride on an elephant. First, this morning I attend a sacrifice of a buffalo to one of the gods. The Englishman is not to go with me to-day.

I go to-morrow to Delhi, then to Ajra, Allahabad, Cawnpore, Lucknow, Benares, and Calcutta. I hav to be able to take steamer there for Madras and Ceylon on Feb. 12th. My health is good. The sun is terrible at Bombay and in Southern India. It is more mild and pleasant as I get up north here.

I write this before daylight. Was up at 3 o'clock. My sleep was out, and I might as well be up. I take my breakfast at 6:30, at seven the sacrifice, and after that the elephant ride.

Later in the day he writes to Mrs. Bennett:

SUNDAY, Jan. 29, 1882.

DEAR MARY: I hav returned from the trip out to the palace, six miles from here, which I told Eugene about visiting this morning. The trip was a pleasant one, including my four miles' ride on an elephant. There is considerable motion to the animal, which shakes one up pretty extensivly, and would be tiresome after awhile, but it does well for a novelty. I saw hundreds of large monkeys wild, and close by the roadside, though they are not very wild, as the Hindoos regard them as a sacred animal and never kill them. I saw also any quantity of peacocks, wild, all along by the roadside. At the palace I witnessed the sacrifice of a full-grown kid to one of the Hindoo gods, to which human sacrifices were once daily made; but a score or two of years ago a kid was substituted for the man, and one is now killed every morning. The head is struck off at one blow with a sharp, heavy blade nearly three feet long. The blood is caught in a brass basin and set in before the image of the god and allowed to remain there five minutes, while the flesh of the kid is cooked for the priests to eat. Before killing the kid it was held while the head priest sprinkled it with holy water on its head, and laid white flowers upon it, as well as upon the sacrificial knife, or one like it. Probably there is about as much sense in this sacrificing business as there was in olden times to Yahweh by the Jews.

I saw also fakeers, or men who claim to be holy. They are naked, are rubbed all over with chalk, and stay day and night and year after year under a tree by the roadside, keeping a small holy fire burning, saying prayers for the people, and receiving oblations from them. The ignorant classes worship them almost as gods.

I also saw several pilgrims who hav been off to the holy river Ganges, four hundred miles away. Every man has a pole eight feet long on his shoulder, to each end of which is attached a vessel of about three gallons each of the water of the Ganges, of course very holy, which these pious fools hav thus carried four hundred miles. It is being taken to the priests, who use it as holy water in worshipful ceremonies. The tomfoolery made in the name of religion impresses me more and more, and it is carried to as great extent in this country as any in the world. I go to Delhi to-night. The weather is not as hot here as at Bombay.

Mr. Bennett expects to reach San Francisco, Cal., by April, and will perhaps lecture some as he crosses the continent. He should be addressed now in care of Byron Adonis, Jewish Times office, San Francisco, Cal.

A Suggestion.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Through your paper I wish to make this one suggestion to friend E. C. Walker, secretary of the Iowa Liberal League, and all other Liberals of the state: That, as we hav placed much confidence in D. M. Bennett as a writer and worker in the cause of Freethought, and as he is making his promis good on his Round-the-World trip, his letters being entertaining and interesting, I think it not enough to merely pass our private thanks for his valuable services, but that the Freethinkers of Iowa should demonstrate their gratitude in mass meetings to be held in suitable places on his return by the Union Pacific. It may be now too early to make propositions for that object, but it will giv us full time to talk the thing over.

J. KINSER.

Champlin, Minn., Feb. 16, 1882.

MANY of the subscribers to the Round-the-World fund hav written us to know how much it will increase the cost to hav the books bound in extra binding, and saying they wished them in better than ordinary style. We can furnish the volumes bound in leather, with red edges, for 75 cents per volume extra, or $2.25 for the three; in morocco, with gilt edges, for $1 extra per volume, or $3 for the three volumes. All wanting them that way will please notify us, remitting the amount, and the books will be bound as desired. We will feel obliged if they will order early, so we can tell how many to bind in leather and morocco.

More Trouble for Dr. Foote.

Dr. Foote has been compelled to mail his paper in New York at transient rates—one cent each. He has been forced to this by the pusillanimity and duplicity of the Canadian postal authorities, who, after taking pay for mailing, refused to interfere with the United States authorities who detained the paper at Buffalo. Both governments hav everlastingly disgraced themselvs by their conduct in this case. When the United States government compelled the payment of one cent each on the Monthly, Dr. Foote took it to Canada. To prevent being beaten in this way our postal department violated the treaty with Canada by refusing to foward the papers after they came this side of the line. Under the treaty, Canada could hav forced our postal little almighties to do their duty, but that country of Catholic priests and old-women customs officers did not hav the courage to do it, and the spectacle is presented of two countries conspiring to persecute an individual who has done more good to the world than all the mulish officials in power in both countries. Both post-offices hav violated laws supposed to be above their arbitrary decisions; but this is getting to be a common thing for them to do. Instead of being the servants of the people, as is popularly supposed, controled by Congress and the Constitution, they are our despotic masters, responsible to none but themselvs. They will remain masters just as long as the people let them, and no longer. Meanwhile, the best that can be done is for everybody to write Timothy O. Howe, postmaster general by the grace of Guiteau, remonstrating against such tyranny on the part of his subordinates. And, if that does no good, it may be well to remind him and them that by and by there is an election coming.

Will Some Lawyer Answer?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Can the authorities compel people to be vaccinated in this country? Inclosed you will find an official order which I hav clipped from the Litchfield Monitor, dated Feb. 19, 1882. If they can enforce this law, myself, wife, and four children will hav to be vaccinated, and I don't believe in it. There are a good many arms in slings in this city at present.

Litchfield, Ill., Feb. 18, 1882. A Subscriber.

The following is the order:

Be it resolved by the Board of Health of the city of Litchfield: That by virtue of the authority vested in this board, it is hereby ordered that all persons, proper subjects, so to be determined by the physician applied to, in the city of Litchfield, shall be required to be vaccinated within ten days from the adoption of this resolution, to be performed by a legally qualified physician. That any person refusing to comply with this resolution shall be liable to a fine of not less than five, nor more than twenty-five dollars. Provided this shall not include cases where the operation has been successfully performed within the last year; and provided further, that it shall be the duty of the Board of Health to provide for the vaccination of such persons as are unable to pay for the same, at the expense of the city.

Adopted and approved February 16, 1882.

We refer the above to a lawyer. If our postmasters and pious societies can violate the Constitution with impunity, as they do nearly every day, we don't see why Health Boards cannot. About two thirds of our municipal and state laws are in direct contravention of our federal Constitution, but the people submit to be bulldozed and trampled on without a murmur. The next thing will be a Holy Inquisition.

The Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists will hold their sixteenth annual convention at Bayard's Hall, Ionia, March 22 to 28, 1882 Opening session Wednesday, at 7 P. M. Medium's Medical Association will meet at same time and place. The speakers engaged are J. H. Burnham, Saginaw City; Rev. C. A. Andrus, Flushing; Mrs. L. A. Pearsall, Disco; Abraham Smith, Sturgis; Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn, Bay City; J. P. Whiting, Milford; Mrs. E. C. Woodruff, South Haven; J. W. Kenyon, Grand Rapids. L. S. Burdick, Pres't.

W. F. Jamieson, in three visits to Escanaba, Mich., delivered twenty six lectures. Escanaba is a stronghold of Catholicism. Five of the last course of ten lectures were strictly confined to science; two lectures on geology, one on electricity, and one on astronomy—illustrated. All calls for his lectures should be addressed to him at Albion, Mich.

H. L. Green will lecture in Flint on Sunday, the 12th inst., and in Saginaw city on Sunday, the 19th inst. He desires to obtain appointments to lecture in the vicinity of these places on week-day evenings during the present month. He will be in Kansas about April 1st, and he desires Liberal friends in that state who wish his services to write him at once at Otsego, Mich.

One of Hammond's meetings was broken up recently by an Infidel law student named Porter, whom the revivalist had invited to speak. Porter got the best of the preacher in an argument on the being of God, and the audience not liking it got up and went out.

Mrs. Lake lectured at Durand, Ill., Feb. 25th and 26th, and March 1st, 3d, and 5th. Societies, or individuals, desiring lectures, will address her at her permanent address, 164 South Ashland avenue, Chicago, Ill.

The First Spiritual Society of Erie, Pa., hav given Moses Hull a "call." He has decided to remove to Erie and speak there a portion of his time, dividing the remainder between Buffalo, N. Y., and Linesville, Pa.

We hav a full supply of the Ingersoll, Black, and Fisher debate, which we shall be pleased to send by return mail to all wanting them, postage paid, for fifty cents per copy.

The Spiritualists of Buffalo, N. Y., are to hav a grand celebration of the thirty-fourth anniversary of Spiritualism on the 31st of March. Moses and Mattie Hull are among the speakers engaged.

S Paris Davis has removed to Paola, Kansas. Letters for him should be addressed to Lock box 58, that place.

Colonel Ingersoll and His Home.

[Editorial Correspondence of the San Francisco Argonaut.]

Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll livs within a short distance of the Arlington, in an elegant and spacious dwelling, fronting on Lafayette Square He keeps open house, dispensing generous hospitalities. There I hav spent more than one pleasant evening. His family is composed of his wife and two accomplished and musical young lady daughters. The sister of the wife, with husband and baby girl, and two or three young lady guests, complete an altogether ideal family. How far a guest may disclose the inner glimpses that he may acquire of the domestic life of even famous men and women, is a point that can only be decided by the good taste of the guest himself. If I err in leaving the doors ajar so that my readers may catch an interior view of this interesting family, I am sure I shall not be charged with any other than the most friendly desire to share with those readers the pleasure I hav myself enjoyed. And perhaps there is another motiv. There was a time—and I am old enough to remember it—when the Puritan family alone was held up as the model of domestic happiness, when around the family altar alone clustered all that could make life desirable. It was part of that tradition, which arose from a narrow and illiberal superstition, to send forth the impression that only in those families where religious observances were practiced, where professions of belief flowered and fruited in morning prayers, evening devotions, and Sabbath observances are found the higher virtues, the purer and better life. It was asserted that in orthodox families alone are practiced the charities and kindly sympathies that make life beautiful. This false old sham is passing away, with a thousand other skeletons of a shadowy dawn. It has joined the procession of gaunt and hollow superstitions which a brighter intellectual morning light is driving out of the theological and ecclesiastical world. It is found that good little Sunday-school boys are liable to get drowned when they go in swimming week days about as often as wicked little boys who go in on Sunday. It has been ascertained that men and women may be very good citizens, be very honorable in their lives, very generous in their conduct, and fill useful positions in society without throwing around them the cloak of religious profession. It has been found that throughout our country there are happy homes, united families, loved and loving ones, gathered around a domestic altar raised to the worship of the unknown God. But in such households there are no subscriptions to formulated dogmas, no observances of worship and no lip-professions of religion. Such a family is that of which I hav spoken. It is intellectual and hospitable, with a house filled with books, music, and musical instruments. The house is also filled with love and generous sympathy. On the centertable lies a splendid edition of "Knight's Shakspere," bound in one volume. In its leaves is a family record for births and deaths. On its side, printed in golden letters, is the inscription, "The Inspired Word." "And this," said Colonel Ingersoll, throwing over to me a handsomely bound volume of Burns's poems, "this is the family hymn-book." Beside these two most treasured books lay a complete edition of the works of George Eliot, whom Colonel Ingersoll declares to be the greatest mind which the English-speaking world has produced since Shakspere. Our entertainment for the evening was music and conversation. Our refreshments were generous. To the delightful punch which we punched with care were superadded the more homely drinks of sparkling cider and goblets of brimming buttermilk. If there be any law governing this household, save the unwritten one of mutual love and confidence, it seems to be that each and every member of it—from the baby girl who had her dolls, dolls's trunks, picture-books, and toys on the drawing-room floor, to the stranger within their gates—may do as they please. When it was suggested that the little one had better go to her dream-land upstairs, the colonel remarked that in his house there were no hours for children; "they go to bed when they are sleepy, and get up when they are not." It is one of his axioms in domestic government to let his children do just exactly as they please, on the theory that children governed by love, as a rule, please to do right.

Understanding and appreciating this mode of domestic disciplin, I was surprised at a remark fired at me by the mother of a pious family which I visited on a subsequent evening. Speaking of Colonel Ingersoll's daughters, she said she heard that they were lovely girls; "but only think, they hav never been permitted to put their foot in a church or Sunday-school, and the poor girls are just dying to go." This illustrates, by its utter want of truth, that there still lingers, even at the capital of our nation, a remnant of that superstition that regards the unprofessing Christian father as a domestic tyrant, and that does not appreciate that in the golden book of life is first written the name of him who loves his fellowmen.

Speaking of Colonel Ingersoll, and in contrast with him, his genial philosophy, and his broad and generous sympathies, I am reminded of the recent pulpit pummeling which he received from the fantastic and reverend Talmage, of Brooklyn. This reverend and godly man has made Mr. Ingersoll the subject of a series of sermons, in which he has heaped upon his head all the reproaches, insults, and contumelious vituperations which the generous church furnishes as weapons to its spiritual combatants.

I ought not, perhaps, to designate Mr. Talmage as "fantastic," and would not do so, only that the cavernous vastness of his unexplored mouth, and the illimitable length of his tangled legs hav been so impressed upon me by the cartoons of the illustrated papers, that with his mouth I confound his emptiness of doctrin, and with his legs become tangled in contemplating his faith. Perhaps I am not sufficiently charitable to the fantastic and the sensational in the pulpit; but by my real admiration of those honest-minded Christian clergymen who are sincere, and who illustrate by the purity of their lives the honesty of their opinions, I make up for all that I lack of reverence and respect for the sensational and fantastic mountebank who turns religion into a money-making industry, and whose vain impudence enables him to posture as the chosen of God, while he denounces as impious and blasphemous other and better men.

In reply to the Reverend Talmage, Colonel Ingersoll has just printed an article entitled "Answer to Talmagian Views." I shall not analyze it or quote from it, except that part in reference to Queen Victoria and George Eliot. If this has not been printed by the daily press, I am sure it will be interesting to the readers of the Argonaut. If it has been printed, our readers can profitably peruse it again, for its beauty of diction and generous humanity. He says:

In one of my lectures I drew a parallel between George Eliot and Victoria. I was showing the difference between a woman who had won her position in the world of thought, and one who was queen by chance. This is what I said: "It no longer satisfies the ambition of a great man to be a king or emperor. The last Napoleon was not satisfied with being the emperor of the French. He was not satisfied with having a circle of gold about his head—he wanted some evidence that he had something of value in his head. So he wrote the life of Julius Cæsar that he might become a member of the French Academy. The emperors, the kings, the popes, no longer tower above their fellows. Compare King William with the philosopher Haeckel. The king is one of the 'anointed by the Most High'—as they claim—one on whose head has been poured the divine petroleum of authority. Compare this king with Haeckel, who towers an intellectual Colossus above the crowned mediocrity. Compare George Eliot with Queen Victoria. The queen is clothed in garments given her by blind fortune and unreasoning chance, while George Eliot wears robes of glory woven in the loom of her own genius. The world is beginning to pay homage to intellect, to genius, to heart" I said not one word against Queen Victoria, and did not intend to even intimate that she was not an excellent woman, wife, and mother. I was simply trying to show that the world was getting great enough to place the genius above an accidental queen. Mr. Talmage, true to the fawning, cringing spirit of orthodoxy, lauds the living queen, and cruelly maligns the dead genius. He digs open the grave of George Eliot, and tries to stain the sacred dust of one who was the greatest woman England has produced. He calls her "an adulteress." He attacks her because she was an Atheist—because she abhored Jehovah, denied the inspiration of the Bible, denied the dogma of eternal pain, and with all her heart despised the Presbyterian creed. He hates her because she was great, and brave, and free—because she lived without "faith," and died without fear—because she dared to giv her honest thought, and grandly bore the taunts and slanders of the Christian world. George Eliot tenderly carried in her heart the burdens of our race. She looked through pity's tears on the faults and frailties of mankind. She knew the springs and seeds of thought and deed, and saw with cloudless eyes through all the winding ways of greed, ambition, and deceit, where folly vainly plucks with thorn-pierced hands the fading flowers of selfish joy—the highway of eternal right. Whatever her relations may hav been—no matter what I think, or others say, or how much all regret the one mistake in all her self-denying, loving life—I feel and know that in the court where her own conscience sat as judge she stood acquitted—pure as light, and stainless as a star. How appropriate here, with some slight change, the wondrously poetic and pathetic words of Laertes at Ophelia's grave:

> "Leave her i' the earth;
> And from her fair and unpolluted flesh
> May violets spring! I tell thee, churlish priest,
> A ministering angel shall this woman be
> When thou liest howling!"

I hav no words with which to tell my loathing for a man who violates a noble woman's grave. P.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

FALLACIES CONCERNING THE COSMOS AND THE INFINITE.

Before passing from the consideration of the religious values of the Cosmos and the Infinite, a few words are needed in regard to four prevalent fallacies in regard to their religious value.

1. That although the Cosmos and the Infinite may be considered as separate from mankind, yet as mankind and each man are scientifically but the result of the world; therefore, all there is in man must be in the world somewhere and in some way. Hence it is inferred that mind, will, and all of the properties of the higher nature found in man, must be but a small part in him of the same properties and capacities which must exist in some way in the world at large to an immeasurable extent. The next step is to attribute these qualities of consciousness, mind and will, either to the Cosmos itself, or to the Infinite as God beyond the Cosmos, or a god existing in and through it.

To illustrate: When this lecture was first delivered a distinguished Unitarian clergyman opened the discussion at its close by stating that he did not know how much the Infinite did contain, but it must contain all of the finite, and infinitely more; therefore he should not be guilty of the absurdity of changing his devotions to a finite part instead of the whole, however mistaken or inadequate his conception of that whole might be.

The absurdity of this suggestion is apparent. The Cosmos and the Infinite and Man are being contrasted and considered independently of each other, and not as including each other, in this discussion as to the religious value or "God-power" of each under the scientific view of the world. The Infinite is not therefore considered as the totality of existence, and does not therefore include the Cosmos or Man, nor does the Cosmos include Man for the purpose of this inquiry. They are separately contrasted in order to use each to explain the other.

To be of any use for this religious purpose it must be shown, not that the greater contains the lesser, but that it contains the properties of the lesser; for example, that all of the properties and capacities of man, including his mind, will, etc., are in the Cosmos or in the Infinite when conceived of as independent of Man. But, to suppose that these faculties, etc., of man are in the Cosmos is the fallacy of the Fetichist, of which, as we have seen, there is no proof, and which has been so completely exploded that only savages and theologians now continue to believe in it.

But as all there is of Man is shown by science to be the direct product of this Cosmos, his intelligence should certainly he found in that, and not in the Infinite, if it exists anywhere outside of Man's organization. But the reverse is the fact. We find in every change caused even by the combination of the chemical elements that the new objects formed thereby have not at all the properties had originally by the component parts. What has water in common with oxygen and hydrogen which combine to form it? And so with the whole range of chemical compounds. There is no resemblance between the product and the components. Nor is it less so in the organic sciences. The properties of life are not in the chemical materials of protoplasm before their combination, and before the protoplasmic body is acted upon by its environment. Nor are the functions, powers, or capacities of societies originally in the individuals which compose them. It is the combination that creates the new qualities and capacities of tribe or nation, or church and state, in each and every case.

Now if this is true of the Cosmos, if that does not contain human intelligence, it must be still more true that the Infinite cannot have or contain the limitations which are wholly inconsistent with the very idea of Infinity at all. But mind, will, intelligence, and moral conceptions are all results of limitations which require adaptation of means to ends. They are only consistent with the limited organic functions of life and personality. That the Infinite can have and exercise these properties of the little protoplasmic mould which is the seat of life on the surface of our Planet is too absurd for any one but a Theologian to suggest. Thus the whole Fetichistic and Pantheistic hypotheses fall when tested by facts and consistency.

The next hypothesis is that the mind or intelligence is itself a form of matter or a "spiritual entity," or agent or quality of some kind, which exists in or over the Cosmos or Infinite, and which is without or independent of organic matter. If this is a fact it ought to be provable, but Science has received no reliable proof of it. In the absolute sense everything may be possible, but how life, soul, mind, and will can exist without an organism has yet to be shown. That the Cosmos or Infinite is a man or animal of some kind, or that either of them contains or exercises the intelligence or will of a Man or of any kind of person, remains to be shown. How can function exist without the organ? Thought without brain? A headache without a head?

2. This brings us to the next fallacy, to wit, that intelligence and design must be inferred to exist outside of Man, because it is shown in the wonderful adaptations and contrivances found in the Cosmos, especially in the organic world. How could all of these manifest adjustments of means to ends exist unless in some way an intelligent designer arranged them? Therefore such a designer must be assumed.

This argument from "design" has been most effectively and admirably exposed by Prof. Fiske in his "Cosmic Philosophy," vol. 2, pp. 381–410. If all who are influenced by the notion there disposed of would read that chapter, no more need ever be said on the subject. But as the "common sense" people who cannot read it, or will not, are often imposed upon by that argument, a short notice of its defects is proper.

The Scottish "Common Sense Philosopher," Dr. Reid, in his "Intellectual Powers," states it at its best thus:

First—That design and intelligence in the cause may, with certainty, be inferred from marks or signs of it in the effect.

Second—That these are, in fact, the clearest works of design and wisdom in the Works of Nature.

Therefore, The Works of Nature are the effects of a wise and intelligent Cause.

He adds: "One must either assent to the conclusion, or deny one or other of the premises." Science has always denied both of these premises, and modern Science is enabled to expose the illusion upon which they rest, just as it explains the illusions of the Ptolemaic Astronomy.

1. The first premise involves the first fallacy above exposed, viz., that the greater or material world contains the qualities of the lesser organic or human world derived from it. As Mr. Mill says, because there is pepper in the soup we need not suppose that there was pepper in the cook. The fact is that, because certain qualities or properties are found in the result of natural antecedents, we not only have no warrant for supposing that they will be found in the antecedents, but exactly the contrary; the presumption is that they will not be so found. The result is always different from the cause in Nature, and does not have its properties. But in artificial or human designs, which are truly causes, the case is entirely different. A watch is known to be made by human design, therefore we judge all similar watches to be so made.

If we knew that one eye had ever been made by a designer, we might infer that all eyes were so made. But that the natural antecedents and processes out of which the eye results have design or are made by design, we can infer only when we assume that they were designed. Thus the question is begged. The whole argument is a confusion arising from the natural and the human meaning of the word cause. A cause in nature is an antecedent correllative, but in human affairs it is an intention. Just as a Law in Science and Nature is a record of human observations, but in the human world a Law is a statute, or an order of human will, authority, or prudence.

The same Dr. Reid defines this latter, that is, the subjective meaning of the word cause very well, when he says: "I take cause to be that which has the relation to the effect which I have in my voluntary and deliberate actions; for I take this notion of a cause to be derived from the power I feel in myself to produce certain effects, In this sense we say the Deity is the cause of the universe" (Reid's Correspondence, p. 77).

Now this is not at all the scientific or objective meaning or use of the word cause, and I quote this passage and definition because it at once exposes the subtle anthropomorphism and Fetichism upon which this design rests. It is simply one of hundreds of cases of the confusion of the subjective with the objective upon which we have laid so much stress in our former lecture. We assume that "the power I feel in myself to produce certain effects" is a will (not knowing what that is), and then we assume that effects in nature are effected in a similar way. This is simply the savage's assumption, and though excusable in him, is not so now among civilized men. For Science has shown that the order and design which we think we see in the external world, either in our eye, or in the most distant star nebulæ it preceives, is but a reflection of our own feelings, will, or order and design. These orderings are shown to be the ideas of human needs and adaptations by us reflected upon the external world, but not really there. The human race has throughout ages been unconsciously adapting itself to the world as its environment, and so discovering law and order in it, but that law and order is ours, not Nature's.

The Theologian tries to make us believe that the world was made to fit us. But Science shows that our race and the organic races have been fitted to the world by the slow hewing of pain and death, as if the race were a statue being modeled by a remorseless fate. The world is the die and we are the impression, or rather the result of countless trial impressions, by which we have come to be partially fitted to it. To this end function and organ have cooperated ceaselessly. The Theologian has reversed the true order in this as in all other cases. Science consists of the reversal of his illusions, not only in Astronomy but in every other Science. For instance, when he observes the big belly of the ox he admires the wisdom of God that made it big, so that the ox could live on grass. But the Scientist shows that it was ages of grass-eating that made the belly big and the ox a ruminant, and not God at all. So in human history and its evolution. It was not the kindness of God that caused great rivers to run by the great cities of the world, but the needs of Man that caused the great cities to be built by the great rivers. It was not the wisdom of God that made cork bark to grow for ages that it might finally be used for champagne bottles. When the child looks out of a ferry-boat and thinks he sees the dock moving, he has to think twice before he can shake off that illusion. The Theologian has yet to think that second thought—to shake off this childish illusion of our race by which the subjective becomes objective. The illusion cannot be honestly continued by the double use of the word cause. Even those syllogistic forms, which beg the question by the play upon words, are useless. This mode of reasoning has been illustrated by the word "cry" in this perfect Syllogism of the kind:

> "If a man who turnips cries,
> Cry not when his father dies,
> Then 'tis plain the man rather
> Have a turnip than his father."

Here the objective use of the word cry in the first line is absurdly confounded with its subjective use in the second. A similar use of the word "cause," or some word that conceals the same "fallacy of confusion" is inevitable in every form of the major premise of the design argument. It always begs the question, no matter whether stated by a Savage or by a Paley.

But the second premise, viz: "That there are in fact the clearest marks of design and wisdom in the works of Nature," is equally illusory.

(1) The first difficulty is that it presents an instance of the "fallacy of partial selection." Anybody can prove anything if you will let him select only the facts which sustain his conclusion. Besides the fallacy of confusion of terms, above illustrated by the word cause, this fallacy of partial selection is the greatest source of error known. By it the dreamer proves his dreams, the oracle-consulter his oracle, the Spiritualist his wish, the Friday-sailing sailor that he will be wrecked, the moonstruck farmer that his seeds will not come up, and always the Theologian that his God is wise and beneficent.

To prove that this God is unwise and diabolical the Scientist has only to present the opposite facts of Nature. He soon shows that death, and want, and pain are the rule; that the dead are the majority; and that life and joy are indeed but the momentary spray on the dark waves of death. Life is but "a struggle for existence" in which those who look at the sun for a day do so only as they stand on millions of the dead. The whole organic world is a world of cannibalism. The organic species are piled up in rising strata as if different stories of murder, each feeding upon those below, with man at the top feeding upon all. There is no end to the facts of disorder, disease, purposelessness, defective organs, rudimentary organs, brain maggots, etc., by which it is evident that if any God made and runs this world he must be a devil of the worst description. But is not all this well said in Col. R. G. Ingersoll's Lecture on the Gods? also in Haeckel's "Evolution of Man?" See vol. 2, p. 109, etc. The Scientist refuses to be guilty of the blasphemy of attributing any of these horrible facts to an intelligence like his own. He says simply that they prove that the adaptation of Man to his World is as yet far from being complete.

(2). But the best answer of the Scientist to the second premise is that, the alleged "works or signs" of design are nothing of the kind. They are simply adaptations taking place under laws, and antecedent facts as naturally as any other facts.

When the child goes to a theater he may at first believe the illusion to be real and supernatural. But after he is taken behind the scenes and is shown how the illusion is produced by natural means, he recovers from it unless he is determined to be always a child. What the stage manager may thus do for the child the scientist now does for the theologian. The Law of Evolution furnishes in every instance a perfect and natural explanation of the works and signs of "design," without any design whatever. Prof. Fiske, following Darwin, Huxley, Haeckel, and all modern evolutionists shows conclusively that these adaptations occur as the result of natural selection by purely natural causes, i. e., antecedents and conditions. This explanation leaves the design notion without the slightest possible support, because it is thoroughly supplanted by scientific law and causes. Take, for instance, Haeckel's account of the evolution of the human eye from a black speck in a simple jelly-fish to its completion in Man. Step by step this wonderful organ and its functions have reacted upon each other throughout ages, until finally the result is miraculous only to those who refuse to trace the process of its evolution. In a similar way he explains every other organ, and every instance of apparent "design." His "Evolution of Man" is one continuous explanation of all of the "marks and signs of design" which have amused and edified so much learned theological ignorance. The scientific demonstration ends this illusion. There is no help for it; this dream is over to those who wish to be awake, to be men, not children.

The great thinkers of the race, like Aristotle, Lucretius, Spinoza, Hume, Kant, Goethe, Hamilton, Mansel, and even Coleridge, have seen the logical fallacy of this argument; but it was not until the the Law of Evolution had explained the organic world that its utter baselessness was exposed. The better of the later theologians, following Sir Wm. Hamilton, have advised against its use. John Stuart Mill informed them that it was after all the best shot now left in their locker, and owing much to this dubious and half ironical encouragement the lower grade of theologians (like Joseph Cook) are trying to resume fire with it among the ignorant and excitable. But not until the Law of Evolution ceases to be the scientific explanation of the organic world can this argument gain another lease of life.

Is the Sound Theory Overthrown?

About three years ago there appeared in print a work entitled, "The Problem of Human Life," in which the universally accepted "wave theory" of sound and light is very severely handled. There is no denying that the subject was handled with consummate ability, so far as the arguments themselvs go. One can only complain of an undue severity, an occasional falling from the dignity becoming the importance of the subject, and the bad judgment shown by putting some of the chapters in blank verse. Perhaps by this last the writer hoped posterity might recognize him as the later Milton, hailing the Holy Light—as the verses are mostly devoted to the light question.

The writer, like "the rest of mankind," was, as he thought, firmly grounded on the wave theory, having read all the books and lectures on the subject, and, as people do, he took all for granted as true. But this man, who writes as "Wilford," fell upon the theory as Bishop Colenso did upon the mistakes of Moses. He riddled it completely, undermined its very foundations and hurled it down, leaving nothing but ruins sad and ridiculous. For years the writer has waited to hear some mention, in high places, of the work; but not a sound has been heard. It is right that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER who hav not access to the work, or never heard of it, shall hav some idea of what those arguments are. A very few shall be lightly hinted at. The work itself is most voluminous and exhaustiv.

In the first place, the author givs fully, thoroughly, and verbatim the theory of sound (this being the only part to which reference is here had) according to Tyndall, Helmholtz, and others of its great modern propagandists. He givs also his own theory, viz., that sound is "a real entity, being corpuscular emissions issued from strokes or force used in some way upon atomic bodies"—that it is as much a real thing as anything one tastes or smells.

The received theory is that sound is really nothing in itself, any more than is a shadow, but is an effect produced in our ears by waves of air striking upon the ear-drums; these ear-drums are set to vibrating in and out; these vibrations and their effects are recognized by our brains as sound. Here it is in the language of Tyndall: "A sonorous wave consists of two parts, in one of which the air is condensed and the other rarefied. The air is forced forward, then, meeting resistance, rolls back a little—just as waves are in water—each particle of air makes but a short excursion to and fro." "Loudness in our sensations is, outside of us, nothing more than width of swing or amplitude of the vibrating particles of air. . . . Imagin this tuning-fork vibrating in free air, three hundred and eighty-four vibrations per second, in this room, the air at 60° Fahrenheit, the foremost wave would reach 1,120 feet in a second. In this distance air thus vibrating, 1,120 divided by 384 gives us nearly three feet for the length of each wave. The condensation of the sound wave corresponds to the crest (of a water wave), while the rarefaction corresponds to its sinus. The pitch of a note depends solely on the number of aerial waves which strike the ear per second." Says Helmholtz: "Suppose a stone to be thrown into calm water. Round the spot struck forms a little ring of wave which, advancing quietly in all directions, expands in a constantly-increasing circle. Corresponding to this ring of waves, sound also proceeds in the air from the excited point and advances in all directions. The process in the air is identical with that in water."

On the same subject, Grove compares the vibrations of light with "sound or vibrations of air," dedeclaring sound to be nothing but these air waves dashing against the drumskin of the ear.

Now, says the author of the "Problem of Life," if these forces, light, heat, sound, etc., are not real entities, then the idea of their correlation and persistence is no more than the idea of cold turning to shadow, or of abstract motion into dreams. But if they be realities then there is no more strangeness in the idea of their changing one into another than there is in the familiar one of food being converted into bone and muscle, and their more refined elements into thought;" to which we may add, then this thought itself may become in some way a living soul, a real entity, and as indestructible as the refined quintessences of which it may be composed.

To show the incorrectness of these explanations of sound, the author says, "Two bodies tuned in perfect accord, placed very close together—let one vibrate never so rapidly, yet the waves caused by its vibration hav no effect on the other to make sound unless sound is first made in one of them. Tuning-forks mounted on resonant cases respond sympathetically 180 feet apart; but disconnected from these cases and held an inch apart not the the slightest effect is produced by vibrations of air, no matter how rapid or powerful. Experiments with sounding-boards, by which the slightest tones are vastly increased, even at long distances apart from the strings of instruments, show conclusivly that sound is not mere vibrations of air. Experiments with wooden wands and iron rods show that 'tis something different from air, for though the vibrations are sent along the iron as well as along the wood, yet no sound or music is produced over the iron, while the wood conveys the sound. Prof. Helmholtz says, "It is plain that two different degrees of density produced by two different systems of waves cannot coexist in the same place at one time." Yet in the piano the sounding-board responds to 85 strings, each varying from the other, and 85 distinct separate undulations coexist in the same air and pass off from the same surface of the board. By a beautiful experiment of wheatstones, all the tones of a piano and of several other instruments can be gathered and conducted longitudinally through a little rod and transferred by it to another sound-board far off. (Is not the telephone an illustration that proves sound is not air waves moving 1,120 feet per second?) The writer givs an experiment which he claims disproves the received theory. Hold the stem of a large tuning-fork in contact with a dry pine chip about the same hight as the fork. This will augment the tone twofold. Now while the fork prongs are vibrating one-sixteenth of an inch (sending off air waves?) the chip has no sensible vibration and sends off no air waves, yet it doubles the tone. The friends of the air wave theory claim it is the tremor of the chip makes this addition to the sound. But if you hold a bit of iron in place of the chip, though it doubtless has as many tremors as the chip, yet there is no augmentation of sound. (I think it will be found that if sound be a real entity it has some affinity for metal, and perhaps is converted from sound to magnetism or some kindred quality.) Triumphantly the writer asks, "If this resonance is generated without air waves, why is not the original round so generated? The fact is," he continues, "air waves cannot move through air quiescent except at slow speed and limited distance, however put in motion." The prong of a tuning-fork, at full amplitude, moves not a tenth as rapidly as an ordinary fan when held in the hand and vibrated rapidly. It is impossible for the fork to send off waves more than a foot from itself, while their velocity can not exceed that of the prongs themselvs." Moreover, he at one place accuses the friends of the theory with entirely ignoring the mobility of the air. They speak of it, as he quotes them, as though it were some solid substance like a stick, whereas, when disturbed into waves, the air adjoining the waves tends to fall in their rear, thus very soon putting the waves at rest. The whole tendency is to quiescence, into which it rapidly sinks unless provoked by new disturbing causes. Place a jet of light in air called perfectly calm. Now stand off and set the air in motion or waves by any means. Behold how far your waves extend! Impel your fan or instrument ten times faster than ever tuning-fork vibrated and you will see that your waves do not go ten feet. Why? Because of the mobility of the air—i.e., the tendency of every adjoining particle to stop those in motion. In fact the prongs of a tuning-fork do not move more than from seven to fourteen inches per second. Yet some of these gentlemen like Tyndall talk as though it moves as fast as a ball sent from a rifle. Speaking of a pendulum in motion, Tyndall says: "Its motions are too sluggish to make waves that excite the auditory nerves. Sharper and quicker shocks to the air must be given." Yet, after all, the prongs of a fork move with only one-quarter the velocity of the common clock pendulum! Any motion given to the wood or water, or other medium the sound passes through, is merely incidental, this author contends, "as sound is the molecular effect of sudden stops and starts on atomic structure, causing emission of substantial pulses."

In a very great number of ways does he expose the utter absurdity of the present theory. It is doubtful if any person can read the work who is at the same time familiar with the writings of Humboldt and Tyndall on sound, without being convinced. There seems to be such a thing as orthodox science as well as theology, and one is as overbearing, blundering, and unreasoning as the other, will be the reader's conclusion. Why not, asks the author, allow a substantial entity to sound as well as to olfaction? They might as well attribute smell or odor to the oscillatory petaliferous tremors of the rose or honeysuckle. Musk can be diffused over miles of surface with no sensible diminishing of the grain of musk it comes from. Sound passes through densest walls into small rooms within rooms; through thick glass walls within stone walls. Is it atmospheric vibration that thus penetrates, or a certain subtle, refined thing that moves as electricity moves? It is singular how Tyndall wanders all over and around the subject, citing facts and performing experiments that prove that sound is not air-wave and is a real something, and never suspects it. Thus his case of the magazine explosion. Tyndall says the tremendous air-wave crushed the walls and broke windows. Yet if the building or glass windows be far enough from the explosion the sound is heard before the breaking or crushing occurs. Tyndall seems never to suspect that the break or concussion of the air is caused by the vast volumes of gas suddenly liberated into the air. Let your sound be as loud as a thousand explosions, and if no powder or other combustible discharges gas into the air, nothing is broken (except in the familiar instances of glasses in accord with certain tones).

The steam-whistle does not stir the air thirty feet from it, yet 'tis heard for miles against winds blowing hurricanes, and heard at a speed of 1,120 feet per second. A bugler blows and "sets the wild echoes flying," stirs the air a few feet around, and yet is heard three miles distant, thus moving the air thirty-six square miles, and making millions of waves go "to and fro in small excursions," as Tyndall says. A calculation made by the writer shows that this slight effort of the lips of the bugler generates heat and elasticity, etc., equal to thousands of millions of tons. A small insect, the locust, can fill the air when calm one mile each way from him (and a mile high, most likely), with that rasping noise caused by the rapid moving of its legs over the nervatures at its sides, thus creating a physical agitation and displacement of the air for miles around him, converting the whole into waves, each wave of two parts, a condensation and rarefaction, the compressed parts of which contain an augmentation of heat above normal sufficient to add one-sixteenth to the elasticity of that air (as the theory is expounded by Tyndall). Within these four square miles are sixteen billion square inch columns, each pressing on the earth in all directions fifteen pounds, or one hundred and twenty million tons. Now, by this theory, as explained by Tyndall & Co., it follows that this insect, by simply moving its legs, displaces all these particles of air for one mile high four hundred and forty times per second, and continues this churning of the air for a full minute at a time.

"Wave lengths," says Tyndall, are measured from the center of one condensation to the center of the next. Wave length of sound depends on pitch or number of waves per second. A piccalo, flute, or high D has 4,752 vibrations per second; the length of each wave is under three inches per second. The loudest tone of an organ has sixteen vibrations; wave length seventy feet. Now this tone makes the air particles move thirty-five feet and back sixteen times per second each. This equals five hundred and sixty feet a second, or three hundred and eighty-one miles per hour, which would produce a tornado double the velocity necessary to sweep a village to ruins. If this theory were true, an organ would burst the cathedral walls.

The author has spared no pains or time in his investigations. He takes the statements of the expounders of the air-wave theory in full, quoting whole pages and half pages, and confutes them often by their own statements. Sometimes, by carrying out for a few figures farther their own, the absurdity of the theory becomes at once apparent, and often the professors are made to appear in a ridiculous light. Thus Tyndall says that "in sound the quantity of matter set in motion augments as the square of the distance from the center of the explosion; the loudness diminishes in the same proportion." That is, the loudness of any tone four feet from the sounding body is but one-sixteenth as great as it is at the body itself. It must be so, for he says, "This wave puts in motion a constantly-increasing mass, which cannot be without enfeeblement of the motion." If this be so, then a sound passing one hundred feet would have but one-ten-thousandth its original loudness! See now the absurdity of this. A steam siren is sometimes heard ten miles; this makes the sound at ten miles less by two billions than where it issued! Now, as it is heard ten miles off, it follows there must be a certain appreciable motion, else it could not be heard. This least motion to make sound is one hundred and seventy-four feet per second. Less than that no sound is heard, says the theory. So there must be enough condensation of the air to generate sufficient heat to add this one hundred and seventy-four feet to its velocity. Now trace it backwards to its source. At two feet from the ten-mile limit the sound is four times louder; at three feet it is nine times; at four feet it is sixteen times; at ten feet it is one hundred times; at one thousand feet it is a million times louder. Yet this thousand feet is less than a fiftieth of the distance, and would not be noticed though one million times louder. But at the siren itself it must be two billion times louder than at the ten-mile limit. There must be two billion times greater density and heat; two billion times swifter, also, or two billions multiplied by one hundred and seventy-four, which equals sixty-six million miles per second, or thrice the velocity of light!

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Feb. 19, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $8—$5 from H. W. Haight, president of our League, for his share of Round-the-World. He is anxious to add his name to the long and noble list, even though it be at the eleventh hour. The other $3 is to pay for Mr. Samuel L. Jones's paper another year.

As I wrote once before, we are anxiously hoping that Bro. Bennett will not complete his trip without visiting Salt Lake City, and if possible, giving us a call here. If he should conclude to visit Salt Lake City, and could make his arrangements ahead for a lecture, I think he could get quite a turn-out.

CAWKER CITY, KAN., Feb. 21, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for the Round-the-World trip. The eleventh hour is better than none. I cannot make up my mind to let the opportunity slip. I hope Mr. Bennett will make a fortune out of the enterprise. That we are gradually on the gain all must admit. Our growth is a wholesome one, and we'll hold every inch we gain. I can count Liberals by the hundreds, but am sorry to say that but few are independent ones. Ostracism is what they fear. I hav outgrown that fear, and wish every Freethinker in the world could do the same. The corrupt church would soon go by the board then. We will hope, not pray, for the best.
I am sincerely yours, T. F. HERSEY.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Feb. 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please pardon me for my long forgetfulness and remissness in not forwarding the price of the undowithoutable TRUTH SEEKER, and accept the inclosed twelve dollars, and apply it thus: Five for the Round-the-World fund, six for the paper for the past and present year, and bal nce for books.

I hav spoken of THE TRUTH SEEKER as being indispensable. It is so to me, and yet your selections against Spiritualism are often distasteful to me, and I wonder that a science so easily demonstrated should fail to attract the scrutiny of so many otherwise wise heads. "One world at a time" seems to be a favorit motto just now with many. It seems to me that they cannot claim to be real truth seekers, or they would not be contented to be walking in that narrow groove. I should be very sorry to be either so bigoted or so cramped for time as to be prevented from searching out what is truth and what is error in both worlds at a time. Yours truly, AMY POST.

LEADVILLE, COL., Feb. 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $10. For $5 of it please send Around-the-World to C. O. Pierson, of this place. The other $5 is to finish paying for my two shares to the same fund. I am rather late about remitting, but I hope you will forgiv me now that I hav procured you another subscriber to the Round-the-World fund, and hope it will not be too late for his name to appear in the first volume. While on a visit to the Pacific coast this winter I ordered my paper sent to Olympia, Wash. Ter., and now I want one sent here, as I do not wish to be without it; also continue sending one to Olympia for my mother, who livs there and has become emancipated from the Presbyterian bondage, and in her old age derives great satisfaction from reading Freethought papers. Wishing our brave editor a safe journey round the world, I remain

PHILADELPHIA, March 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Believing the three months had expired, I decided to write to you before receiving a notice through the mail to that effect. I hav been something of a truth seeker most of my life, and wish to continue one. The freedom and faithfulness of your paper I believe will aid me in that unbounded field yet to be surveyed before we can hav any just or accurate conception of what we are, and of the processes which hav brought us to our present status. We hav little to boast of, and much occasion to be humble when we are conscious of how very little we really know. If THE TRUTH SEEKER will keep us posted in the aggressiv work of the intellectual world, the discoveries and revelations that are multiplying, and startling the votaries of entrenched error and dissipating superstition, it will do specially what we need, and furnish us with what the world needs for its redemption and salvation. "The truth shall make you free" was taught long ago, and experience has amply proved the wisdom of the lesson. The truth seeker should be a much wiser and better man than the one who is satisfied with error. His feelings, thoughts, and literature should be of a purer and higher quality than we can expect from the votaries of error. I hope, if it is possible, we will make our literature as chaste, dignified, and unexceptionable as the lover of truth and purity can desire. We should hold our standard the highest, to be consistent, and to command the admiration and respect of the slaves of sect and victims of error. We cannot afford, neither does our cause need us, to descend to fraud, vituperation, caricature, or coarse personalities. The enemies of truth are doing much as they hav been taught; it is our place to teach them better before we can expect them to do better. Ou work and that of THE TRUTH SEEKER is to enlighten rather than chastise or condemn.

Inclosed please find $8—$3 for the paper one year, and $5 for the Round-the-World trip. We want more light from that dark corner of the world, and we cannot doubt that it is forthcoming. Let us hav light, or, as the ancients had it, "Let there be light, and there was light," even if the "light shineth in the darkness and the darkness comprehend it not." We are now getting the real character and quality of this Holy Land. If the bigots will not see it they must remain in darkness and error. T. E. L.

FLORIDA.

BUSHNELL, ILL., Feb. 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received twenty-eight letters, all in favor of the colony. Hav directed Florida papers sent to each. If any fail to get them, notify me. I would be well for each one to send ten cents to Commissioner A. A. Robinson, Tallahassee, Florida, for the latest information of the Bureau of Immigration. Most of the questions that are being asked will find answers in the papers. Your are right, gentlemen, push ahead, investigate, and find out for yourselvs, and before we organize some of you will need to visit the country. I hav just learned from a friend that has returned, that state and government land is very scarce. So if we wish to succeed we must not put it off, but be ready by next fall. J. DENNING.

CAWKER CITY, KAN., Feb. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5—three for my subscription to December 2, 1882, and two for "Anti-christ." I hope to be able to send $5 for the Round-the-World trip. I shall most certainly want the work when completed. I hope our good man will surely be spared to return in health and fortune. If he does not look out for himself I fear God will get careless about him too. Respectfully, T. F. HERSEY.

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In your last issue I noticed a letter from Mr. A. Atwood, in which he speaks of the manner in which most of the bread-and-butter beggars, commonly called ministers, with which this country is cursed, take on at funerals, when they are called upon to preach.

Mr. Atwood speaks my sentiments to the letter, as I, with him, hav requested my parents and friends, when they are called upon to follow my remains to their last resting-place, to hav no damnation agent within a hundred miles of me, if possible, for if one should come within smelling distance I verily believe I should burst my coffin-lid and throttle the brute. I wish every one thought as much of these clerical asses as I do. They would soon swap their standing collars for an ax or shovel, and go to work like white folks. Will say to Mr. Atwood, "Shake," and let us hear from you again. Yours, G. W. SMITH.

TUNNEL, IOWA, Feb. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I suppose my name is on the black list for bad behavior and non-payment of my debts which I hav contracted with THE TRUTH SEEKER; still I am not to blame in this respect for being in arrears so long, as I hav had two years' (as some people would call it) bad luck, but I shall say misfortune. My trials and troubles hav been plentiful and sometimes unbearable, although now I hav overcome them all to a great extent. I tried to raise money enough to pay up my arrears, but through all my efforts I could barely get enough to buy sustenance for my family. But I need not go on to relate my past financial embarrassment, as it is all past and we are all still living. So now I order my name erased from that black list and to be put on the subscription list plain enough to be seen on both sides, and I hope in the future to be able to keep it there as long as I am and the old TRUTH SEEKER livs. Please find inclosed $7, which will pay for my debts and renewal. If there is anything over charge to my credit and send a bill, and oblige ROB'T FLEMING.

EUREKA, CAL., Feb. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Another year has rolled around, and my subscription to your paper has again expired. Inclosed you will find $13.00, to be applied as directed.

In regard to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I must say you are steering the ship admirably. But in your issue of Jan. 21st an article appears which savors somewhat like Socialism. If the accident on the New York Central railroad was caused by the negligence of a brakeman, his being poor or underpaid ought not to be a plea in his favor. Nor is it a commentary upon the power of money when rich officials who could not prevent the accident are not arrested. A man who neglects his duty when underpaid will surely neglect it when he is overpaid, and if a railroad or any other employee to whose care the lives and property of other people are trusted, neglects his duty, he ought to be severely punished.

Further on in the same number, I find that your correspondent "Liberta" is still imposing upon your readers. I was in hopes that illiberal bigot would giv us a rest; yet he is determined to force his crude notions upon the public. He calls himself a Free-thinker, but he would like to force everybody to think and act as he does.

That a bigot should call himself a Liberal is not strange, but that a man who has no more idea of liberty than a blind man has of sky blue should sign his article "Liberta" is very strange.

That intemperance is an evil every reasonable person admits, but that legislation cannot stop it is also evident. Maine produces as many drunkards as any other state in proportion to its population, in spite of the Maine liquor law, and as the traffic cannot be carried on openly, hypocrisy is added to drunkenness.

Fraternally yours, ROBERT GUNTHER.

BOSTON, MASS., Feb. 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 for your most interesting and valuable paper for the year 1882, and I doubt not you will excuse the delay when I tell you of my reverses of late to the amount of over $700. But seeing you are not over-taxed with correspondents from Boston, I thought you might giv place to a few plain hints from an old veteran of Free-thought.

I wish to say to your correspondent in to-day's paper, T. Winter, to be careful or we shall look upon him as cold as the "murderous God" he describes. "The assassin Guiteau," he says, "claimed to be inspired." Was he not inspired? Are not all of us inspired? Is there not a power behind, outside of us all, that pushes us on to do everything that we do? Did we make ourselvs? or were we not pushed into the world without our consent? Had we anything to do with making ourselvs? Are we responsible beings? If so, to what? If you say to that murderous God that you allude to, then I deny all allegiance. The thing created, responsible to its creator! Nonsense!

Now is he (Winter) so vituperous as to want the law of capital punishment carried out strictly to the letter of the law? The law first defines what murder is. It says that murder is the wilfully, designedly, premeditatedly, and aforethought destroying of the life or lives of human beings, and that the accessory is equal to the principal in the commission of the crime. Now carry out the law; you see that it will hang every one of us but the last one, and that one will be under an obligation to hang himself. Now I propose to throw away all of those old barbarian laws and become scientifically just, kind, and humane; never to condemn anybody or anything until we can scientifically demonstrate what we are doing.

Yours with kindness and fraternal regards,

N. H. DILLINGHAM.

"JOHN'S WAY."

BERLIN, N. J., March 1, 1882.

I'v read "John's Way," and wish to say
I like it very well;
Though bigots cry, "O cast it by,
It has no word for hell!"

Some people eat cheap, tainted meat,
Until they think it nice;
And some read trash that reverends hash,
Till hell becomes their spice.

But as for me, from priestcraft free,
I want fresh meat as food,
And 'Mina's spice, done up so nice,
Is always sweet and good.

Then send to-day and get "John's Way,"
And read it through and through;
'Twill help you fight the foes of light,
And aid good 'Mina, too.

Then, loan it round on "holy ground,"
'Twill take the scales from eyes
That never saw pure reason's law,
And yield them sweet surprise. J. HACKER.

LIBERAL, UTAH, Feb. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It is with pleasure that I write to inform you that the Liberal League of Sevier (after a long sleep) is waking up. The cause of its sleep has been that those that took the most interest in the League were poor men, and hav been forced to leave their homes most of the time since the League was started here, and seek work at the different mining camps and at the railroads now being constructed through this territory. And among those that hav been absent were our worthy president, Michael Johnson, and secretary, Rasmus Sorenson. But now most of us are home again, and so the president called a meeting on January 21st for the purpose of electing officers or the League for the ensuing year, at which the following were elected: Moses Gifford, president; Andres Bertleson, vice-president; John E. Johnson, secretary; Walter Jones, treasurer; George D. Robinson, director. The five officers constitute a full board of directors.

The former president, M. Johnson, was nominated for re-election, but he begged leave to decline, as his circumstances were such that he did not think he could do justice to the League in that capacity. The secretary, Rasmus Sorenson, also declined re-election, as he expected to be away from home most of the time. The meeting then gave a vote of thanks to the ex-officers for the good work they had done for the League and the cause of liberty in general.

I hope we shall be able to do some efficient work here in the future by doing all we can to circulate Liberal books and papers, and by having Liberal lectures delivered by our best speakers in the leading town of this (Sevier) county, and thereby adding new members to our League, and perhaps organize new Leagues in other parts of the country.

I shall be pleased if you will send me some of your colored posters and such other circulars as you may see fit, and I will exert myself in getting subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I know of no better way to spread the light of truth and reason.

Yours respectfully, JOHN E. JOHNSON, Sec.

MR. EDITOR: Please let me say a few words in review of what Bro. S. R. Sheppard said in your issue of Jan. 21st, in reference to prohibition. First, we start with a difference of opinion. He asks, "Does prohibition cure, prevent, or curtail" intemperance in drink? He answers, No. Prohibition would certainly do all that, but prohibitory laws, like all other laws, work imperfectly. There hav been laws against theft through all ages, but they hav failed to prevent that evil. That is not a reason for the abolition of those laws, but for their continuance. Those who wish to sell liquor nearly always make the assertion that more is sold under prohibitory laws than where there are none, but if they were sincere, as their object is to sell, they would be in favor of those laws. I hav a private opinion that a thief is not so bad a citizen as a man who sells distilled liquors. That may be a mistake, but I hav a right to that opinion. Sober men hav no right to drink rot-gut. Sober men's right to drink is like honest men's right to steal. Legislation is not designed to jerk men up the hill of knowledge. The object of legislation is negativ, but it is necessary, and is not in the way of any positiv efforts to make men temperate and honest. Bro. Sheppard thinks that evolution will slowly and surely lift mankind above all forms of intemperance. But it has not done it. It has thus far proved a dismal failure, and it has operated a much longer time than prohibitory liquor laws. Evolution lets us go up hill or down, just as we prefer. Evolution will not solve a problem in sociology any more than in mathematics. Evolution is no better to stop and wait for than providence. If we wait, like Micawber, for something to turn up, it is more apt to turn down than up. Has not one man got as much right to sell liquor as another? What right hav legislators to make it a monopoly? Must an American citizen go to a druggist to tell him if he is an adult and sober? Can't he tell himself? Has not a man as much right to treat as he has to drink? What right hav we to license certain men to make inebriates, and then imprison the inebriates in an asylum, and leave the druggists to make some more? Where is the right to compel those who neither drink or sell to provide asylums and prisons for those who do? Sheppard says distilled beverages contain murder and pauperism. That is a good reason for prohibition, but not a good reason for license. Why should the law say what superscription shall be placed on a bottle of whisky? How does Bro. Sheppard know such a superscription as he prescribes would tend to curtail the drinking of it? Would any one buy unless he intended to drink? Won't he buy it for what is inside and not for the legend that is on the outside? Do not anti-license and anti-treat laws abridge liberty as much as prohibitory laws? If we can evolute so nicely without prohibitory laws, why not without license laws? Why not abolish all laws and let evolution run it alone? D. PRIESTLY.

EMBREEVILLE, PA., Feb. 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for my paper for the current year. I feel that I hav been somewhat delinquent, not so much for not sending sooner the little mite above mentioned, but for withholding so long an expression of thanks for the fearless journal you and your able contributors are conducting. There are so many thoughtful articles in the paper from week to week that to eulogize one would be to notice all. Liberalism, or as Mr. Andrews would call it, Universalism, presents so many phases that the ignorant and uncultured class may readily find something that would materially aid them in becoming wise unto salvation—salvation from the trammel of hereditary beliefs and superstitious dogmas, which in all ages hav chained the human mind, Prometheus like, to the rock of time-hallowed errors. It would be needless to say that I hav recently drifted into the various phases presented by the untrammeled inquirer, for it has been a distinctiv trait from the time I had any recollection of thinking to investigate and hold fast to that which seemed to be good. In reading the able articles of S. P. Andrews I could not avoid reverting to the time when he was my teacher in phonography, not personally, of course, but all the same. The "Anglosacsun" published by Andrews & Boyle, I read from first to last. How truthful it is that when the mind gets into a channel of unprejudiced thought, by a law of progress it drifts into wider fields of thought inquiry. A reform of letters suggests a reform of theology, and eventually a disrespect for dogmatic beliefs. Truth is a unit in a multiplicity of phenomena, and the mind that rests on such a basis unfolds itself by entwining round those forms which seem the most rational.

J. H. Wood, in a late issue, puts forth a Greenback idea which, if well understood, might revolutionize politics. Friend Wood, giv us some more of your financial cogitations. True Liberals can work in so many different sections that there need not be any danger of stepping on each other's toes. A few clergymen hav become preachers of financial and monetary reform. We may look upon that as a good omen. Aside from the good work they will do in reconstructing public opinion in relation to a very important issue, and expose the time-hallowed speciebasis system and bank note promis to pay, they must eventually, by a law of mental science, evolve into a more Liberal field of thought. Guiteau evidently started out upon a wrong moral basis, which he has persisted in adhering to with the tenacity of a Christian, notwithstanding the efforts of the clergy to throw him on the Infidels or where he does not belong to clear their sacramental robes of the blood of a martyred president. Verily, bring up a child in the way he should go, and when he grows older he may not depart from it. Had he been taught the sweet lessons science presents in enchanting views instead of being nurtured in the Abrahamic doctrins of bloody atonement, Guiteau might hav been a man of some usefulness. But bad religion and bad politics, the two twin evils of this age, were too much for his excitable brain. W. I. HARVEY.

Nature.

As a fond mother, when the day is o'er,
Leads by the hand her little child to bed,
Half-willing, half-reluctant to be led,
And leaves his broken playthings on the floor,
Still gazing at them through the open door,
Nor wholly reassured and comforted
By promises of others in their stead,
Which, though more splendid, may not please him more;
So nature deals with us, and takes away
Our playthings, one by one, and by the hand
Leads us to rest so gently that we go,
Scarce knowing if we wish to go or stay,
Being too full of sleep to understand
How far the unknown transcends the what we know. —Longfellow.

"Priestcraft Exposed."

BY J. PETTY.

How the parson must laugh in his sleeve,
With pleasure his heart must be skippin',
When he tells us that Adam and Eve
Damned us all for a fine golden pippin;
How Cain, too, he married a wife,
Though the story, I own, somewhat odd is,
When to Nod he had to run for his life,
He then got a notion of Noddies.

When he talks about angels and such (Fine fellows, we all must allow),
I should like for to meet very much
A few of those gentlefolks now;
If he tells me they're all of them dead,
So my brains I've no need to be troubling,
I'll tell him he lies, to his head,
For the devil's alive and in Dublin.

Then how Moses was dragged from a ditch,
That prince of impostors of old,
Who deserved to be burnt like a witch,
If half is but true that we're told.
He a camel turned into a flea,
By the help of his magical rod, sir;
Went dry through the midst of the sea,
Now that's a damned good one, by God, sir.

How a stupid old fellow of Uz
Was cursed with a stupid old wife;
But so stupid's the tale, how it was,
I can't make it out for my life;
The devil, it seems, owed him spite,
And played him some devilish rigs,
Sent a legion of devils one night,
Who played hell with his poultry and pigs.

Then Samson, that quarrelsome fellow,
Slew a thousand men with a jaw-bone,
And to vex 'em one night when quite mellow,
Ran off with the gates of the town.
Their foxes he tied by the tails,
Though the devil a fox was e'er there;
Their windmills, too, went without sails,
And their castles were built in the air.

Little Davy killed giant Goliath,
With a popgun he sent him to pot,
Then murdered his friend poor Uriah
For the sake of his wife's—you know what.
His boy too, a chip of the block,
Had a house with a thousand or more in;
Sweet wenches to please the young cock,
The devil himself, sure, for—wooing.

But this is no more than a farce
To other fine things that they tell ye,
For one had a speaking jackass,
Another lived in a whale's belly;
With lions some lived in a den,
And others in furnaces frying,
But, heaven preserve us, some men
Are so terribly given to lying.

Elisha rode up the moon
In a chariot all flaming with fire,
But Enoch one fine afternoon
Flew a hundred a fifty times higher;
Elijah's two bears, it is said,
Eat forty poor boys at a time,
For just calling the fellow bald-head!
Now that was a terrible crime.

Captain Jossey called out to the sun
To stand still, so he did sure enough,
But I think it is time to have done
Repeating such old priestly stuff,
For when with this nonsense your crammed,
To make you believe it all true,
They'll say if you don't you'll be damned,
But I'm sure you'll be damned if you do.

From the Front.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: On January 4th I started out upon a trip likely to last four or five months. Going first to Iowa City, where is located the State University, I found J. J. Deitz and lady, Prof. P. H. Philbrick and lady, A. C. Younkin, Jesse Strawbridge, Thos. Whittiker, H. Kimbal, and other Freethinkers. Chapel attendance is compulsory in the university, but the professors are very remiss in their devotions, there being several Liberals among them, while Prof. Philbrick is an outspoken Atheist.

When the Liberals of this "Athens of Iowa" reach the constructiv stage of growth there will be a large and powerful organization in this beautiful little city. I must not omit to mention the superb library and art collection of Daniel Price, A.M.

To Mr. J. J. Deitz and Prof. Philbrick I am deeply indebted for aid cordially tendered and generous hospitality.

Rev. C. Clute, of the Unitarian church, is quite Liberal in his way, and he may become more so, for he buys and reads some of the most radical works.

At West Liberty I became acquainted with E. C. Thomas, James Westfall, Jon. Maxan, and Messrs. Elliot, Polder, and Stafford. There is but little Liberal life here, but in the surrounding country are quite a number of earnest workers, I understand.

At 8:55 P. M., Jan. 7th, I left West Liberty for Burlington, which place I did not reach until 8 A. M. Sunday, our train being delayed by a derailed freight. But when I reached Mr. W. Boecklin's, and found there that peerless worker, Mrs. H. S. Lake, I felt myself amply compensated for all difficulties encountered and fatigue endured in reaching the orchard city. I remained in Burlington eight days, making the acquaintance of a large number of hereties and distributing quite a large amount of Freethought literature, and listened to two of Mrs. Lakes grand lectures—lectures which grappled with the rampant evils of the present day and our own land. We hav some splendid Liberals here, such as Cornelia Boecklin, Werner Boecklin, Seth Eggleston, W. H. and James Ellery, J. C. Meader, A. Schloff, Theo. Geulich, C. Winzer, J. M. Virgin, Gertrude Poppe, and very many more whom I hav not space to enumerate. I am not surprised to hear that Mrs. Lake has since organized a League, and I believe that the Secularists of the city of hills will make it a success.

From Burlington I went to Yarmouth, where I lectured twice to good audiences. To Squire Glover and John Stafford is due the credit of this stirring of this stagnant pool of orthodoxy. While in Yarmouth I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Glover, than whom there do not liv more pleasant people and earnest humanitarians.

At Washington, my next stopping-place, I met Mrs. Axtell and Dr. Miller, also the Spiritualist lecturer Dr. A. J. Fishback, all former acquaintancs, and had the pleasure of meeting for the first time Dr. F. Rice and lady, John A. Wise and lady, Mrs. Brooks, and Dr. Scofield. Washington needs a real shaking up by a radical lecturer. Its people, like the people of many another place, will hav to be shocked into thinking and acting for the new order.

Brighton has a large Liberal element, and a League should be organized. Messrs. Rhodes, Ed. Deeds, Dr. Cushman, Nicholson, Friend, Jeffrey, and Heacock are all outspoken Secularists. Many more can be counted in when once the ball is set rolling, and now is always the time to begin.

At Ottumwa I had a very pleasant visit and found some splendid Liberals, among whom I must mention W. F. McCarroll and lady, J. M. Winn, O. C. Graves, Wm. Lindsey, J. B. Boulton, C. Kirkpatrick, Theodore Hardesty, and Mr. Chilton. Mrs. Fox is lecturing here regularly once in two weeks, very acceptably, to our Spiritualist comrades at least. The League needs enlivening, but owing to the smallpox scare it was not thought advisable to hav a meeting or lecture. Ottumwa is a growing, enterprising town, and it was very gratifying to find business men who are not ashamed nor afraid to let it be known that they do not fall prostrate in the dust before the Protestant's infallible oracle, the Bible.

Monday, Jan. 30th, at 2 A. M., I was off for Montrose, Lee county, away down in the southeastern corner of the state. On the Illinois side of the river is situated the town of Nauvoo, famous in Mormon history, and from whence the Latter Day Saints were driven by brutal force of Christian love.

Delivered three lectures at Montrose—"Why We Work for Freethought," "Demands of Liberalism," and "Popular Objections to Freethought." Earnest Freethinkers here are A. Crandall and W. G. Fischer. Also met S. Palmer, an old-time Liberal and lecturer from Nauvoo.

From Montrose to Osceola, Clarke county. Here the Christians had just been engaged in the characteristic pastime of hanging and burning—this time, the effigy of the unhappy Guiteau. Had they possessed the power it would hav been Guiteau himself. What an example of bloodthirstiness and revenge to set the young! When will people learn that only by creating better conditions, and improving pre-natal influences can the aggregate of crime be diminished, and a reverent respect for human life created and perpetuated?

I much regretted the absence from Osceola of that earnest worker, C. W. Dibble, but our old friend, F. J. Emery, the "sage of Osceola," gave me a hearty welcome, and I also had the pleasure of forming the acquaintance of J. G. Watts and Mr. Chamberlain, H. W. Beckett J. R. E. Doss, Prof. Hastings, John Alexander, and other Freethinkers of Osceola and vicinity. While here I listened to the sermon by Rev. Cushing, a young minister from Iowa City—a very pleasant young man, Liberal and just in his treatment of his opponents. He yet clings to a sort of pantheistic theism (if such an expression is permissible), and looks at the world through the Claude Lorraine glasses of optimism—kind, gentle, humane himself, he makes his God the same, failing to see that the cruel facts emphatically negativ the assumption.

Murray, Clarke county, was my next stopping-place, where I partook of the generous hospitality of J. E. Wick, a brother of that whole-souled laborer in the Liberal vinyard, Mrs. M. L. Follett. Met here also S. L. Shrever and other heretics.

From Murray to Creston, where I stopped only briefly, making the acquaintance of Henry Breitenstein and Dr. Wilson. Creston is a growing town, and I understand that there are several live Liberals in the C. B. & Q. roundhouse, where friend Breitenstein is foreman.

At Prescott I met with a warm reception and had a splendid visit with E. Clarke and lady, Elmer Clarke, J. B. Blackburn and lady, and G. S. Farhham. Met also a very enthusiastic young Liberal in the person of John Yeadan. Orthodoxy has lost its grip in Prescott and vicinity. Mr. E. Clarke has been for a year an apostle of the gospel of man, and the seed by him so bravely sown has fallen in fruitful soil, and the harvest promises to be abundant. I am under especial obligations to Messrs. Clark and Farnham for kind favors shown.

Next on to Corning, where I spoke on the evening of Feb. 15th, to a fair-sized and appreciativ audience. Not far in the future we may look for a League at this place. Among the outspoken Liberals at this point are W. D. McLaughlin, county clerk, H. B. Smith. John Bixley, and last but not least, A. M. Coff and lady, in whose pleasant home I was a guest during my stay. T. D. Holgate and lady, of Quincy, a village a few miles from Corning, came out to our meeting and gave indisputable evidence of being thorough-going Secularists.

E. C. WALKER.

H. L. Green's Lecture Trip.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: My last letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER was written from Elyria, Ohio. That town I found a very orthodox, conservativ place, and was surprised to see four or five hundred people assembled in the Opera House to listen to my lecture on "The Religion of Deed vs. The Religion of Creed." But for over two hours they listened very attentivly to what I had to say. There are but a few outspoken Freethinkers in Elyria, and among that number may be named Elner Adams, J. A. Tite, W. W. Laundon, William Allen, and J. E. Boyington, all true men. The prospects are that we shall soon hav a Liberal League in that dark and priest-ridden town.

At Clyde, Ohio, I did not succeed in getting up a meeting, but I had a very pleasant visit with three of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER Messers. Stephen DeLus, Z. L. Perrin, and M. O. Nichols. At Toledo I enjoyed a good visit with Frank Hillenkamp, as good a friend as Mr. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER hav. Here I also met M. O. Waggoner, Esq., one of the leading lawyers of Toledo, who is as live a Freethinker as I ever met. He is not afraid to express his opinions on every proper occasion.

Mr. Waggoner often speaks in public in defense of Freethought views, and I was informed that he is an able and eloquent speaker. I wish he could be induced to take the lecture field.

I went from Toledo to Adrian, where I was permitted to enjoy a short visit with that activ friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, S. D. Moore, who never fails of getting a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER or Investigator when opportunity offers. I learned that Mr. Moore often lectures for Liberal societies in that vicinity.

My next lecture was delivered near Burr Oak, and while there I was the guest of the interesting family of M. P. Thurston, and I also spent a day with Mr. Miles A. Dexter and his intelligent wife. I spoke at the brick school-house before Liberal League No. 167. This is one of the most prosperous Leagues in Michigan. Its officers are E. A. Campany, president; A. N. Thurston, secretary, and A. J. Hoyt, treasurer. I never enjoyed a visit more than this one in this Liberal country neighborhood. Mr. Thurston is some seventy years of age, but as lively as any man of fifty. He has a large family of children residing near him, all out-spoken in favor of Liberalism. The evening I arrived there he invited his children and other Liberal friends to his house, and we had a most agreeable social visit.

This League meets every alternate Sunday, and has a large attendance, and you may be assured it makes itself felt in that community. The day after the lecture Mr. Dexter took me in his carriage and drove me through the country after his fine team, for some fifteen miles, to the various residences of Liberals who are subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers. The day was more like June than February, and such a fine country I never passed through before. And I was pleased to learn that a large number of these wealthy farmers are outspoken Infidels. I shall never forget my pleasant ride with Brother Dexter. At Sturgis I staid over night with G. W. Gray, one of your subscribers. He is the proprietor of the Berridge House, a good hotel; and I advise all our friends traveling in that section to put up with him. My next stop was at Kalamazoo, where I was permitted to take the hand of Lucius C. West, a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a distinguished writer of fiction. Every Liberal parent should purchase for his children Mr. West's new juvenil book, entitled "Paul Hart; or, the Love of His Life," by Uncle Lute. It is an admirable work. I was also permitted here to meet your very industrious agent, C. S. Rowley, who is putting THE TRUTH SEEKER into every nook and corner of Michigan. He is a very good speaker, and as he is an old school teacher, he enjoys visiting the schools and addressing the children. At Holland, Michigan, I found very few Liberals, but I came across Mr. Thomas K. Fisher, and he subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I left him some copies of that paper and of the Investigator, and he promised to work up some subscribers there. I wish Liberal friends would send him some Liberal literature to distribute in this orthodox town.

At Muskegon I enjoyed a visit with Mr. and Mrs. William Jones, your friends, and was pleased to make the acquaintance of Mr. Fellows, who a few months since left the Episcopal pulpit and is now, after the style of George Chainey, speaking to a large audience in the Opera House every Sunday evening. After the Garfield prayer gage failed, he said to his congregation one evening at the opening of service, "I think, in view of the prayer failing in Mr. Garfield's case, we had better dispense with the prayer service hereafter;" and since then he has done so. He has an attendance of some five hundred every evening.

My next lecture was given at Hart, Mich. I was invited there by Mr. Curtis A. Ganes, and for two days enjoyed the hospitality of his home. Our meeting was held in the Court House, which was well filled. Here I made the acquaintance af J. A. Collier, Charles V. Warren and his worthy wife; E. D. Richardson, Z. C. Babcock, William H. Gale, Dr. Harden, and Charles Burr, all members of the Church of Humanity. From Hart I went south ten miles, and spoke at New Erie to a good congregation in the school-house. I spent a number of days in this new country, and found large-souled men and women in these log cabins of northern Michigan. If they hav not as much culture as we find in the East, they hav more good common sense, which is much better. Orthodoxy has but little strength in these parts, and the people all listen with live interest to Freethought discussion. I know that our great orator, Col. Ingersoll, will be pleased to know his likeness adorns many a log cabin and humble dwelling up among the pines of northern Michigan. Persons came on foot four and five miles to hear my lectures, and returned home through the dark. Of such a people we, as a nation, can well be proud. You can little realize, there in New York city, how these people enjoy every issue of your paper. The names of the committee who invited me to New Erie are L. E. Osborn, Stephen J. Ball, Thomas Eagles, and John M. Logan. Mr. Logan is as live and intelligent a Liberal as I ever met, and he never lets an opportunity pass for doing something to advance our cause. If I were twenty younger I would like to settle up in this northern country and spend the rest of my days lecturing for these people. Here is a splendid opportunity for some young, energetic man or woman, who likes frontier life, to settle as a preacher of Freethought.

To-morrow evening I am advertised to speak here, on Thursday evening at Rockford, on Saturday evening at Moncelona, some one hundred miles north of Grand Rapids. After that I go to Flint and other places north and east of here. I intended, when I left home, to go west as far as Kansas and Liberal, Mo., and shall do so if I can get out of Michigan. Friends west of here who desire my services will please address me at Otsego, Mich.

The West, and, in fact, the whole country, has recently been startled by the brave course that Geo. C. Miln of Chicago, has taken. He was the successor of Robert Collyer, of Unity church, Chicago, and his loss to that church is a great one; but their loss is a great gain to Liberalism. He was considered about the most eloquent man in that denomination, and it is evident he is an honest man when for conscience' sake he was willing to relinquish a six thousand dollars salary for the sake of being free to utter hereafter his honest convictions. I am pleased to notice that next month there is to be a Freethinkers' convention in Chicago, at which Mr. Miln, Prof. Adler, and Robert G. Ingersoll are to speak. I just received a letter from Mr. Miln, which I will take the liberty of sending you. He writes:

"MY DEAR SIR: I thank you very much for your kind words in your note of February 9th. The warm praise which you accord me I feel is scarcely deserved. I hav done that which was my duty to do. Who dares do this is worthy of the name of a man; who fears to do it is not.

"What the future has in store for me personally I cannot venture to predict. I believe with you that organization should be established throughout the length and breadth of the land, the fundamental idea of which should be the separability of religion and morality, and the development of a high order of morality independent of theological dogma. I expect to liv to see the day when ethics will be regularly inculcated separate from and independent of all foundation in supernaturalism."

"Very truly yours, GEORGE C. MILN."

I hope the Liberals of America will signify to this brave young man that he has gained more friends than he has lost, and I predict for for him a grand future. May he stand hereafter in Chicago for perfect liberty of speech, as does Prof. Adler in New York, George Chainey in Boston, and Col. Ingersoll everywhere. "The world moves."

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO
Bennett-Mair Discussion.
BETWEEN
D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.
(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

The Wilsonia Magnetic Clothing Co.,

Having purchased the patents, trade marks, and all the right, title, and interest of Mr. Wilson in the celebrated appliances known as Wilsonia Magnetic Clothing, and having at large expense procured the most improved labor-saving machinery, hav come to the conclusion that the time has now arrived when the benefits of these wonderfully curativ appliances can be placed within the reach of the whole mass of the population, poor as well as rich.

Although 30,000 patients in America hav already availed themselves of these garments, yet the hitherto high price has shut the door against hundreds of thousands of suffering invalids who might hav been restored to health and usefulness. Therefore, on and after this date, Feb. 22d, the price of our Magnetic Clothing will be reduced much below that formerly charged by Mr. Wilson, while the quality of the clothing will be much improved, and the high standard of excellence as a curativ agent fully maintained.

No matter how apparently marvelous our cures, no names will henceforth be published without the consent of the persons cured.

Beware of the worthless imitations, under various names, which hav followed the success of Wilsonia. 1t

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, aided by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be good and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Gems of Thought.

IF there are any persons who contest a received opinion, or who will do so if law or opinion will let them, let us thank them for it, open our minds to listen to them, and rejoice that there is some one to do for us what we otherwise ought, if we hav any regard for either the certainty or vitality of our convictions, to do with much greater labor for ourselvs.—Mill's Liberty.

THERE are critics who, because it serves their purpose to do so, argue that we must take all or nothing; the miraculous element is so omnipresent that we cannot disengage it from the remainder of the gospels without destroying them entirely. By this argumentum terrorem [argument addressed to our fears] it is their expectation to compel us to accept the miraculous element entire. But a good many of us would prefer the other horn of the dilemma. Painful as it would be to surrender Jesus as an actual spiritual force, it would not be so painful as to believe that the physical order of the world is so arbitrary and unstable as it would be if Jesus turned water into wine, or walked upon the sea.—J. W. Chadwick.

TIME makes ancient good uncouth,
They must up and onward who would keep abreast of truth.

"WILL it pay now for you to speak out boldly against the errors of our old religion? Will it prove any advantage to you to urge the adoption of this new faith? Look at your business, which will be wholly revived if you come out openly as a Christian! Your old friends will desert you. Just be content to hold your peace. Entertain what views you will in secret, but, for policy's sake, keep silent!" Now, these words, which might hav been, with perfect propriety, addressed to the convert to Christianity in the third century, are precisely similar to those which the majority of Radicals, in the nineteenth century, hear daily from their friend of the old faith.—Stoddard's New Faith.

IT does not appear that before the times of Christianity any infirmary, hospital, or public charity of any kind, existed in the world; whereas, most countries in Christendom have long abounded with these institutions. To which may be added, that a spirit of private literature seems to flourish amidst the decay of many old virtues; not to mention the legal provision for the poor, which obtains in England and which was unknown and unthought of by the most humanized nations of antiquity.—Paley. The provisions for the relief of poverty, the entire absence of which one would infer from the representations of Christian writers, were really abundant—indeed, so great that they became an encouragement to idleness. Under Augustus 200,000 persons received monthly gratuitous distributions of corn. When Egypt was afflicted by famin, Trajan fed the people from other granaries of the empire, etc. The emperor Trajan provided for the support of 5,000 children by the government. In the little Italian town of Villia, the same emperor instituted a charity which partially supported 270 children, etc. Benefit societies, providing against casualties, by paying monthly into a common fund, existed in the pagan empire, and, indeed, were not unknown in pagan Greece 400 B. C.—Underwood's Influence of Christianity on Civilization.

JAMBLICHUS reports that Pythagoras, five centuries before our era, taught "the love of all to all," and Menander, the dramatist, said, "To liv is not to liv for one's self alone, let us help one another;" and later, Epitatus maintained that "the universe is but one great city, full of beloved ones, divine and human, endeared to each other." Antoninus thought that "we must love mankind."—T. M. Higginson.

THE Christian church proclaims daily the acceptableness to God of the great human sacrifice, pictures the body torn upon the cross, and dwells with earnest iteration upon the "blood" shed on Calvary, and its necessity to appease the wrath of God. But it inculcates at the same time on man, pity, compassion, and justice. A sincere but mistaken religious sentiment binds it to the essential cruelty and injustice involved in God's acceptance of such a sacrifice as it depicts.—Samuel Longfellow.

THE five commandments of the Buddhist religion, which dates six centuries before the Christian era, and counts among its adherents more millions than any other church, are these: 1. Thou shalt not kill. 2. Thou shalt not steal. 3. Thou shalt not commit adultery, or any impurity. 4. Thou shalt not lie. 5 Thou shalt not intoxicate thyself with drink.—Sacred Books of Ceylon.

IN all times men have praised honesty, moral purity, beneficence. In all times men hav protested against murder, adultery, perjury, and all kinds of sin. No one will dare maintain that it is better to do injustice than to bear it.—Aristotle.

BLEST are they
Whose sorrow rather is to suffer wrong
Than to do wrong, although themselvs hav erred.
—Wadsworth.

A SWEETNESS which is nature's own
Breathes out from fern and brake.—Whittier.

So build we up the being that we are;
Thus deeply drinking in the soul of things
We shall be wise perforce; and while inspired
By choice, and conscious that the will is free,
Unswerving shall we move, as if impelled
By strict necessity—along the path
Of order and of good. —Wordsworth.

BEWARE of those who promis too freely. The earnest doer is chary of professions and promises, but labors to perform and to accomplish. Promis rarely and perform punctually. One broken promis clings to a man's character as a blot and stain forever. Keep, then, the record-pages of thy life sacred to truth, honesty, and virtue and the tongue of slander will hav no dread for thee, while thy own consciousness of an unsullied name will render thee proud and happy.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

"STOP the press!" the editor frantically shouted to the young fellow who was hugging his sweetheart.

THE facetious postage-stamp clerk that told a man that asked for 'wo twos that this was not an æsthetic post-office is now looking for a new situation.

ANOTHER member of the New York Legislature has sent his pass back to Vanderbilt. He sent it back to hav it made out for his family instead of himself alone.

"CHEESE it," said the rat to the trap. "I will," said the trap, "and with baited breath I await your coming." "All right," responded the rat, "and I'll wire you the result."

No tidings hav been received from Stanley, the explorer, for two years. It is rumored that he did not go to Africa, but that he joined the New York police force and has gone to sleep on his beat

PERHAPS in two thousand years hence there will come a man to Chios to make excavations in the ruins of the destroyed towns, and make out of an old, broken barber-cup and three broken chairs the statue of the apostle Paul.

"So you are going to lecture?" inquired a friend of a musical professor recently. "What on?" "Well, if I am entirely sober, on my feet," was the reply. "That's wrong," was the response; "never giv superficial talk on large subjects."

MAYBE you can bat over the pyramids with a tallow candle, but you cant convince a woman that the railroad men are not brutal because they won't keep a train waiting for her to kiss her friends and say "good-by" for the twentieth time.

AN Aberdonian gave sixpence towards having a prayer offered for fine weather. None came. When he next went to church, and the plate came round, he took out sixpence, saying, "I'll hae my saxpence back again; I'm na goin' to be swindled."

A RAILROAD man met with a painful accident the other evening. He had just emptied one schooner of beer, and was in the act of reaching for another when his wife appeared unexpectedly upon the scene. He was caught between the bumpers with the usual result.

"SAY, boy!" called a woman to a barefooted lad, and admonishingly shaking a forefinger, "what are you throwing water on that cat fur?" "The water won't hurt the cat fur," replied the youth, and the woman whose grammar was rebuked said she didn't want any of his "sass."

AN Englishman vouches for an anecdote which illustrates the vigor of Calvinism. A border-land Presbyterian, on the point of death, made his wife read the Bible to him. Upon her remarking, at a strange verse, that it was curious that God's word was so hard to understand, the dying man shouted out in a fury, "Damn the woman; does she not believe the Bible?"

A SCENE in a new opera is laid in the Garden of Eden. The critics are rather severe upon Adam because he wears a paper collar, a velvet cloak, a diamond pin, and carries a sword. But these trifling anachronisms should be willingly overlooked. The fashions prevailing in the Garden of Eden in the year 1 are hardly suitable for the stage in the nineteenth century. They would occasion remark—save in an English ballet.

THE class in natural history was before the examining board, and had been answering questions as to the use of various domestic animals, when one of the examiners, a simple-minded farmer, very fond of fishing, puzzled the pupils by asking. "What are eels for?" Nobody appeared to know until a lad on one of the back seats said, "I think I can guess." "Well, go ahead," replied the examiner. "What are they for?" "To skin," was the answer.

PITH AND POINT.

Here lies a man whose crown was won
By blowing in an empty gun.
No sooner in the gun he blew
Than up the golden stair he flew,
And met the girl on heaven's green
Who lit the fire with kerosene.
He also saw astride a stool
The man who tampered with a mule.
He also saw—'twas mighty sore—
The man who whistled "Pinafore"
And further on the miner cove
Who thawed his powder on the stove.

THERE are people who become honest only when there is nothing more to steal. That kind of virtue has too many examples.

Mr. Stephens has many stories to tell of negroes, and one is of a famous cotton and chicken depredator, who since the war met the ex-vice-president in the road.

"Well, Thomas," was the kindly salutation, "I was sorry to hear you had been in trouble about Mrs. Tripp's chickens."

"Yes, Mars Alec; but I done quit all dat now," said the negro, very penitent!

"How many did you take before you stopped?" asked Mr. Stephens.

"I tuk all she had," was the perfectly innocent reply.

U. S. G. TO COLUMBIA.

List to the strains that I murmur so loverly.
Yet once again by thy side let me be;
Scorn the tame grace of that ancient De Coverly,
Old Peter Cooper or Samuel T.
Hav I not traveled with energy furious
Over all countries and over all seas,
Feasted by kings, interviewed by the curious,
Worshiped by aldermen down on their knees?
Did I not rail at the Turks in Bulgaria.
Dine with Victoria and lunch with the Czar,
Swig at champagne with the king of Bavaria,
Back the Khedive in a family jar?
Smooth from thy brow every trace of severity,
Pledge me this toast spite of "barrels" of tricks,
"Liv the brass medal to deathless posterity,

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

Notes and Clippings.

DR. STROTHER, a Kentucky lecturer, holds that the Garden of Eden was the Mississippi Valley, and that Noah's ark started from Manhattan Island.

A CHINAMAN, dying of consumption in Chicago, erected an altar in his laundry, and worked before it, with his face to the East, as long as he was able to work at all.

ASA BRIGGS died a few days ago at Shutesbury, Mass. Conscious of his approaching end, he desired that a certain minister living in a neighboring town should attend his burial service, giving as a reason, "They say he's a good hand at a funeral, and I'd like to hear him just once."

THE German translation of "Nana" has been suppressed in Berlin. American libraries hav relegated the English translation to the department called the "inferno," from which books are given out only with the consent of the managers. These "infernos" contain many of the works of the best authors.

IT is customary in Zion Methodist churches for members to pass in front of the chancel rail at each Sunday morning service, and lay on the treasurer's table their contributions. Treasurer Hill on a recent occasion took his seat as usual in the Saratoga church. Pastor Tylor ordered brothers Lee and Bordley to remove him and take charge of the money. This was done, amid great excitement.

THE Rev. Mr. Hall, a Unitarian, of Worcester, Mass., is hardly more than favorably disposed toward the Christian religion, as appears from the following remark in a recent sermon: "In honoring Christianity's founder, only justice has been done to his spiritual leadership; and when the age in which he lived, his position, and the work he did are considered, it will be acknowledged that his life was one of simplicity and worthy of following."

A CONVERT to the Jasperian theory that "the sun do move" is the Rev. Adam Pflenger, pastor of the German Lutheran church at Thornville, O. He is a man of high standing in his community. At a meeting to discuss the question, he was met on the platform by the county superintendent of schools, but the arguments of that person found little favor with the audience, as the enlightened inhabitants of Thornville are with Pflenger and Jasper by a large majority.

ON Sunday, the 5th, the pastor of the American Presbyterian church was called upon to proclaim the removal from the roll of church membership of five of his congregation at their own request for the reason that they had adopted views conflicting with the doctrins of evangelical religion. Before taking final action in the matter, those in authority conferred with the heretical members to discuss with them the points of difference, and to persuade them to reconsider their position. Their efforts were unavailing.

A FRESH and rather embarrassing subject has been provided for convocation in England by a clergyman who seeks a recognition of the legality of concubinage. The application appears to be perfectly bona fide, and is in the nature of an appeal from the bishop of London, who declined to admit the lawfulness of the relations into which the applicant had entered, and virtually excommunicated him on account of them. That the law of England recognizes no such tie would probably not be regarded by the petitioner as an adequate answer, for his case is stated with exclusiv reference to the laws and canons of the church. He argues that the lower form of marriage was expressly permitted in the early church, and has never been forbidden by the church of England. The divines to whom this knotty point has been submitted hav hitherto excused themselvs from considering it, on the plea of business, or some such frivolous pretext, and it is supposed that convocation will follow their example.

STATISTICALLY inclined persons will find in the following figures much food for thought. During 1881, 38,624 deaths occurred in New York city, and 35,000 births were reported. For the education of children some $4,000,000 was expended, while the drinking places, of which there are 9,215, absorbed, it is estimated, the enormous sum of $60,000,000. Of the army of wine-bibbers who cast their substance into this pool 32,391 were committed to the Tombs. The amount expended in public amusements of all sorts amounted to $7,000,000. In the police stations 120,084 persons asked for and were furnished with lodgings, and 21,000 outdoor poor were relieved. In the police courts 67,135 persons were arraigned. Crimes of violence were committed by 5,819 persons. Charity sent to the almshouses, hospitals, nurseries, schools, and asylums 131,765 persons. Of our immense population of nearly a million and a half 172,777 are females between the ages of 15 and 30 years; 30,000 of whom are domestic help.

IN Verona, Italy, the official intrusted by the Syndic to issue licenses for marriage mixed up the names of the applicants in such sort that when the day arrived for uniting a number of young couples, the wrong people found themselvs named in the document and had to choose between taking the partners selected for them, or postponing their marriage altogether for some time. With much reluctance on the part of some, and joy on the part of others, the ceremony was allowed to proceed, a number of people who, until then, had been strangers to one another, being declared respectivly man and wife in true Italian form. In the opinion of the Syndic this was not a matter of much importance, it being certain, in that gentleman's opinion, that thus mated they would experience quite as few disappointments as they would had they each chosen their own mates for life; while by promptly agreeing to accept the official arrangement they had saved the state representativs much trouble and not wasted the time of its clerks in preparing fresh licenses in return for the fees.

UNDER the heading, "A Batch of Pious Thieves," the Brooklyn Eagle proceeds in this wise: "About seventeen years ago a merchant of this city was a member of a firm which entrusted $80,000 in securities with a stock broker of the name of Richard Cornwell, with the understanding that they were to be held and not sold. Mr. Cornwell was selected as the custodian of this property because he was a good fellow whom everybody habitually 'let up on easily'—by which is probably meant that his faults were never so severely regarded as the failings of other people. What made him particularly deserving of this indulgence was something especially Brooklynese: 'He was very activ in church work.' In other words he was professionally pious. After a time the mercantil firm demanded their securities of this pious gentlemen, and learned that in the effusion of his godliness he had sold them and pocketed the money. The firm recovered about $30,000. It did not send Mr. 'Dick' Cornwell to state prison for theft, not because $50,000 was too trifling a sum to make trouble about, but because he was 'very activ in church work.' He was trustee and superintendent of the Sunday-school, and that gave him a certain sanctity, which in its turn privileged him to steal with impunity. As a consequence of this immunity Mr. Cornwell's business standing was not affected. He was made, however, to resign his position in the church and Sunday-school. But churches and Sunday-schools exist without number in this country, and since he discovered that connection with them gave him a special license to plunder, Mr. Cornwell moved to Plainfield, N. J., ahd there renewed his sanctimonious activity. He speedily turned it to good account, for he secured a position as loan clerk in the Fourth National Bank of New York at a salary which, with legitimate perquisits, gave him an income of $5,000 a year. His pious demeanor and religious zeal caused the directors and other officers of the bank to trust him implicitly. He was their most confidential clerk, a model of Christian graces and a pattern to the worldly young men in the bank. For years Mr. 'Dick' Cornwell enjoyed the veneration of his Plainfield neighbors. It is true that three scoundrels who robbed the Mechanics' Bank of Newark of more than two million dollars were all models of piety, and had pews close to the pulpit in their respectiv churches. It is also commonly understood that excessiv religious zeal is the favorit cloak for criminals, and that a large number of persons will hav nothing to do in a business way with pious persons. Nevertheless, when one of the officers of the Fourth National Bank called Mr. 'Dick' Cornwell's attention to a slight discrepancy in his accounts he knew from that estimable person's religious reputation that it could easily be explained. So indeed it was, but not in a religious way, except so far as confession is concerned. Mr. 'Dick' Cornwell said frankly that he had been in the habit of stealing securities and had thus robbed the bank to the best of his knowledge and belief of $80,000, the exact amount which he stole from the Brooklyn firm. The bank officers are overwhelmed with grief, so much so that after notifying the controler of the currency they hav done nothing but wring their hands and shed tears over the fall of this righteous robber. Mr. 'Dick' Cornwell's activity in the church has again protected him from arrest. Still the shock to his nerves has been very great, and the scholars of the Plainfield Methodist Sunday-school over which he presides with much dignity are deeply distressed to learn that he is quite sick. Indeed, their distress is pardonable. Only last Monday the treasurer of the Plainfield Baptist church, poor fellow, severed his connection with that institution by means of strychnine, owing to the unfortunate circumstance that he could not blind the other excellent pietists of the church to the fact that he had stolen $3,000 of the church's money. This is a source of double regret to the good Baptists of Plainfield. That by virtue of his connection with their church he was at liberty to steal was, of course, understood; but that he should put his predatory talents into operation against those that licensed him to peculate was an outrage. Public feeling in the Plainfield Baptist church was so strong against Mr. Nelson Gardner that he committed suicide, and thus deprived that flourishing organization not only of its money but of its treasurer's faithful services. Is it a mere coincidence that bank cashiers and clerks who rob their employers are all pious? Isi t merely an accident that Mr. Winston, of Boston, wrote 'Rev.' before his name; that the two Baldwins and their precious companions, of Newark, who robbed the Mechanics' Bank, all responded to the Litany from pews very near the pulpit and were known for their 'activity in the church;' that Misdirector Condict, of the same bank, charged with aiding the pious Baldwin in his thefts, is also a very religious person; that Mr. 'Dick' Cornwell superintended all the Sunday-schools he could get into; that the peculativ and suicidal Mr. Nelson Gardner was so distinguished for his ecclesiastical labors that he was made treasurer of the Plainfield Baptist church? To the matter-of-fact, intelligent world it is not. There is a text of scripture, which religious persons profess to regard as inspired, which warns them to beware of persons of excessiv religious professions, and the narrativ of the New Testament teems with denunciations of Pharisees and hypocrits. The wise man of to-day looks with suspicion upon all who impress him with their piety. A man's religious convictions should be the very last thing known about him. He who is famous for his piety is a good man to deal with on the basis of cash payments alone. Before very long no person will be put into a position of trust of whom a vigilant detectiv can report that he is a church-member, or takes any interest whatever in the Sunday-school. It is time that religion ceased to be a business."

THERE is a condemned murderer in the Tombs of this city awaiting execution who declares himself to be a "nineteenth century Infidel." He has been reprieved three times to giv him a chance to repent, and pious people pray for him continually, to the entire neglect of the Christian Guiteau. An unbelieving criminal is a curiosity, but it is a long lane that has no turning.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

The Book of Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh.

29. But, to return to the holies. A priest or monk—and there are lots of them in this holy church—was called by ringing a bell, and he showed an iron screen, in which was kept a portion of the stone column to which Jesus was tied when he was scourged; it is called the Pillar of Flagellation. It is wrong to doubt the reality of this Christian claim, for a cane or stick is kept lying by the side of the screen, which the Scribe took and stuck through the screen and felt something hard. He could doubt no longer, even if he were to be flagellated himself.

30. Moving on through the surrounding holy gloom a small chapel is reached called the Prison of our Lord, and here were what look like stone stocks, in which, tradition says (and who will refuse to believe what tradition says?), the limbs of the son of God were once cruelly confined. How Tradition found out about it is not stated. Probably she had a dream while wide awake.

31. A curious feature of this holy place is that a short column rises from the stone floor, which is authoratively stated to be the center of the earth; and it is furthermore said that Jesus himself declared it to be such. That would, of course, have great weight were it not for the damaging fact that Jesus thought the earth was a flat body of land more than one hundred and fifty miles across, and he had not the slightest idea that it was round like a ball. It had been so long since he made it that its spherical form had slipped his memory. A person will sometimes forget those little affairs.

32. It is said, moreover, that the center of the earth changes occasionally, by considerable bodies of land on one edge of the earth breaking off and falling away down nowhere; and when such an event occurs the pillar in this church immediately indicates it by changing position to correspond. How wonderful these mysteries are!

33. The most curious, perhaps, of all among the remarkable collection of holy wonders in that most remarkable church, is the tomb of Adam, the erring father of us all. The Scribe was prepared to meet all that had been presented to him, but this was unexpected, and affected him not a little as he looked through a small open porthole, where a lamp is kept burning, and saw the tomb itself. He will hardly undertake to describe the feelings that came over him. He could not weep, but he kept up a very sorrowful thinking.

34. And said he, How wonderful all this is that so many miraculous incidents should center right here in this one spot! What a remarkable coincidence that the grave of the first Adam should be right here almost under the spot were the second Adam gave up his life on account of the apple which Adam of the first part had eaten four thousand years before!

35. Then it was that the man of God James lifted his voice and spake these words: This is too much; this is carrying it too far; it cannot be true. And then did the Scribe rebuke him in this wise: Mr. James, it will not do for you to doubt any part of it. You must accept it all without a falter. This is just as true as all the rest of the claims that are set up in this place. And verily the man of God looked sorrowful, and still said, It cannot be true.

36. It is, indeed, more than marvelous that the blood of the second Adam, while he was paying the debt due to divine and eternal justice, contracted by the first Adam, should trickle down and touch the decomposing bones of the first Adam, and thus make it possible for the apple-eater to be happy yet. Oh, what a grand scheme is the atoning blood of the second Adam!

37. Among the ancient relics in this collection of antiquities is the grave of the Scribe's Venerable Friend Melchisedec. It was a little startling to meet it so unexpectedly, but he is getting used to these startling incidents, and he consoled himself by the reflection that this claim is undoubtedly as true as the others.

38. There are so many of these curiosities in this holy museum that some will have to be passed over hurriedly, with a bare mention. The schedule should read something like this: The tombs of Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea; the chapel of the Roman soldier who thrust the spear into the side of Jesus; the veritable place where St. Helena found the crosses; the same is in a cavern, which, it is said, was once a cistern, but it does not matter, so the crosses were found there.

39. Hard by is an altar dedicated to St. Demas, the good thief that became penitent at the last moment. Here also is a monument in bronze of St. Helena herself, which was presented by Emperor Maximilian, who was shot in Mexico. It seems even that deed did not save him.

40. In connection with the Roman soldier who speared Jesus, it must be said that he came to see the mistake he had made when the vail of the temple was rent, in the awful darkness that followed; when the rock of Golgotha was riven asunder; when the graves were opened, and those who had been quietly sleeping in their graves were infused with new life, and walked out into the city among their former companions—which remarkable events, by the way, nobody knew anything about except Matthew—the soldier was duly amazed, and while shaking with fear, said, Surely this was the son of God.

41. Where the Roman soldier stood when he uttered those words the altar stands now that commemorates his memory. It was on the self-same spot that the priests of the temple beheaded him for the blasphemous words just quoted, but now he is honored. In this altar was kept for a long time the copper plate upon which Pilate is said to have written THIS IS THE KING OF THE JEWS, but it has now been taken to Rome, where the very legible inscription can still be seen.

42. It is curious how this plate was found by St. Helena, when she was hunting around and discovering so many relics which confirm the Christian story. She seemed to have the ability to find whatever she wanted, and whatever she looked for. As Mark Twain the jester says, She traveled all over Palestine, and was always fortunate. Whenever the good old enthusiast found a thing mentioned in her Bible, Old or New, she would go and search for that thing, and never stop until she found it. If it was Adam, she would find Adam; if it was the ark, she would find the ark; if it was Goliah or Joshua, she would find them. A very good hunter and finder was St. Helena.

43. Too much praise cannot be awarded her for her energy in hunting for the true cross. She had the solid rock blasted out some eight or ten feet below the cistern, and though it was very laborious work, she toiled on and was successful in the end; for down there in the solid rock she found the blessed cross, in fact two crosses, and there she found the crown of thorns, and the nails that went through the hands and feet, and the copper plate aforesaid.

44. She had good reason to be well satisfied with her find in this place, and was about to rest from her labors, when she was instructed in a dream to continue on still longer. She had another day's blasting done, when (will wonders never cease?) she found the cross of the impenitent thief, and all that had to be done was to have the sick woman put to the test to decide which was which. The Christian world owes much to St. Helena and the priests.

45. Another holy curiosity is the sword of King Godfrey, of Jerusalem, which was often and often wet with Saracenic blood. It went through the holy wars, and is still presentable to the pious beholder. This sword is said to have had the remarkable faculty of pointing to Moslem foes, and starting for them by itself, if King Godfrey happened to be busy and could not accompany it. How many thousand Saracens this valorous blade has thus slain is not certainly known, but, with and without Godfrey's aid, it is supposed to have done immense execution, and shed rivers of Moslem blood. It is a straight, two-edged sword, three feet long still, though ten inches have been broken off.

46. The bones of Godfrey and his brother Baldwin, the first Christian kings of Jerusalem, were once lying quietly together near the sepulcher which they fought so savagely to rescue, but the place that once knew them now knows them no more, and even the coverings of their tombs are gone; for being of the Romish church, the Greek church, differing in a few insignificant points, could not tolerate them, and caused their removal. The church is jointly owned by the two churches, but their quarrels, even with respect to the sepulcher of their God, are frequent and bitter, and they have even gone to such lengths in their warfare that the Turkish soldiers have to be set over them to keep them apart, and to keep the peace between the brother followers of Jesus.

47. In the walls of the holy sepulcher is a hole, or two holes, through which, on Easter eve, it is pretended that holy fire is handed, which was brought down from heaven. The priests probably manufacture the fire inside. Credulous dupes gather there in great numbers to witness the visitation from heaven. The patriarch enters the sepulcher, and the fire immediately seems to descend from heaven and light the candles on the altar. The patriarch then passes the fire out through the hole, and a bundle of burning tapers is handed to the priests, and the pilgrims in wild excitement rush round with their tapers and candles to have them kindled from the sacred flame.

48. Large sums of money are paid to have the candles lighted speedily by the priests, and in this way a considerable revenue is derived; the church is thus soon illuminated by the fire supposed by the simple ones to be direct from heaven itself. Hardly a year passes but what the most disgraceful scenes occur in connection with the holy fire fraud. In 1834 it was particularly so, besides being very bloody.

49. On that occasion the rush for the holy fire was unusually great and the assemblage became extremely wild. The following correct description, by an eye-witness, shows what this holy fire imposition sometimes leads to: The guards outside, frightened at the rush from within, thought that the Christians wished to attack them, and the confusion soon grew into a battle. The soldiers with their bayonets killed numbers of fainting wretches, and the walls were spattered with the blood and brains of men who had been felled like oxen with the butt ends of the soldiers' muskets. Every one struggled to defend himself, and in the mêlée all who fell were immediately trampled to death by the rest.

50. So desperate and savage did the fight become that even the panic-stricken and frightened pilgrims appeared at last to have been more intent upon the destruction of each other than desirous to save themselves. For my part, as soon as I had perceived the danger, I cried to my companions to turn back, which they had done, but I myself was carried on by the press till I came near the door, where all were fighting for their lives. Here, seeing certain destruction before me, I made every endeavor to get back. An officer of the pasha, equally alarmed with myself, was also trying to return.

51. He caught hold of my cloak and pulled me down on the body of an old man who was breathing out his last sigh. As the officer was pushing me to the ground, we wrestled together among the dying and the dead with the energy of despair. I struggled with this man till I pulled him down, and happily got on my legs (I afterward discovered that he never arose again), and, scrambling over a pile of corpses, I made my way back into the body of the church. The dead were lying in heaps, even upon the stone of unction, and I saw full four hundred wretched people, dead and dying, heaped promiscuously one upon another, in some places above five feet high (Curzon's Monasteries of the Levant).

52. In front of the church, and close by, stands a somewhat imposing Mohammedan minaret. The legend connected with it is like this: The conqueror Omar once visited the church of the Holy Sepulcher, and when he emerged from it, as it was the hour of prayer, he knelt in the court and prayed. He was asked why he did not pray in church, to which he answered, Had I prayed there, after my death the people would take the church from you; hence I pray here. The minaret was built to commemorate the prayer.

53. Leaving the church where so much holiness is concentrated, the pilgrims were led through narrow, crooked, and dirty streets to the Wailing Place of the Jews It is close by the west wall of the court of the temple, or what is now the mosque of Omar. The wall is composed of large blocks of stone, some of which are claimed, though without authority, to be the stones laid by Solomon. Here congregate on every Friday afternoon, from three to five o'clock, the unhappy Jews who live in Jerusalem, including old men with black turbans or caps, men in dingy, greasy gabardine and other grotesque apparels, and in dolorous voice they read the book of Lamentations, or some equally melancholy matter, their bodies swaying to and fro as with mournful tongue they bewail the overthrow of the holy city and pray for its restoration.

54. Next was visited the ruins of the hospital of the Knights of St. John, or Knights Templar, built by the Crusaders in the eleventh century, partly to accommodate pilgrims. The ruins are extensive, but not pleasant to contemplate, in memory of the blood and cruel scenes connected with the wars of the Crusades. When the Knights left Jerusalem they went to Cyprus, and thence to Rhodes, from whence the Moslems drove them to Malta.

55. The pilgrims took the street next to the south wall and picked the hyssop and other plants growing in the crevices of it, while on their way to the tomb of David, where not only the fighting king, but other kings of Judea, were said to be buried. But as some half a dozen different places are claimed for the tomb of David, as the present site rests solely on a Moslem tradition of the fifteenth century (unfortunately St. Helena did not locate this tomb), and as it makes very little difference where the old murderer and adulterer was buried, the Scribe was little interested in the matter and made his way back to the hotel, thinking he had holiness enough for one day. What is called the tomb, however, is a short distance from the city wall, and near Mount Zion.

CHAPTER XXXII.

MELCHISEDEC'S FOURTEENTH VISIT.

1. And it came to pass that on the second night in the holy city the Venerable Visitor was on time and put in an appearance at the usual hour. A genial smile lighted up his countenance, and a spirit of cheerfulness seemed to rest upon him like a garment. His voice was mild and placid, and a halo of peace inclosed him like a mantle. His salutation was in these words:

2. Well, my young friend, thou hast to-day visited a part of the holy places in this city, and thou hast had a good opportunity to judge whether the seeing of them has had a tendency to increase thy faith in the extravagant claims which Christian propagandists have set up. Thou hast certainly been able to see that there is no dearth of demands constantly made upon the visitor's credulity. The strain is so great, and the magnitude of the stories which have to be accepted is such, that it seems indeed a marvel how sensible people can be induced to yield consent that they can possibly be true.

3. I perceive that thou art staggered at the extreme improbability of so many marvelous events being located around one small fraction of the earth's surface, while millions upon millions of other places have been favored with nothing of the kind. It may be accepted as an axiom of truth that such a great number of coincidences of a remarkable character cannot fall to the lot of any such small portion of the earth's surface. And as with all miracles, it is much easier to forge the claims than to show that they possess the slightest truth.

4. I think thou smiledest a trifle when my tomb was pointed out to thee; and thou wonderedest for a moment if there could be any truth in the claim. There is little danger of thy believing too much, or of accepting upon sheer trust a mass of bald and unsustained assertions. But let me assure thee right here that there is not a word of truth in the story about my tomb. My bones do not repose there, and never did. It is a piece of barefaced fabrication—wholly the invention of designing and lying priests.

5. But it contains just about the same amount of truth that do the other stories which are told about the spot where that old church stands, and I give thee my word that there have been more lies to the square foot told in connection with that place than about any other point of similar size on the earth. And I will extend the domain, and say that more lies have been told and printed about this city and this little country than about any other city and country of the same dimensions in the world.

6. The current system of religion, which is an outgrowth of the monstrous theology which had its birth here, is in a like manner made up of the basest assertion, the most unproved claims, and the most positive falsehoods. To walk around that church where thou wast to-day, and listen to the absurd and senseless demands made upon one's credulity, is enough to convince a person of ordinary perception and acuteness of the worthlessness and falseness of the entire system to which it belongs.

7. Truth never needs any such assistance. Truth never needs to be sustained by falsehood. Truth is never made stronger or more convincing by being propped with lies. And where a system is found with absurdities and falsehood sticking out all around it, with props and pillars of the baldest invention to keep it up, it is sure to be false from the very foundation. Truth and falsehood do not blend well together, and cannot be made to coalesce into a homogeneous compound; so when an unmistakable amount of falsehood crops out, as with the Christian system, know of a truth that it is false throughout.

8. Age improves some things and depreciates the value of others. But there is one thing most true: Age will never change falsehood into truth. Time can have no such effect. Truth will ever remain truth, and falsehood must ever remain falsehood. No amount of pious looks and pretensions, no amount of ceremonies and observances, no amount of prayers and sermons, no amount, even, of sincerity and devotion, no number of priests and churches, can ever change falsehood into truth.

9. I propose on this occasion to continue the reviewing I have made in former visits. I have enumerated a part of the falsehoods and improbabilities contained in the Old Testament, and now I will continue the review and take up the New Testament. I will begin, then, with the genealogical claim for Jesus, as set up by Matthew, or rather the writer of the book called Matthew, for Matthew surely was not the author of it. A clear stultification is made, for in attempting to make out the genealogy of Jesus, it begins with David and ends with Joseph, notwithstanding the idea that Joseph held no blood relationship to Jesus is constantly held up. If Joseph was not his father, why give a genealogy ending with Joseph? The falsity of this course must be apparent.

10. Matthew and Luke are the only two gospel writers who attempt to give the genealogy of Jesus, and they are both guilty of the absurdity of giving the genealogy of Joseph instead of Jesus, while both insist that there was no more consanguinity between them than between any other two men in the nation. But in another particular they differ widely: Matthew says there are twenty-eight generations between David and Joseph, while Luke says there were forty-three. Both could not be true. If Luke spoke truly, Matthew stated a falsehood.

11. Matthew says Mary was found to be with child by the Holy Ghost, but he leaves the statement in a very imperfect condition. He neither tells us who found this to be the case, nor the means by which it was ascertained. He should have given the difference in the indications presented by a young woman when with child by the Holy Ghost and by an ordinary person. The statement bears the appearance of falsehood upon the face of it. If the writer ventured to say so much, he should have gone further, and told all. Had the young girl been placed in an interesting condition by some priest, and the object was to screen it and give the event a miraculous character, the writer would be very likely to bungle it much in the style of the writer of Matthew.

12. It is very unlikely that Joseph could have dreamed the matter out, that his troubled mind should be set at rest on such a subject so deeply interesting to him as his young wife becoming enciente by another, by a dream, or that the writer of Matthew, either seventy or a hundred and seventy years afterward—long after Joseph and Jesus were dead—should have the slightest means of knowing what Joseph had dreamed. When a man undertakes to tell dead people's dreams, set him down for a liar.

13. It is positively untrue that a ghost of any kind, whether holy or unholy, can impregnate a female in the body. A ghost is nothing more than a phantom, a shadow, an unreality in the ordinary idea of the properties of matter, and it is utterly impossible for it to act the part of begetting children. None but a living, developed, corporeal male can perform that function. It would be just as sensible, and just as truthful, to claim that a woman was the father of Jesus, as that a ghost stood in that relation to him.

14. It is preposterous to suppose that, if Jesus was born as represented, pagan worshipers, called magi, or wise men, knowing nothing of the God of the Jews, and caring less, should know anything about the obscure birth of that child or any other, or that it would be of the slightest service if it did. It does not appear that their visit to the stable or the cave had a useful effect of any kind. It has the appearance of a make-weight, thrown in to give effect to the tale.

15. It is wholly absurd to suppose that one of the stars of heaven was delegated to point out the stable where a child was born, or that it could approach so close to the earth as to pass along its surface and stop over the entrance to a stable, so that strangers could know where to enter. Nearly all the stars are much larger than the earth, and if one should come close to the earth, so as to point out a stable door, it would inevitably darken the earth, cover it over for hundreds of miles, and totally obscure the heavens from the part covered. Were it possible for two worlds to come so near together as that, they would inevitably rush together in one body, and no power could prevent it. This gross falsehood was written by a person who knew nothing of the size and distance of the stars, and of the laws which govern such great bodies of matter. If it was not a star, but simply a light, or an ignis fatuus, that stopped over the stable, it was a falsehood to say it was a star.

16. It is wholly improbable that Herod became so alarmed at the birth of a poor man's child that he commanded the slaughter of all the little children in that part of the country. There is no likelihood that Herod ever knew or heard anything of the birth of Jesus, or would have cared anything about it if he had. This monstrous story is only told by the writer of Matthew, who had a penchant for fulfilling prophecies which he fancied had been made, and in this case he missed the mark (as he did in all his attempts to fulfill prophecies) and quoted a passage that by an honest construction had not the slightest allusion to anything of the kind.

17. If Herod caused the death of ten or twenty thousand little children the other evangelists should have heard of it and mentioned it. Josephus should have known it and narrated it, as he did scores of things of not the thousandth part of the importance; and other historians also should have known something of it. The tale at best is but a clumsy pattern after the Indian legend of similar import at the birth of Christna, when the tyrant Nanda of Madura caused the little children to be slaughtered so as to kill the little Christna.

18. It is preposterous to suppose that the chief priests and scribes of Jerusalem could tell Herod anything about where any child was to be born, and the attempt to carry the idea that a prophecy had been made seven hundred years before that conveyed the knowledge where Jesus was to be born is a specimen of barefaced fraud. It was only another attempt on the part of the writer of Matthew to falsely ring in another prophecy. Joseph and Mary were citizens of Nazareth, and their visit to Bethlehem was of a temporary character, and a child born there under such circumstances could not truthfully be called a Bethlehemite.

19. The story of Joseph and Mary going to Egypt with their child was known only to the writer of Matthew, and is in direct contradiction to the statement made by Luke, who says the parents repaired to their home in Nazareth until the legal forty days had elapsed, when they took their child to the temple in Jerusalem without the slightest apparent fear of Herod. Matthew's taking the three into Egypt was doubtless for the purpose of fulfilling another prophecy which had not been made.

20. The story of a dove appearing at the time of the baptism and speaking in an audible voice so as to be heard by those standing round, is very improbable, and is wholly opposed to the experience of mankind, as well as the laws of nature.

21. It seems absurd that Jesus, if a God, should need to do what Dr. Tanner and others have done—go forty days without food—and at the same time be subjected to the evil influences of the devil. If he was God he certainly ought to have more power than the devil, and be able to banish him at once.

22. The statement that the devil could carry Jesus around where he pleased—on the top of the temple and on a high mountain—offering him real estate in enormous lots, is very silly. In the first place, there is no such being as a devil, and to say that he carried any person about, pig-back or any other way, is false. And again, there is no exceeding high mountain in this country, the highest being but about four thousand feet above the sea, and certainly none here or anywhere else from the top of which all the kingdoms of the earth could be seen. The man who wrote that fable did not know that the earth is round and that not a thousandth part of the globe can be seen from any mountain in existence.

23. The report of the Sermon on the Mount cannot be correct. If Matthew wrote it he was not present at the time it was delivered, as he had not then been called, but the account was not written till a hundred years after Matthew was dead, and of course the writer could not have been present when the sermon was delivered. Besides, that sermon as reported contains in one lump the teachings which the writers of the other gospels scatter all through the ministration of Jesus. The others say nothing about any sermon on the mount.

24. It is untruthful that Jesus or any other person could restore a sick person to health by a word and when a long distance away. It is contrary to universal history and nature's laws.

25. It is the same with regard to stopping the wind and quieting the waves of the sea by speaking to them. The thing is impossible. It is easy for a big story-teller to write such a tale, but it cannot be made true.

26. The story about Christ casting a devil or devils out of wild men among the tombs is untrue. What does not exist cannot be cast out of anybody or by anybody. But, conceding the devil, the story is still untrue. Matthew says there were two of the wild men who had the devils, while Mark says there was but one. That a falsehood is between them is perfectly clear. Again, the part about the devils entering two thousand swine—whether by division of the devils for the swine, or the two thousand devils were in the man—is decidedly absurd. It is not too much to say that it is a devilish foolish story.

27. Granting for a moment that devils have an existence, it is extremely unlikely that they would be any better acquainted with the person and mission of Jesus than others. It can hardly be thought reasonable that devils who would be around getting into wild men and into hogs would be the characters to understand the plans and the mysteries of God and that he had a son taking a vacation on the earth.

28. From what I have before said, it must be understood that I regard all statements of anybody raising people from the dead as false. No person ever was ever made to live again after he has died. The feat has been claimed to be performed by many persons.

29. The claims of remarkable cures performed, the lame restored, the blind made to see, lepers healed, are of the same character. Similar claims have been made for great numbers of miracle-workers in all the centuries of the past.

30. The story about five thousand people being fed with five loaves and two fishes is on a par with the tales told by Baron Munchausen and in the Arabian Nights. Such an increase in a small quantity of food is alike opposed to nature and common sense.

31. The story about walking upon the water, without settling into it, is not only incredible, but impossible. Nature's laws are never set aside.

32. But I will not prolong my remarks further at this time, but, leaving thee to repose and sweet sleep, I bid thee good-night.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

FIFTEENTH DAY—TO BETHLEHEM AND SOLOMON'S POOLS.

1. And it came to pass that on the second day of the week, and the fifth day of the twelfth month, the pilgrims mounted their horses for the last day's ride, and set their faces to the south of the holy city, even toward the hills of Judah, and the town of Bethlehem.

2. They passed out the Jaffa gate, down the valley of Gihon, across the same, and up the valley of the Giants, leaving on the left the tree on which tradition says Judas hanged himself, the country house of Caiaphas the high priest, and into the valley of Rephaim.

3 It was here that David is said to have fought the Philistines and defeated them. Rising the rather abrupt hill on the opposite side of the valley, a well is pointed out, which the Christian locators pronounce the Well of the Magi—that is, the well where the wise men, after leaving the presence of Herod, halted and drank; and it was at this very place that the star came down from the upper regions, and led them to the cave in Bethlehem where Jesus had just been born.

4. This was the most remarkable mission that a star was ever sent upon, and the writer of the story and the locators also have failed to let the world know whether it was one of the fixed stars, a planet belonging to this or some other system, or whether it was a roving comet that would just as soon go one way as another. The difficult point to understand is, how so large a body as a star could point out with any definiteness so small a portion of the earth's surface as a village, much less a stable or cave.

5. When the hill is surmounted, a plain containing one or two thousand acres of arable land (a very rare thing in the land of Yahweh) is entered upon, but after this is passed a continued series of rocky country as was ever seen is encountered. Much stone has been placed in walls and huge piles, but still the land is so overwhelmed with rocks that plowing, except in a few places, is out of the question. And as far as the eye can see to the south, to the east, and to the west nothing but mountains of solid rock is to be seen.

6. On the left, five miles or more away, is the round-topped Frank Mountain, which rears its head like a dome some hundreds of feet higher than the surrounding piles of rock, and here it is said Herod built a place of country resort. On the Bethlehem road there are little spots and patches of soil where olive-trees, and fig-trees, and vines can grow, and the geniality of the climate insures a good return. The olive-tree lives and grows on extremely poor soil.

7. A rock is passed by the roadside, with a depression in it six feet long, eighteen inches wide, and from six to eight inches deep. This is called Elijah's rock; and here the Christians assert that the good prophet stopped to repose when fleeing from the wicked Jezebel.

8. The Scribe marveled greatly when his eyes rested upon the rock, and he said, Verily the prophet must have been a man of great weight to sink that far into a solid rock. Indeed, it seemeth strange how a man so heavy could rise up into the thin air where even a feather could not float.

9. Off to the left is a large building belonging to the Greek Christians, which is called the convent of Elijah, which probably was erected, or, at least, named, upon the strength of Elijah's pressing the rock down as he would an ordinary feather bed. The convent is, of course, a very holy place.

10. Another place, quite as holy again, is a little further on—a small modern building of stone, with a dome, like a Moslem tomb. This is the tomb of Rachel, the girl whom Jacob worked seven years for. It will be remembered that with Jacob Sarah journeyed from Bethel toward Bethlehem, in the same delicate situation that the Virgin was when she visited Bethlehem, though Mary had come farther and was able to go still farther than Rachel before the little event transpired, and did better afterward. The good book reads:

11. And there was but a little way to come to Ephrath [Bethlehem], about a mile from Bethlehem, where she was delivered of a son. And it came to pass, as her soul was in departing (for she died), that she called his name Ben-oni (i. e., son of my sorrow); but his father called him Benjamin (that is, the son of my right hand); and Rachel died, and was buried in the way to Ephrath, which is Bethlehem. And Jocob set a pillar upon her grave; that is the pillar of Rachel's grave to this day (Gen. xxxv, 16).

12. And as the old man, long weary years after her death, had begun himself to think of throwing up the sponge, he repeated, with the tenderness to be expected from such a godly man, the story of his loss: And as for me, when I came from Padan, Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan in the way, when yet there was but a little way to come unto Ephrath; and I buried her there in the way of Ephrath; the same is Bethlehem (Gen. xlviii, 7). This place is pointed out in the foregoing language with more accuracy than most holy places are indicated, and it is only a question whether the modern-looking tomb is on just the right spot or not.

13. Just before descending the declivity which leads to the tomb, the view fore and aft is equally good; Jerusalem and Bethlehem can both be seen, and the country would present a picturesque landscape were the mountains covered with trees as in America.

14. West of Rachel's tomb is a village, two or three miles away, on an eastern slope of a hill, called Beit-Jala, the residence of the Latin and Greek patriarchs. It has a population of 3,000, mostly Greeks, and all Christians. It is claimed that this is the ancient Zelyah, where Saul called when he was looking for asses, fell in among the prophets, and went to prophesying himself.

15. At this point there are two roads, the one to the left leading to Bethlehem, which is hard by; the other to Solomon's pools, three miles further on, and nine miles from Jerusalem. The pilgrims took the right-hand road, so as to visit the pools before Bethlehem. They are now in a very holy part of this holy land. Here is where the pious story of Naomi, Ruth, and Boaz was located.

16. This country here is David's own country; here is where he was in the sheep business before he went to the wars. From here, a good-sized stripling, he went forth with a stout heart and his little sling, with which he slew the proud and mighty giant Goliah of the Philistines, only nine and a half feet tall.

17. The pilgrims passed near the cave of Adullam, where tradition says David took refuge when pursued by the Philistines, and when his brethren and his father's house heard it they went down thither to him. And every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented gathered themselves unto him, and he became captain over them: and there were with him about four hundred men (1 Sam. xxii, 1, 2). This was the material of which his band of brigands was composed.

18. It was from the cave of Adullam that David's mighty men—some of the brigands aforesaid—broke through the garrison of the Philistines, and went to Bethlehem to satisfy the desires of their chief, when he cried, Oh, that one would give me of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate; and then, after they had risked their lives in obtaining it, he stubbornly refused to drink it, and poured it upon the ground before them (2 Sam. xxii, 4).

19. The way to the pools is hemmed in by rocks. Near the upper pool is a large stone structure called a castle, evidently of Mohammedan origin, probably never used as a castle, but rather, as now, for a khan. The pools are three in number and are open, square reservoirs with stone walls, in the center of a natural basin, where they can catch the surface water from rains, as well as utilize the water of a small spring in the immediate vicinity. They are claimed to have been constructed by Solomon for supplying Jerusalem with water, though it is denied that Solomon built them, and it is asserted they were constructed by Herod or Pilate.

20. The upper pool is 380 feet long, 236 feet broad, and in the deepest part twenty-five feet. Below is the second pool, 423 feet long, 250 feet broad at the east end and 160 feet at the west end, and in the deepest part thirty-nine feet; 248 feet below is the third pool, 582 feet long, from 148 to 207 feet wide, and fifty feet deep. They are well preserved, and do not seem to date so far back as Solomon's time.

21. The pilgrims on their return followed along by the small square aqueduct which conveys the water to Bethlehem and on to the mosque of Omar in Jerusalem for religious ablutions. The country continues very rugged, though the ride is pleasant, winding around the rocky hills, midway up, with a very narrow but pretty valley in the contracted ravine below, green with garden vegetables, stretching along like a snake and looking like an oasis in the desert of sterile rocks on each side. The name of Solomon's Gardens has been given to the narrow belt, perhaps three rods in width.

22. Bethlehem, as approached from the south, is seen located high up on the rocky hill which is its home, with the ground descending to the east. It is one of the best built towns in the Land of Yahweh, being substantial stone houses one or two stories high, with a few schools and public buildings of large proportions. In point of appearance it compares very favorably with Nazareth.

23. Entering the town and passing a considerable distance through narrow and dirty streets, by some stores and mechanics' shops, the pilgrims reached the Roman Catholic convent or monastery, where they partook of lunch, and then walked out to see the town and buy some of the manufactured articles of olive wood and mother of pearl shells, which are the principal industry of the place. There are several stores where these trinkets in pretty large quantities are kept for sale. Like every town in this part of the world, it is overrun with beggars, who are persistently asking for backsheesh and importuning strangers to buy the beads and other trinkets which they carry about in their hands. The pilgrims all bought some crosses, rosaries, bracelets, and other Christian toys to remember the town by.

24. The town consists of about five hundred houses, with a population of three thousand, nearly all Christian, it being the most Christian town in the Land of Yahweh. The inhabitants are Greeks and Syrians, and the women are said to be noted for their beauty, but the Scribe failed to see the proofs upon which the claim is based; they look much like the women he has seen in other parts of the land.

25. The church of the Nativity, however, is the great point of attraction to all who make a pilgrimage to the city of David. It is a huge, fortress-like pile of buildings at the eastern extremity of the village, including the contiguous convents, which belong respectively to the Latin, Greek, and Armenian churches.

26. The church, the nave of which is the common property of all Christians, wears a very desolate and neglected aspect, and perhaps it has a good right to do so, for it is said to be the oldest Christian church in the world. It is the sole remaining portion of the grand basilica erected here by Empress Helena in 327. In this edifice, once brilliant with gold and colored marble, Baldwin the Crusader was crowned.

27. This old structure presents quite as much elegance as would be looked for under the circumstances. It contains five rows of marble columns of the Corinthian order, which are claimed to have been brought from the ruins of Herod's temple in Jerusalem. The mosaics on the walls, though generally dim and faded, here and there maintain considerable brilliance. The roof is formed of beams from the former forests of Lebanon.

28. The place above all others which Christians are interested in is the chapel or grotto of the Nativity, which is under the center of the church. It is a cave in the rock, and has the appearance of having been dug out or at least finished up by the hands of men. It is twenty feet below the floor of the church and is approached by two spiral staircases. The cave is thirty-three feet by eleven, and is incased with Italian marble and decorated with a great number of rich-looking metallic lamps, figures of saints, embroidery, and various holy gew-gaws and ornaments. On one side of the grotto is a recess, where a silver star on the pavement indicates the very spot where the Christian God was born.

29. Around the star is this inscription in Latin, Hic de Virgine Maria Jesus Christus Natus est. Above this spot sixteen silver lamps are perpetually burning (six belong to the Greeks, five to the Latins, and five to the Armenians). Close by is a plain altar which each of the sects use on their special feasts and decorate with all the flummery that accords with their taste. Another recess is called the Chapel of the Manger, claimed to be the precise place where the manger stood in which the new-born god was laid, the same manger that is now kindly shown to the faithful believers in the church of St. Maria Maggiore at Rome.

30. It was here that the tender feelings of the Scribe were rudely touched by the man of God Getz, who, when going down toward the bowels of the earth to see where his God was born, spoke these words of unbelief: Why, this is all wrong. Jesus was not born down here in this cavern away under the earth; he was born in a stable. I do not believe a word of it. It is not true. There is no authority for any such claim. And other words of that kind did the man of God utter. Then it was that the Scribe felt called upon to rebuke the man of God in this wise for his unbelief: Ah, Brother Getz, you must accept the story just as it is given to you. This cavern part is just as true as any portion of it. It may be cavern or stable, just as you prefer. It will not answer for you to revolt against any part of that wonderful story. You must let the tail go with the hide.

31. The Scribe further assured the man of God that there was good authority for claiming a cavern for the place, for the story any way was only a repetition of Eastern fables of a similar character, and it was certainly held with regard to the earlier oriental demi-gods that they were born in caves. There is no use in going back on the original by repudiating the cave part. These words were spoken in sorrow, not in anger.

32. It did, however, strike the Scribe as a slightly suspicious feature in this son of Yahweh business, that so much of it was conducted in subterranean places, even in the bowels of the earth, away from the light of the sun and the eyes of men. It was in a cavern that the angel Gabriel held the interview with the Virgin. It was in the cavern that Yahweh met the damsel. It was in a cavern that the child was brought into the world. It was in a cavern that the wise men from the East called to pay their respects and adoration to the new-born God. Truly, performing all this business in such a secret manner, and in the dark, looks very suspicious.

33. Another altar in this holy cavern is that of the magi, or wise men, which marks the identical spot where the men from the East sat when they presented their gifts. It is supposed that the place was accurately fixed upon by the aid of St. Helena herself, who had the necessary excavations made. There can thus be no doubt about the correctness of the spot. This chapel belongs to the Roman Catholics.

34. Another is the chapel of St. Joseph, the convenient spot to which the good man retired while the god was being born. It was modest and proper in the old man to do this. He had not been there, and he had no right, under such circumstances, to witness the birth of a god. It was also at this very place where a few days later the angel appeared to him and told him to make a journey into Egypt without delay. It was doubtless a dispensation of providence that these momentous events should all occur within a few feet of each other. Thanks to St. Helena for all this. It is so convenient to have these holy places contiguous, and under the same roof.

35. A few feet further on is the Altar of the Innocents, erected over the place where the cruel Herod caused twenty thousand young babes to be slaughtered; but the world should rejoice that Joseph and Mary, and the little God, by the kind offices of the angel, were able to be on their way to Egypt when this bloody tragedy was enacted. Matthew knew how to fix up this business. The Scribe felt very sorry for the little slaughtered babes and their mothers who were thus uselessly massacred on the account of one little new-comer.

36. In another recess, which looks like an addi tion to the cavern, is the Milk Grotto. Here is where the Virgin, in great trepidation of mind, stopped for a short time previous to the family setting out on their excursion to Egypt. Here she nursed her new-born babe, even while the wicked Herod was making preparations to murder the young king. Her breasts were full of holy milk, and it so happened that the little Jesus did not get it all. A few drops fell upon the floor, when, strange to relate, the rocks all turned white from the wonderful effects of the milk. There is no room for reasonable doubts upon the subject, for the Scribe saw the rock, and the cart-load of it which has been recently dug up to sell to faithful but barren women, and he is prepared to testify in any court (save Benedict's) that the adjacent rock and earth are of a whitish, milky color, the same as is the entire hill of Bethlehem. Who can doubt that it was the milk that did it?

37. The Scribe is moreover suspicious that the Virgin must have spilled some milk before she left Nazareth, for the rocks about that holy town are of the same color. The same is also true of the rocks of the Mount of Olives, Jerusalem itself, and a considerable share of the Land of Yahweh. It was the Virgin's milk that did it. Can any one think strange that a young god brought up on such milk as that should be able to > Change water into wine, drive devils into swine,

> Raise the dead, the devil, and hell generally?

Indeed, can it be thought strange that the pieces of the rocky earth dug up in the Milk Grotto should sell readily to the Christian women who wish to have children, or who are short in the secretion of milk? The sale of this miraculous earth is said to bring in a very handsome revenue to the monks who keep the place.

38. On the opposite side of the cavern is a small apartment which is called the tomb of Eusebius, though which Eusebius it was, the guide was unable to state. If it was the one who wrote the first ecclesiastical history, who was the one to first find in the writings of Josephus the recognition of the divinity of Jesus, and who showed not a little skilfulness in finding proofs for anything he wished to establish, this was a very fitting place to entomb him, though there is no proof that he was buried here.

39. In another apartment in the rock was located the study, the dwelling-place, and the tomb of St. Jerome, a Christian anchorite, who, in the fourth century, is said to have passed thirty years of his life here in this rough subterranean chamber, fasting, praying, writing, studying up godliness, etc., etc. Here, as is claimed, he translated the Vulgate, from which the Catholic Bible was taken, besides performing sundry other saintly works. The room is ornamented by a life-size painting of the saint, in which an old man, naked, and with the appearance of a lunatic, is sitting with pen in hand, his eyes turning up toward heaven, much as those of a dying calf turn upward, and his face is the picture of such benignity as any saint might be glad to wear. Indeed, nearly all the chapels and altars have paintings to illustrate the claims made respecting the locality.

40. But is not this enough? Why should the Scribe continue to describe the remarkable things in this hole in the ground? Are there not grounds for all to be satisfied? But one more fact may be mentioned. Right down there in the sacred grotto, and close by the place where the world's redeemer was born—no, not the whole world's, but five per cent of it—much to the grief of the Scribe, he saw an armed Turkish soldier stood to keep the peace between the different sects of Christians who worship here, and who jointly plant their faith in the claim that their God was born there. He had noticed another Mohammedan soldier or two in the church above. His spirit was grieved thereat. Turning to the pious Miss Brayman, he said:

41. It is a sad commentary on the Christian religion that right here, in the very spot where Christianity had its birth, soldiers of a rival and hostile religion have to be stationed to prevent Christians from fighting and killing one another. For of a truth this is the case. Formerly the Latins and the Greeks often fought as to which sect should have priority of the use of the chapels on the occasion of their religious festivals and celebrations. They came to blows on many occasions. And right there by the Chapel of the Nativity the Crimean war commenced which cost the lives of tens of thousands of men. The Latin and Greek Christians, as usual, got into a fight; the Turkish authorities took the part of one, and the French the other, and the fight enlarged and grew until the Crimean war was the result.

42. Mrs. Brayman made the reply that they had not enough of the spirit of Christ, else they would not fight. Said the Scribe: That is a matter of doubt. It is possible they had too much of Christ's spirit; for he said he came not to bring peace, but a sword, and that he came to set one part of the household against the other. As a proof of this Christians have been quarreling, fighting, and putting each other to death nearly ever since. The number of Christians whose blood has saturated the earth by the hands of other Christians would amount to millions; and still they are quarreling, and Mohammedans have to be stationed here in this holy place to prevent their killing each other. They are compelled to hold the most holy festivals and ceremonies on different days to prevent bloodshed between them, and it is the same in the church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem. There, also, Mohammedan soldiers are constantly stationed to maintain the peace between the Christians. Miss Brayman and the Scribe were both sad and thoughtful

43. After leaving these precincts, the pilgrims went without the walls, and were shown in the plain below where the shepherds were watching their flocks on the night that Jesus was born in the cavern, and to whom the angels announced the momentous event. The Scribe could not prove that the shepherds were not there on the night of the 25th of December, and that the angels appeared to them and talked as reported by those who knew nothing about it, but he did not believe it.

44. The return to Jerusalem was attended with nothing worthy of note, and the hotel was reached in good season. This closed the horseback riding for the Scribe and some of the other pilgrims. While some have decided to ride horses to Jaffa, on the Mediterranean, others, including the Scribe, prefer to take the spring wagon, though the road is pretty rough. The pilgrims have ridden on horses some three hundred and fifty miles while journeying through Syria and the Land of Yahwh; and while more than half have been thrown or have fallen from their horses, the Scribe is able to report that neither accident has befallen himself; he has come off in no case only when he wished to, and he bade good-bye to Al Borak, who had carried him so faithfully, without any special sorrow of heart.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

MELCHISEDEC'S FIFTEENTH VISIT.

1. And on the night succeeding the ride to Bethlehem the Visitor of olden time came with the same promptness and the same reality as he had on the fourteen previous occasions. His salutations were of his usual genial character, and a degree of peace and serenity seemed to clothe him round about that even an angel might envy. These were his words:

2. Well, young friend from the young world, thou hast had another day's experience, and hast enjoyed further opportunities for visiting the holy places of which Christians have told so many untruths, and which form such an important part in the fables, follies, and fabrications which make up their stock in trade. I have no fear that they have induced thee in the slightest degree to change the opinion thou hast formed as to the unreliability of the claims upon which the system is built up. It is those, as a rule, who do little thinking and who investigate in a very superficial manner, who accept the shallow claims which Christianity presents, and I am therefore confident that it will require more solid reasons than the flimsy falsehoods thou hast heard this day to move thy settled convictions.

3. I will now resume the examination of the improbabilities and falsehoods which make up the warp and woof of the New Testament. The story of what is called the transfiguration is worth very little when told by a person who was not present, and is passed over in silence by those who are said to have been eye-witnesses.

4. Those who tell the transfiguration story so flippantly should at least give some sensible, accurate, and scientific account as to what transfiguration is. If it is a chemical or atomic change in the component parts of the body, a rational explanation should have been made as to how the process is produced. If the operation is a real one, it certainly can be described to the ordinary comprehension. If it is only ideal and fictitious, the more it is ignored and disregarded the better. In my opinion, the story about the transfiguration is a falsehood.

5. The tale about Peter's catching a fish with money in its mouth with which to pay taxes is one of the fishy stories of the Bible which are unworthy serious attention.

6. But little confidence can be had in the ability of Jesus to foretell events. Among his predictions he said he should come the second time in the heavens, and with great glory, while some of those who were present were still living, and that among the signs that should accompany the same the sun should be darkened, the moon cease to give light, and the stars fall from heaven. The prediction proved untruthful. He did not come, and none of the other promised events occurred, and probably never will.

7. What earthly chance had either of the evangelists to know what conversation took place between Judas and the priests about the betrayal, when Judas hung himself before they had heard him say a word about the interview. No more could they know about what Jesus said in his prayer in Gethsemane when no one was with him.

8. The same criticism will apply to the statement as to what Pilate's wife dreamed, and what conversation took place between her and her husband. And so with regard to scores of other cases. Not one of them pretended to write by inspiration, and if they did the claim would not be worth a cent.

9. The statement that Jesus foretold to his disciples his arrest, trial, execution, and resurrection is not a fact. This is proved by the story itself. When he was arrested they were taken by surprise, and all forsook him. This they would not have done had they been apprised of the fact and assured that he would rise from the dead in three days. Had they known what was to come they would have remained steadfast to him through his trial. So far from their expecting his resurrection, not one of them was looking for it, nor would they believe it when told that it had occurred.

10. The inability of the four gospel writers to give statements alike is evinced in their accounts about the crucifixion. Matthew, Mark, and John say the execution took place at Golgotha; Luke says it was Calvary. Matthew says the inscription placed on the cross was, This is Jesus, king of the Jews; Mark, The king of the Jews; Luke, This is the king of the Jews; John, Jesus of Nazareth, the king of the Jews. Not one has it like either of the others. Matthew says they gave Jesus to drink vinegar mingled with gall; Mark says it was wine mingled with myrrh; Luke says it was vinegar only; John says it was vinegar and hyssop. No two have it alike. There is nothing like accuracy and harmony among inspired writers.

11. The story about the sun being darkened for three hours at the time of the crucifixion is entitled to no credit. Nothing shuts off the sun from the earth save the earth turning on its axis away from the sun, and the moon passing between the earth and the sun, making an eclipse. Once or twice in a century the eclipse of the sun is total, but it is dark but a few moments only. Clouds are sometimes pretty dense, so as to lessen the light somewhat, but never so as to cause darkness for three hours. The sun is not in the slightest degree affected by the death of any person on the earth, whether Jesus or John Smith. Its light has been brilliant and constant for hundreds of thousands of years. Besides, the claim for this darkness at the death of Jesus is not corroborated by Josephus, or any other historian. The story is of the same character as that of Joshua stopping the sun and moon.

12. Of a similar character is the statement regarding the various natural and unnatural phenomena which accompanied the crucifixion.

13. There is a sad discrepancy as to the time Jesus remained in his grave or sepulcher. It is usually said that the time for him to remain in the tomb, or, otherwise, in hell, was three days; that is the time which he is made to say he would remain in his grave, when he would rise again, and three days is the term inserted in all the confessions of faith, or church creeds, that he remained when he descended into hell. But, according to the narrative, he was only half that time, or one day and two nights, in his sepulcher—from Friday night till early Sunday morning—which, by no amount of twisting, can be made into three days.

14. The story of the resurrection need hardly be dilated upon. The claim that any person has risen from the dead is unworthy of notice.

15. Mark agrees with Matthew that the miraculous feeding of the five thousand was in a desert place, but that they were told to sit on the grass; and John says there was much grass in the place. Now grass does not grow in the desert, and it would require a large stretch of credulity to believe that the grass was produced miraculously the same as the food.

16. It is a trifle singular that the writer of the book of Mark had nothing to say of Peter's attempt to walk upon the water, at the time his master performed the feat so successfully, especially as it is claimed that Mark was the particular friend of Peter, and wrote by his direction. Is it to be understood that Peter was ashamed to have his unsuccessful effort recorded?

17. There is a discrepancy between Matthew and Mark as to who asked Jesus for a seat in his kingdom for James and John, one on his right and the other on his left. Mark says they made the request, while Matthew says it was their mother. Which told the truth?

18. The story which Luke tells about the aged and barren Elizabeth bearing John the Baptist is very much like old Sarah conceiving Isaac when she was nearly a hundred. Such statements can be credited only by people who have an excess of faith. It is very curious, too, how Luke could have been apprised of the matter. He never once claims that any information was given him by inspiration, and at the outset of his narrative he only claims to write from general rumor, or report. Rumor is very unreliable authority about aged women bearing children.

19. It is very improbable that the principal angel in the Christian and Mohammedan heavens should come down to talk with the old man Zacharias about the baby his wife Elizabeth was to bear. Angels are probably doing at the present time about the same as two thousand years ago. They are not now meddling in that kind of business.

20. It is unlikely also that the angel would strike the old man dumb because he could not believe an impossibility. If he did not believe, it was because he could not from the evidence before him.

21. The impossibility of an angel appearing to a young girl and making an appointment for a God to hold an interview with her for the purpose of producing an offspring is most marked, and perhaps enough has been said upon the subject; but, as the miraculous part of the Christian religion rests upon that little fable, it may well be included among the impossibilities and falsehoods of the book.

22. The story that little John the Baptist leaped in the womb of Elizabeth when she was six months pregnant, because the Virgin Mary, who had the little Jesus in her womb, visited Elizabeth, is one of extreme ridiculousness, and on a par with all the absurd claims set up in this holy city. It would not be of the slightest consequence if true. Luke had not the chance of knowing anything about it. He was not present, and it is not at all likely that the ladies informed him of the incident.

23. It is a foolish and untruthful claim that after Zacharias had been speechless nine months for being a little slow about believing an absurdity, he had his speech restored to him by the birth of a little heir, and the same being christened John. The use of speech does not go and come that way.

24. There is a discrepancy between Luke and Matthew, and between them and others, as to where Jesus was born. Matthew says it was in a house, while Luke implies it was in a stable, for the little child was wrapped in swaddling-clothes and laid in a manger as soon as born; but, as thou sawest to-day at Bethlehem, the claim is that it was neither in a house, or a stable, but in a cavern twenty or thirty feet below the surface of the earth.

25. The story about the angels appearing to the shepherds in the fields on the night of the birth of Jesus is highly improbable, for only Luke tells it. The other three evangelists had never heard of it, or they did not have confidence enough in its truth to repeat it. The claims about the appearance of angels, of their talking, and all that, should be taken only on the strongest proofs.

26. It is singular that it was only Luke who knew about the angels and shepherds, their repairing to the cavern and finding Joseph, Mary, and the child all in the manger, and that it was only Matthew who knew about the wise men being led there by a star, and their report causing twenty thousand little children to be murdered.

27. If Matthew told the truth about Joseph, Mary, and the child being hurried off to Egypt after the birth of the latter instead of returning to their home in Nazareth, Luke is guilty of a falsehood, for he positively states that they returned to Nazareth; that Jesus was circumcised when eight days old, and at the end of forty days he was taken to Jerusalem to present him to the Lord, perhaps because the Lord was not up at Nazareth. So there must have been two Jesuses, one flying off to Egypt and the other to Nazareth, or else Matthew or Luke told a falsehood.

28. Since Luke was so expert in finding out such private matters as when women conceived and when their unborn children leaped in the womb, it is very singular that he was so obtuse as to know nothing about Herod's causing twenty thousand children to be slaughtered, or the flight of the holy family into Egypt.

29. Luke is the only one who has anything about Pontius Pilate turning Jesus over to Herod tetrarch of Galilee, and the story is an improbable one. Jesus was being tried in Jerusalem, and Herod's dominion did not extend there.

30. Luke was the only one to say that one of the thieves became penitent on the cross, accepted Jesus, and received a promise of paradise. Matthew and Mark say both thieves reviled Jesus. John simply says two others were crucified with Jesus, and not that either was a thief, that either reviled him, or that either repented.

31. Luke disagrees with Matthew as to the last words Jesus uttered before dying, when he makes him say, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit; while Matthew says his last words to be, My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me? John disagrees with both, for he has made him to say, It is finished.

32. Luke disagrees with the others as to who visited the sepulcher on the morning of the resurrection. He mentions Peter and Joanna, whom the others do not mention. He also has Jesus walk to Emmaus, holding a long conversation with Cleophas, which the others knew nothing about.

33. Luke is the only one who states that Jesus ate fish and honey after his resurrection. If he was only a ghost after his crucifixion and death, as many insist, the eating of such material articles as fish and honey was quite a miracle, but the others should have narrated it also. But there is as great a discrepancy as to the story of Jesus after his resurrection as any other portion of it. Some of the writers imply that he ascended to heaven on the same day of his resurrection, some make it a few days between the two events, while the writer of Acts says it was forty days.

34. But I will return again, and will continue my visits to thee nightly so long as thou continuest in the Land of Yahweh. I leave the spirit of peace with thee. Good night. And it came to pass when the morning arrived that the Scribe could not feel sure that the Venerable Visitor had been with him at all, so unreal are these heavenly visits.

CHAPTER XXXV.

SIXTEENTH DAY—VISIT TO THE MOSQUE OF OMAR.

1. And it came to pass on the morning of the sixth day of the month the air was cold, and the east wind made one feel as though he had left off a garment in making his toilet. Water froze this morning, and it was the coldest by several degrees that the pilgrims had seen in the Land of Yahweh.

2. This day was devoted to visiting the mosque of Omar and learning the miracles which have been performed there for the special benefit of the Moslems, for it must be known that that they claim just about as many miracles as the Christians.

3. Christian pilgrims turn up their noses at the miracles which Mohammedans accept, and say, What absurdity! what superstition! And the Scribe says, Yes, their absurdity and superstition are very gross, but no more so than in the miracles connected with your system. It is easy for you to see the falseness of their claims, and it is just as easy for them to see the falseness of yours. As for myself, I have no trouble in seeing the falseness of both.

4. The mosque of Omar stands on the site of the temple of Herod, and what is also claimed to be the site of the temple of Nehemiah or Zerubbabel and the temple of Solomon. The Arabic name of the place is Kubbet es-Sukhrah, meaning the dome of the rock, for the edifice has a magnificent dome and is immediately over a large rock, about which remarkable stories are told.

5. This rock is the summit of Mt. Moriah, where, as before stated, Abraham is said to have made preparations to offer up his son Isaac. Here Ornan had his threshing floor, and the Lord put seventy thousand innocent people to death for numbering the people, which he or Satan had moved David to do.

6. This was the place, so tradition says, which David afterward selected as the spot where he would build a temple to Yahweh, but he had been so bad a man that Yahweh would not let him do it. Solomon being a good man, keeping only a thousand women, and building a few temples to the pagan gods, was the person to perform the great work.

7. It is claimed by some that this big rock, upon which Abraham came near doing what his late disciple Freeman was permitted to accomplish, stood a little in front of the temple which Solomon erected, the one upon which on the day of the dedication of the temple the priests slaughtered 120,000 sheep and 22,000 oxen; and on the day the ark was put into the temple so many were slaughtered that they could not be numbered. Yahweh never was so well pleased before nor since, until his own son shared a similar fate near the same spot.

8. There have been, however, bitter disputes, and which are not yet amicably settled, about the site of the temple. Nearly every inch of the ground and nearly every stone on the premises has been the subject of controversy; and the claims are important and diverse, but they probably can never be fully settled, and the world must remain in some doubt as to whether Solomon's temple ever stood here or not

9. The mosque of Omar stands nearly in the center of a rather roughly paved court, called the Haram, containing two or three acres, and is undoubtedly the richest mosque in Moslemdom, and the most sacred save the principal one at Mecca. It has been but a few years since Christians have been allowed admission into it, and it is now only by application being made to the consul of the nationality of the applicant and paying the regular fee that entrance can be had.

10. Tradition, that very loquacious old dame, says that when the Caliph Omar took Jerusalem his first inquiry was for the site of the Jewish temple. He was conducted to this spot, then a huge mound of filth and rubbish, and here he built the mosque which bears his name. Others claim that the present mosque was built by Abd-el-Melek in 686.

11. The court or square in which the mosque stands is surrounded by a wall 1,600 feet long on the west, 1,530 feet on the east, 1,024 on the north, and 922 on the south, and is entered by eight gates on the west. Its principal, the one by which the pilgrims entered, is the Bab-es-Silsileh, or the Gate of the Chain.

12. Entering by this gate, there was presented to the pilgrim's view the Mosque-el-Aksa on the right hand, or south side of the Haram, and before them the steps leading to the mosque of Omar. The building is an octagon, each of the eight sides being sixty-eight feet long, and the whole covered with richly-colored porcelain tiles, and a frieze of tiles running around the entire building, upon which are written in Arabic letters passages from the Koran. The mosque has four gates or portals corresponding with the four points of the compass.

13. Faithful Moslems met the pilgrims at the gate of the Haram and conducted them up the broad steps around to the east portal of the mosque, before which is a model of the mosque, perhaps thirty feet in diameter, which is said to have been erected first and used as a pattern for the building of the larger mosque. Here, as the pilgrims were about to step upon holy ground, they were required to take off their boots and shoes and put on slippers or go barefooted. This is required upon entering all mosques, and in this one in particular they are more objectionable than a church.

14. Upon entering the mosque a sense of richness and grandeur seizes upon the beholder. The light is dim, being of the grade considered holy, and one cannot see as well at first as after a few minutes. In the center is the great stone sixty feet long and forty-five wide—the one which Abraham consecrated by the attempt to sacrifice his son upon it. It is a bare, rugged, uneven, and unhewn rock, somewhat crowning in the center, and some five feet in thickness.

15. When Mohammed went up to the seventh heaven on his horse Al Borak, he came first from Mecca to this very rock, and he started from it on that remarkable journey. Strange to say, he was so powerful a magnet, or the rock was so anxious to go to heaven with him that it started and followed some four or five feet, when luckily the angel Gabriel happened to discover it just at the very nick of time, caught hold of it, and held it, otherwise it would have gone up as sure as fate, and might even have upset Yahweh's or Allah's throne.

16. There can be no doubt about this thing, for the deep finger-prints are now on the rock where Gabe caught hold of it, and the Scribe saw them with his own eyes; and he believes the story just as much as he does those told about all of those holy places under the church of the Holy Sepulcher. He places Mohammedan miracles and Christian miracles, Mohammedan lies and Christian lies, upon the same footing; and it is nip and tuck between them.

17. Ever since that rock started on that trip to heaven, more than twelve hundred years ago, it has been suspended in the air by a perpetual miracle. You incredulous people must not laugh at this, for the Scribe went down eight or ten steps and walked right under the rock, and could stand up straight with it over his head, and the room is fifteen or twenty feet in diameter. True, the room is not nearly as large as the rock itself, and the wall, or what looks to be the wall, under the holy rock might be supposed to hold up the rock, but upon rapping on it it seems a light lath-plastered screen, merely to give pilgrims a sense of safety when they descend there to pray and to worship.

18. True, people who have no faith and are not heavenly-minded enough to perceive spiritual things, say the screen only hides the solid rock which sustains the one which Gabriel held back, but it is strange that some people have so little faith as not to believe human testimony about these holy miracles. The Scribe is proud to say he can believe this claim just as easily as he does the Joshua and sun story, the Jonah and the fish story, and Matthew's story about the rocks and the graves opening when the dead walked forth. He rejoices that he is able to believe something. The faithful Moslems believe that the rock is now suspended in the air, without the slightest difficulty.

19. There are several altars and praying places under this holy rock where the faithful Moslems descend to say their holiest prayers, and those they design to have the most potent effect upon Allah. On the east side of the subterranean room a place was pointed where Mohammed once prayed, and when he rose up he bumped his head against the holy rock overhead, and made an indentation in the solid rock six or eight inches deep, two feet long, and fifteen inches wide. Who can doubt these things when he sees them right before his eyes?

20. The Scribe saw the hole that Mohammed's head made in that rock just as plain as he saw the one which Elijah's body made in the one by the road-side out toward Bethlehem; but candor compels him to admit that upon close inspection of the place where Mohammed's head bumped he saw coarse chisel marks, where it looked as though it had been dug out by some Moslem stone-cutter; and that, again, may have been the means by which Allah accomplished his mysterious purposes. In fact, there are several proofs that stone-cutters have worked in that cavern.

21. Through the center of this holy rock is a hole, perhaps eighteen inches or more in diameter, and a corresponding one in the rock below which is the floor of the cavern. It is claimed that the blood of the animals sacrificed by the Jews ran through this aperture, and found its way into the brook Kidron; but others deny it in toto, and claim that this was the tomb where Jesus was laid after he was crucified, and just at the time he started on his three-day's tour to hell and made the time in thirty-six hours. According to that theory, this big rock must have been the one the angel rolled away, or lifted, and possibly it was Gabriel that did it. This hole is claimed by the Moslems to be the place where all spirits descend after death, from whence, at the day of judgment, they will be hauled up by the tuft on the top of their head. It is not yet too late for those who wish to suggest other theories. The books are still open.

22. On the top of this holy rock are what are called the footprints of Mohammed, which he made, perhaps, at the time he mounted Al Borak to go up to the upper heaven. Is it not wonderful what remarkable weighty personages Elijah and Mohammed were that they should sink right into solid rocks, and still be so light as to go faster than a sky-rocket and much farther—away up to the seventh heaven?

23. To return to the mosque. Around the rotunda are two rows of columns of marble, porphyry, and other fine stone, some claimed to have once been in Herod's temple; the inner row is near the rock, and the outer row at a distance of some twenty feet or more. This space between the two colonnades is the principal part of the mosque. The columns are not all of a hight, but some are brought to the hight of the others by greater thickness of pedestal and capital, the latter of which are gilt, giving them a very rich appearance. The inner circle of twelve Corinthian columns supports the great dome.

24. The mosque has two cloisters, separated by the octagonal course of piers or columns named. There are fifty-six stained glass windows of great brilliancy and beauty, but they do not make it very light within, but give that kind of holy dimness which the saints best enjoy. After one has been in a few minutes, however, his eyes become used to the gloom, and he can see better.

25. The walls are covered with brilliant colored tiles, on which are inscribed passages from the Koran in Arabic characters, the same as on the outer walls. The wooden dome is ninety-eight feet high, and sixty-six in diameter. The pavement is of marble mosaic. There are also fine mosaics in the windows.

26. Among the relics and special holies of the mosque are pointed out the shield of Mohammed's uncle, Mohammed's banner, hairs from his beard, the print of his feet, etc. In a secure place is a slab with three nails and a part of another in it. Originally there were nineteen, but the devil knocked them into the stone. When the three and the piece disappear the world will surely come to an end. Several old copies of the Koran are kept in the mosque.

27. On the iron railing which circles the great rock in the center are tied a great many pieces of rags, placed there by faithful Moslems as a reminder to Mohammed not to forget them. It is thought to be nearly as good a way as to tie thread around the fingers to prevent one from forgetting. It is Mohammed who is to pull the souls out of the pit below by the hair of the head at the great day. Fortunate will those be who have a tuft of hair left upon the crown, but the baldheaded will stand a very poor chance.

28. The Mosque-el-Aksa, standing near the mosque of Omar, was the next place visited. There is doubt as to the origin of this building, or group of buildings, but it is held to be identical (in site if no more) with the magnificent basilica founded by the Emperor Justinian in honor of the Virgin. It is held by some that this structure is entirely Arabian, but its form of a basilica, its cruciform plan, and the existence of certain ancient remains, prove that it was a Christian church, and has been converted into a mosque. Others deny that it was ever a Christian church, or that Justinian had anything to do with it, affirming that it was built by Abd-el-Mekel, in the end of the seventh century. The porch has seven arcades leading into the seven aisles of the basilica.

29. The old mosque is a large building with many columns, some of them marble and of the Corinthian order, while others are imitation and covered with plaster. There are paintings on the different arches and walls, some quite ancient, and some modern and of an indifferent quality. The columns and piers are connected by a rude architrave, which consists of beams of roughly-squared timber, inclosed in a casing of one-inch stuff, on which the decoration is made. The beams are much decayed, and show signs of great age. All the arches are painted.

30. The windows are rich and showy, but not equal to those in the mosque of Omar. Much of the interior is whitewashed. The interior of the dome and the portion immediately under it are richly decorated mosaic work and marble casing. The arabesques and mosaics differ in style from those in the other mosque.

31. Among the sacred places the following are pointed out: The tombs of the sons of Aaron, marked by a stone slab in the pavement near the entrance. (Far more likely it marks the place where some Knight Templar was buried.) The pulpit at the southern end is exquisitely carved in wood, and is said to be the cedar of Lebanon. It was done in Damascus, and brought to Jerusalem by Saladin.

32. Near the pulpit, and west of it, is what is called the praying-place of Moses; but as nobody claims that Moses was ever in Jerusalem, or the land of Yahweh, it cannot well be understood why Moses should have a praying-place in this mosque. Immediately back of the pulpit is a stone having an imprint, said to have been made by the feet of Christ. Who found it out is not stated.

33. In this mosque are two pillars standing pretty close together, through which space thousands of persons have passed; those who can get through are certain to go to heaven, while those who have too much corporosity to squeeze through stand a very poor chance. It may be gratifying to some to know that the Scribe was able to get through. There are also two other places still narrower that the slim ones used to pass through to secure the heavenly seat, but, as many could not easily make the passage, it was closed to prevent further effort in that direction.

34. There is also on one side a black stone, which has been another test as to the probability of reaching paradise. The candidates have to stand some fifteen feet from the stone, with their back toward it and their eyes bandaged; then they turn around quickly, and, marching to the stone, give it a kiss. If they hit it they are all right, if they miss their case is very doubtful. The Scribe was not curious enough as to his future as to try the test.

35. There is also a Well of the Leaf, the water of which is said to be very clear. The Moslems have a curious legend in connection with it. It is claimed that Mohammed delivered a prophecy that one of his followers should, while alive, enter paradise; during the caliphate of Omar a worshiper, one Sheik ibn-Hayian, came to this well to draw water, when his bucket slipped from his hand and fell into the water. He did not wish to lose it and followed after, and to his infinite surprise came to a door, which he opened, and found it led to a beautiful garden. He wandered about in it for some time and picked a leaf of the beautiful growth which he saw there, and retained it upon his return. This leaf never faded nor withered, and thus the words of the prophet were fulfilled; but the door has never since been found, and no one else has been able to reach paradise in the same way; but devout Moslems still look upon the door of the well as the most direct road to paradise.

36. The small temple at the entrance of the mosque of Omar, already spoken of, and from which the large mosque is said to have been modeled, is really a beautiful structure, and is called the Kubbet-es-Silsileh, or Dome of the Chain. It is also called the Tribunal of David. The tradition attached to it is that the chain was suspended from heaven to it, and when any two persons get into a dispute which they could not settle they went there to have the matter adjusted by the chain, as it was sure to move toward the one who was in the right.

37. Another tradition is that all witnesses to great trials were brought here to be tested as to the truth of their evidence. If it was true, they could grasp the chain; if false, they were not able to grasp it; if a link broke off he was a perjurer and was not permitted to testify. The dome of the Ascension marks the spot where Mohammed ascended on his remarkable journey to heaven.

38. At the southeast corner of the Haram a descent of thirty-two steps brings one to the place called the cradle of Christ, a small chamber, which is said to be the place where Jesus when a babe remained when brought by his parents from Nazareth to be circumcised; but as Matthew says that at that very time he was in Egypt, one is at a loss on which hook to hang his belief. Here his mother and her husband were retained for several days, and this was the home of Simeon.

39. From this room a further descent is made to the vaulted cellars and the wilderness of piers and columns which were erected to level up the grounds to the proper hight for the court of the temple. It is claimed by those who make so many extravagant claims that this work was done by Solomon, and that he used those subterranean passages as stables for his numerous chariot horses; but it is far more probable that they do not date any further back than the time of Herod. A good deal more is claimed for Solomon and his time than there is any proof to sustain.

40. On the east wall of the Haram the pilgrims climbed the steps which lead to the top of the wall, where a splendid view is obtained of the Mount of Olives, the Garden of Gethsemane, the valley of Jehosophat, the cemeteries, and all the surrounding noted places. Here is a piece of broken pillar protruding from the wall, respecting which the Moslems have the tradition that when Mohammed comes to judge the world he will sit on this, and when a slender cord has been stretched across to the top of the Mount of Olives, those who would reach paradise must walk on that thread. Some of the way it is to be no larger than a hair, and those who pass over it will have the burden of their sins to fetter their feet. The guilty will fall from the cord into the gulf of hell, but the just will be supported by angels and they will cross over safely.

41. Two of the gates in the wall which formerly were open are now closed—the Golden gate and the Beautiful gate. Jesus is said to have passed into one of them when he entered the city on Palm Sunday, and which will be opened for him again when he comes to judge the world. Probably it will. The other is where Peter and John miraculously cured a lame man. But as this wall, with its gates, was constructed some centuries after the time when these events are said to have occurred, it is difficult to see how these claims can be true.

42. In passing out of the court of the temple, or the Haram, is the low depression which used to be the pool of Bethesda, where the first cripple who was able to get in after the angel troubled the waters was sure to be healed. It is a low, miserable looking place, but there is no water in it now, and in a short time the hole will be filled up, for two or three dozen donkeys were busily at work carrying dirt and rubbish there from some extensive digging that is being done; it is dumped down this hole, and half of the place is already filled up, and soon the pool of Bethesda will be one of the things that were.

43. Returning to the hotel, the pilgrims called at a Catholic convent, or home of the sisters, where quite a business is done in gumming on to cards the dried flowers that grow in the country, which are duly labeled Bethlehem, Nazareth, Mount of Olives, Jerusalem, etc., so as to make up an assortment of some two dozen kinds, and these are bought by tourists as mementoes of their visit. The pilgrims, of course, bought some of them, and some crowns of thorns.

44. Later in the day the subterranean quarries were visited, and they are quite extensive. At some time in the past a great amount of stone has been quarried out here. For half a mile ten feet of rock has been taken out, with the exception of the columns left to sustain the roof. The marks of the chisels of the workmen are seen in a few columns partly cut that have never been taken out. The rock is limestone.

Obituary.

Passed away from earth and us, D. Hewins, of Minneapolis, Minn., aged sixty-five years.

In this dear brother Liberalism, liberty of thought and speech, has lost a noble, truthful champion, an able, untiring, persevering advocate. Like most of us, he was educated a very strict Christian sectarian. He had very strong reasoning powers and a good memory. By persevering application and investigation he rose above all creeds and fables, entirely discarded mythical theology, and finally became a true and independent philosopher. Reason and common sense were his motto. The sciences and the unerring book of nature were his favorit pursuits and his most interesting themes. He was a progressiv, congenial companion; an honored citizen; a tender father; and a sincere and faithful friend. Many relativs and Liberal friends sincerely mourn his loss. With many tears the true philosopher was laid in the grave, where the weary are forever at rest.

May there not be some happy lands
Beyond the confines of the tomb,
And pure celestial spirit bands
Where everlasting flowers bloom,
In perfect worlds of bliss on high,
Where kindred spirits never die?

Or will the soaring mind remain
In quiet, everlasting rest,
Free from anxiety and pain,
No more with mortal care oppressed,
In silent grave-sequestered bowers
Sleep undisturbed amid the flowers?
We weep, we mourn his transient stay,
And like the flowers pass away.

Carry the War into Africa.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In your columns I not unfrequently see the defeat of Comstock in some of his attacks on better people. Nevertheless, Comstock, on the whole, is victorious so far. Heredity, the only gospel by which mankind can really be saved, is a tabooed subject. Dr. Foote is stirring it up, but Dr. Foote is denied the use of the mail; and, I believe, besides that, he finds it necessary to avoid the marriage question, which is as essential to all views about heredity as a foundation to a building. The Oneida Community, which really was trying valuable experiments in heredity, has been compelled to conceal, though probably not to discontinue, its practices. The movement in favor of ignorance has been very successful during the last seven years.

In a former communication I endeavored to show one way in which we must meet it. Science and Infidelity are as good as dead from the day they become afraid to investigate any subject, especially one so vital as this. We must "glory in the shame" of "obscenity," since "obscenity" has come to be the accepted term for the science of purity, health, and maternity. But there is another way of taking the offensiv, carrying the war into Africa. That is, to send Comstock to jail. Complaints hav several times been made against him for malicious prosecution, blackmail, assault, forgery, etc.; also against his purse-bearer, Colgate, for obscenity under his own law. Once, at least, a true bill was found against Tony, but I believe all these prosecutions came to nothing. The reason is, the accused did not hav the money, patience, and courage to push a matter involving so much that was unsavory against the united church. They were easily bought off.

Now we hav a Defense fund. But defense is not the attitude of strength. We must attack. Let us hav a "Society for the Prosecution of Perjurers, Extortioners, Common Barrators, Maintainers, and Champertors," with a fund confided to a good, trusty lawyer, like Mr. Wakeman, and, in the nature of things, it cannot be long before we get Comstock convicted of some grave offense and his pals so demoralized and disgraced that they will never be heard of more. If you start a subscription list for that purpose, I promis to "come down handsome."

C. L. James.

Mr. Bennett in India.

From the Theosophist we learn that the Theosophical Society of India held their anniversary meeting on January 12th, at which meeting Mr. Bennett was one of the speakers. Col. Alcott gave an account of the work the society had performed in the past year, and alluding to the proposition of the Bombay Gazette, that he and Joe Cook should get up a religious controversy, said that he had not the time to answer Cook, but that, perhaps, "Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor and proprietor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, one of the greatest organs of the Western Freethought movement," might hav a few words to say upon the subject. Mr. Bennett did hav a few words to say, and gave Cook's religion a thorough overhauling. The speech, together with the other proceedings, will appear in his letters in the proper place. At its conclusion he and Col. Alcott were complimented and warmly thanked by many Hindoo and Parsi gentlemen. In the published proceedings Mr. Bennett is introduced to the public of India by the following note:

"This famous Infidel agitator against Christian orthodoxy is a strong-built gentleman, of medium hight, with a large intellectual forehead and a pleasant voice. He was reared as a 'Shaker,' a sect of celebrated Christian mystics in America, who are universally esteemed for their pure moral character and industrious habits. His religious views having changed, Mr. Bennett at the age of 27 left them and went out into the world to fight a life-long battle for Freethought. Eight years ago he established THE TRUTH SEEKER, a weekly journal, which now has 50,000 readers, and has written and published scores of tracts and leaflets besides ten or more books against Christianity. He became so dangerous an opponent that, at last, the orthodox party availed themselvs of a convenient pretext, and had him sent to prison for selling a physiological work of which he was neither an author nor a publisher, and which the book trade were then selling, and are still selling, with impunity, thousands of copies! The fact appears in Mr. Bennett's address."

These proceedings made Joe Cook so angry that in his lectures in Bombay he went out of his way to defame the character of Mr. Bennett, Col. Olcott, and many nativ gentlemen of irreproachable character. He was immediately challenged to prove his statements by Pandit Dayanand Saraswati Swami, Col. Olcott, and Mr. Bennett, of whom the last mentioned sent the following challenge:

CROW'S NEST BUNGALOW, MAHALAKSHMI, Jan. 18, 1822.

SIR: You hav defamed my character, impugned my motivs, and cast a slur upon the whole Freethought party who take the liberty of thinking for themselvs. That the Indian public may know whether your several statements are true or false, I shall make, on Friday evening, at 5·30, at the Framji Cowasji Institute, a public statement. On that occasion I invite you to meet me face to face and answer the statements I shall make. Your failure to do so would be construed into an inability to substantiate reckless allegations flung out under the protection of a crowd of sympathizers.

Should you plead other engagements, I may say that to meet your calumnies I hav myself put off my engagement. Like yourself, I am on a voyage around the world, and hav no time to waste. For the whole truth,

Yours, etc., D. M. BENNETT.

Of course Cook failed to respond, but the meeting came off and "was the most overwhelming triumph the society has ever had in the Bombay presidency. The building was crowded to suffocation and the enthusiasm of the nativ audience knew no bounds."

The proceedings were reported and distributed in India, but hav not yet reached us. That Cook's vile aspersions fell upon rather steril soil is proved by the fact that at the next lecture in Bombay, as we learn from the Theosophist, he "was more hissed than applauded, and a deputation of nativs was sent to the Theosophical headquarters to ask the founders to reply to these aspersions. In accordance with this wish Col. Olcott and Madam Blavatsky, in company with Captain Banon, who was visiting them at that time, proceeded on the following day to hear Mr. Cook's last lecture. "Their appearance at the Town Hall was greeted with such a thundering and prolonged applause that it must hav stirred up the lecturer's guilty conscience, as he opened his discourse with the cowardly remark to the address of the nativ audience—reminding them 'of the presence of four policemen' at the door of the hall. It was not only in bad taste, but positivly vile, since the nativs only availed themselvs of their legal right to applaud or hiss at their will and pleasure. This bad taste and utter lack of gentlemanly tact and discretion were shown by the Boston lecturer a day later at Poona with a still greater prominence. Refused by the non-Christian nativs to listen to the Lord's prayer which he insisted forcing upon them, Mr. Cook wrathfully advised them to pray to their 'false gods.' Then he quarreled with two of the Christian missionaries present and insulted the chairman, a respectable European gentleman of Poona, the remarkable lecture coming to a close, to the great delight of the 'heathen' audience, amidst a 'general Christian row,' as the heathen editor of a local paper expressed it."

Altogether, the simultaneous appearance in Bombay of Joe Cook and Mr. Bennett—falsehood and truth—made a pretty lively time for the nativs. Cook was probably a revelation to them of a hitherto unknown phase of Christianity, and undoubtedly created a sensation akin to what might be experienced by a colony of bees upon the sudden dropping into their midst of a rather overgrown and particularly vicious monkey.

Mr. Wakeman on Comstockian Societies.

Owing to the revival by Comstock and his agents in various states of attempts to get into the statute-books his laws for his own aggrandizment, the Liberal Club was crowded last Friday night to hear Mr. Wakemen expound the working of these laws. Mrs. Amelia H. Colby was first announced to lecture upon this subject, but owing to sickness in the family of her friend and partner, Mrs. Smith, she was unable to keep her engagement, and Mr. T. B. Wakeman was called upon by the Lecture Committee of the club to speak upon "Comstockism Not a Safe or a Republican Form of Government, either in the State or United States." Among the prominent Liberals present were Courtlandt Palmer, E. W. Chamberlain, S. P. Putnam, H. B. Brown, Drs. E. B. Foote, Sr., E. B. Foote, Jr., Gunn, and Kinget. An invitation was extended to Mr. McBirney, secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, but he did not respond. Comstock was also absent—unavoidably, probably.

Courtlandt Palmer presided, and after the routine business of the club, Mr. Wakeman opened. He began by alluding to the departure from first principles of our government in the admission to our statute books of Comstock laws in 1872, and to the parceling out to amateur societies the enforcement of our laws. Four societies, he said, had practically the control of our laws. These are (1) the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, (2) Cruelty to Children, (3) Prevention of Crime, (4) Suppression of Vice, all of which, with the exception of the Society for the Prevention of Crime, are legally run by Elbridge T. Gerry. The effect has been practically to abandon the enforcement of our laws to theological and sentimental societies. Last winter Comstock endeavored to extend his operations by getting a bill through our legislature giving him the power to appoint deputies in any county of the state, who were to hav power to make arrests without a warrant. This law, Mr. Wakeman said, was defeated by the Liberals, who saw through it, and opposed it on principle. In three different states in the West, now, Comstock's agents are trying to get just such bills passed without the knowledge of the people. Through these societies, the theologians are trying to get under their control the morals, sentiments, and amusements of the people.

There are four corner-stones of American liberty. They are separation of church and state; equal, just, and impartial administration of the laws; separation of federal and state jurisdictions; just, fair, and impartial trial of all citizens by a jury of their own neighbors. Church and state, he went on, must be kept separate. There is no freedom with any sort of a pope to sit in inquisition on our thoughts. No censorship can be admitted by any theological coterie or society, or our liberties are gone. Take the men who control these societies, and what would they do with the members of the Liberal Club? They would do as Calvin did when he roasted Servetus for two hours over green oak. The men who control these societies are survivals—fossils who come down from barbaric and barbarous ages. Comstock does not care what the Liberals say or think; all he cares for is his God and his priest. These men love power, and are not satisfied because they cannot walk the streets a little bigger men than common. The danger to our country is in giving to piety a monopoly of enforcing laws. These priests hav drenched the world in blood. They hav made the earth a Golgotha. These men liv by contributions of the churches and half the fine of all they can mulct the persons for.

Equal and just laws is the next corner-stone, but with these societies in existence there can be no just laws, and no fair trial. The victim is convicted from the start. Judges dare not let up on the prisoner. The society must convict, or it would be liable to a prosecution for damages for false imprisonment.

In 1873, for the first time, at the instigation of Comstock, the post-office was empowered to discriminate upon the matter that went through the post-office. This turned the whole post-office into a trap to be used for the benefit of these amateur theological societies. It is a trick and device to make the United States a bureau of detection for Comstock's society. The result is, as Comstock said in Benedict's court, that "in this court we always convict."

Mr. Wakeman alluded to the trial of the Millers in New Jersey, a full report of which was given in THE TRUTH SEEKER. He then gave a statement of the arrest and prosecution of Dr. E. Moyer, for selling "Paine's Age of Reason," of which an account will be found in another column.

He drew a distinction between the jurisdiction of the United States and states, and said that the tendency of those laws was to centralization—a tendency utterly subversiv of American liberty. He alluded to Dr. Foote. The post-office could not find anything "obscene" in his paper, and said it must be stopped because it was an advertising sheet. So 26,000 of his papers were held at Buffalo without any authority but the dictum of the post-office officials, and he was obliged to pay $200 to get them started on their way.

The Liberals of the county were the only ones who realized the gravity of the danger to our liberties by these things, and he was sorry to say some of them cared more for Mother Grundy than for liberty. Mr. Wakeman said the club knew he was in favor of crime being punished and vice suppressed, but he wanted it done by legal means and not by theocratic societies. These societies were theological mobs, and their laws were theological mob laws. The state should punish the improper use of the mails by arresting the offender at either end of the route, as well as by express, or any other conveyance. Any body who said he was in favor of obscenity was a liar, and he was astounded that such a paper as the Boston Index should repeat these slanders and steadfastly refuse to publish the correction he had repeatedly sent. All laws giving officials power to discriminate against any paper should be revised.

Mr. Wakeman concluded his hour's speech by saying that he had as many interests at stake as any, but he would peril them all to defend principles of American liberty.

Dr. Lambert arose and said he had been told by members of the New York assembly that Mr. Wakeman's arguments before the assembly were the means of defeating Comstock. The committee at first were with Comstock, but after hearing Wakeman's speech, "Liberty and Purity," they were surprised that they, as lawyers, had not seen the truth before.

Mr. Palmer said Mr. Wakeman should be sent to Albany again, and the club should send him there. He offered to help pay the expense. Dr. Lambert moved that a committee be appointed to get money to defray expenses, which motion was carried. H. B. Brown, T. C. Leland, E. W. Chamberlain, and Mr. Dean were appointed committee to obtain subscriptions. Courtlandt Palmer headed the list with $25.

At the close of the meeting the chairman announced that $75 had been collected, and with a few explanatory and supplementary remarks by Mr. Wakeman the club then adjourned.

No Paine Monument in Washington.

Some time ago we saw an item floating around in the daily papers that Col. Ingersoll and other gentlemen were going to raise a monument to Paine, and, supposing it to hav been started by some Washington correspondent who knew what he was talking about, we copied it. Receiving the other day, from a valued friend, an offer to contribute $100 toward the monument so soon as the matter was in working shape, we wrote to Col. Ingersoll, making inquiry, and received in reply the following letter:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 9, 1882.

"MY DEAR MR. MACDONALD: All I know about the Paine monument is what I saw in the papers. I do not know that I am on any committee to raise or receive money.

"Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL."

We regret that the story is a canard, for Paine deserves a monument at the hands of the American people, and should hav one. Mayhap he will, one of these days, either in Washington or the Central Park in this city.

Liberal Notes and News.

A. L. RAWSON will speak at Science Hall, March 19th, at 8 P.M., on "The Voice of Humanity in the Architecture, Sculpture, and Painting of the Past." This is the eleventh lecture of the course inaugurated by the Society of Humanity.

MRS. ANNIE T. ANDERSON addressed the Second Society of Spiritualists in the parlors of Mr. and Mrs. Milton Rathbun, March 8th, upon the question of "The Materialists and Spiritualists Combined Forces to Check Christian Aggressivness." All present seemed to favor her ideas of ladies' Liberal Leagues to be formed as an aid.

W. F. JAMIESON is busy nearly all the time in the lecture field. He does not depend entirely on lecture calls, but goes into all the world and preaches Liberalism. When last heard from he was giving a course of six lectures in Turner Hall, Chilton, Wis., and was announced to speak at Fox Lake, Wis., March 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th, where he may be addressed for the present.

ON Thursday, Feb. 10th, Comstock arrested Wm. Wilson on a charge of defamation of character. He thinks it will take $10,000 to repair the damage Wilson has done to his reputation by publishing some facts about him. The judge (Neilson) seemed to be of the same opinion, for he placed the bail at the above sum. He was afterward convinced that Mr. Wilson would not run away, although not bound by quite so much money, and he reduced the bail to $3,000, which being given by Mrs. Wm. Wilson and a gentleman friend, Mr. Wilson was allowed to go until such time as the court should want him. The idea of Comstock suing for defamation of his character is quite rich. A rotten egg might as well get offended at being accused of stinking when broken.

OWING to the crowded state of our columns, the instalment for this week of Mr. Wakeman's lecture is unavoidably deferred. Students will miss their usual treat, but next week it will appear. Perhaps they can content themselvs with Mr. J. W. King's article, which tears Mr. Wakemen's theories all apart!

MANY of the subscribers to the Round-the-World fund hav written us to know how much it will increase the cost to hav the books bound in extra binding, and saying they wished them in better than ordinary style. We can furnish the volumes bound in leather, with red edges, for 75 cents per volume extra, or $2.25 for the three; in morocco, with gilt edges, for $1 extra per volume, or $3 for the three volumes. All wanting them that way will please notify us, remitting the amount, and the books will be bound as desired. We will feel obliged if they will order early, so we can tell how many to bind in leather and morocco.

Prosecuted for Selling the "Age of Reason."

Dr. E. Moyer was arrested Feb. 4th for selling Paine's "Age of Reason" without a license (religious works, tracts, etc., requiring no license here). Dr. Moyer, being a stranger here, and having no friends that he was aware of, happened to meet with me after having put up his bail to appear, etc., and asked what to do. I spoke to some of the Freethinkers, amongst whom was Geo. W. Lewis, Esq., who is a gentleman of standing and more than ordinary legal ability and practitioner at all our courts.

Dr. Moyer had a talk with Mr. Lewis, whose ready wit prompting him what to do in the premises, cunningly demanded a jury trial. A venire was served at first for twenty jurors. Of course they were closely questioned as to whether they were free from prejudice against Infidels, and their testimony was found to be somewhat difficult—almost as difficult as getting a jury on a Sunday law case. But, however, after a second, then a third, Mr. Lewis succeeded in getting a satisfactory jury.

In opening the case the prosecuting attorney read parts or pages 1, 9, 19, 66, etc., of the "Age of Reason," and made some remarks, and of course read the city ordinance in regard to selling books, etc. (Remember, the city allows all religious books, pamphlets, tracts, papers, or cards to be sold on the streets free from taxes). He claimed that the "Age of Reason" did not come under that head; that it was a book the author of which was a well-known Infidel, and that it was injurious, as it always has been, to the human family, and now is to the rising generation.

It is useless to add that the court-room was packed, from the orthodox clergy even to the illiterate Chinaman, to hear the result of this supposed breach or violation of a city ordinance.

Of course as soon as the prosecution rested Mr. Lewis opened for the defense. His speech was one of the most eloquent it has been our privilege to listen to for a long time. He showed to the jury, in plain terms, the absurdity of depriving the right of thought, the right of speech, the right of acting, not in defiance of law, but that right which God himself and law itself allows (which is not in defiance to law, but which is every man's prerogativ), the right to think and speak.

During Mr. Lewis's speech all were silent; you could hav heard a pin drop. He recited at length a history of the times in which the immortal Paine lived, and whose name will liv as long as time will last. It is useless to recite any further. Let it suffice that the prosecuting attorney didn't reply, but was willing to submit the case to the jury. The judge in his charge was neutral. Most of the jury were church-members, and were naturally supposed to be prejudiced to Infidelity, and particularly Paine's "Age of Reason." But to the astonishment of the crowded court-room, when the jury announced the readiness of their decision, after only a few minutes' absence in the jury room, they returned a verdict of "not guiity," and I must say, not only to the surprise, but extreme satisfaction of the crowded court-room.

I am happy to state that Dr. Moyer was congratulated by all of us who are for right, justice, and freedom.

West Oakland, Cal. JOHN C. BULLOCK.

Communications.

Is the Sound Theory Overthrown?—Concluded.

In one place Tyndall says that "a string stretched over rigid bits of iron unconnected with wood makes no sound, no matter how strongly vibrated, because such string is too thin a body to produce a sensible effect on the air." "It is not the chords that throw the air into motion, but the large surfaces they are connected with and the air inclosed by these surfaces." "The motion communicated to air by a vibrating string is too small to be perceived as sound even at a small distance from the string" (Lectures on Sound). "This," says the author of the book, "is suicide, for the little films over the openings at the locust's side are the one-hundreth part as large as such strings as Tyndall speaks of, yet with no strong hand to pluck, with nothing but its tiny legs to rub over them, this little creature "molds and carves the air into waves," sitting upon a leaf with no large surface to act as sounding-board—thus by its almost invisible films generating disturbances to fill four entire miles of air."

But, says the writer, here is the grand demonstration of the utter nonsense of the accepted theory. He is willing to forego all else and stand on this demonstration alone. There can be no doubt of the theory as propounded. It means that sound is nothing but "air waves striking the drum-skin"—"the tympanic membrane"—"moving it once in, once out," and the sound is in ourselvs—it is nothing outside of us but vibrations of air. "Now if I can demonstrate that this does not vibrate, cannot vibrate, in response to sound, and is not intended to vibrate in the least, it is clear that the wave theory fails? First, the drum-skin is a membrane, a physical, ponderable body, having inertia only to be overcome by force if merely suspended; but being tightly drawn, it requires more force to move it. Second, it weighs a little over a half grain, or it takes sixteen thousand to make a pound of them. Third, stretched it occupies one cubic fourth inch. Now imagin one drum-skin extended in the space of each cubic quarter inch of the four miles filled by the stridulation of the locust As sure as there is any truth in the wave theory, all of these will be thrown into motion. By a simple calculation we find that here are sixty-five quadrillion tympanic membranes stretched within the four miles; divided by sixteen thousand, the number to the pound, gives us two thousand million tons of this membrane, which this trifling insect can throw into rapid motion by merely moving its legs! Darwin says the locust can be heard one mile in every direction, and Tyndall says each ear-drum moves once in and out by the force of the air at each vibration."

If we consider the passage of sound through iron, wood, or rock, by the air wave theory, we run into equal absurdities. It is a law of water waves that the distance between each wave is as ten to twelve as compared with the hight; that is, if a wave is one inch high the distance between it and other waves of the same hight is ten or twelve inches. Toss one-pound stones into water, and you raise waves about two inches high and twenty inches apart. The author spent much time in measuring and studying waves, and employed assistants. He measured the waves from drops of water falling on the surface, waves made by passing boats, waves caused by gales of wind. He went out and measured the ocean billows. He found this law invariable. He found also, as any one who ever saw water in commotion knows, that the waves travel faster the larger they are. Children playing with toy ships on the water know this. How slowly the little vessel travels on the tiny waves made by drops of water, be the waves never so rapid! Let an ocean billow seize the little boat, and it is borne out of sight in a moment. Now the air wave men hav devoted whole pages to show that the air waves are exactly like water waves in every respect. Now what is the theory as to the wave lengths and hights in air producing sound? Here we hav it from Tyndall, ever ready with his tuning-fork: "Imagin this fork vibrating 384 times in air, at sixty degrees fahrenheit, of this room in one second, the foremost wave of air is 1,120 feet from the fork. Therefore in this distance are 384 vibrations or waves of air; 1,120 feet, divided by 384 vibrations, gives us exactly two feet eleven inches for the length of each wave. Here is another fork vibrating at the rate of two hundred and fifty-six per second." The length between its air waves is of course four feet four inches.

But there is the law showing the amplitude or hight of each wave once we hav the distance. Each wave is from one-tenth to one-twelfth as high as the distance from wave to wave. If the waves are identically the same as water waves, as the theory declares, then these air waves made by this tuning-fork, vibrating two hundred and fifty-six times per second, are at least four inches high. If the waves are not about that high, then they are not like water waves, and so the theory falls to the ground. Now Tyndall says some sound waves are four hundred and seventy-six feet apart, and therefore must be forty-seven feet high. There are the waves for low E, double bass. Imagin such waves of air passing through rock or iron! It would pulverize them. Nay, imagin them shocking our ear-drums. The very thought givs us the ear-ache!

Unfortunately for these air wave theorists, they entirely overlooked the fact that sound goes through water. As we cannot see air waves, they can talk securely of them, but water we can see. Sound goes through water four times faster than through air. What makes the sound heard through water? A familiar example is known to boys in bathing. One will get two rocks and clap them together under water while another some distance off holds his head under. A severe, distressing, solid sound is heard. While some boys are diving a distance off, another boy will slyly knock stones together under the water. Every diver will instantly rise shaking his head and complaining. These sounds must be made, then, by water waves. According to the current theory, some of these waves must be monsters, and yet not the slightest ripple is observed either upon or beneath the water. That is an experiment the writer of this has very often made. This alone is enough to overwhelm the air wave theory. Why not admit, then, at once that sound is a real entity, like magnetism, which passes through densest matter, grasping other matter far from it and putting it in motion or dragging it toward itself as though it had arms with hands? Sound also is a material doubtless somewhat akin to magnetism, set into various action according to the nature, etc., of the molecules disturbed by the shock and has an affinity for the auditory nerve just as light has for the ocular nerve. A mere wave of grosser substance cannot hav such effect on our finer senses.

Wave velocity is always in proportion to the wave length. D of the piccolo flute has a wave length of three inches. Low E of the double bass has a wave length of twenty-eight feet, according to the theory. Between these two are wave lengths of all sizes. Yet all these move 1,120 feet per second in air at sixty degrees fahrenheit. Let a band of music be stationed at a distance off. You hear each instrument at the same instant. Were the wave theory true you would hear the tones of low E bass first. Then would follow the others in due order. After a long interval those of the little flute would come slowly in. But in fact there is another law of waves that would cause still greater confusion. Each wave moving onward expends its strength, goes slower, and is overtaken by other waves in its rear; finally one largest wave of resistance is raised composed of innumerable overtaking waves. Watch the sea or lake shores any day and this can be observed.

I hav thus hastily sketched a few of the insuperable difficulties presented by the author of the work against the air wave theory of sound.

We are strange creatures. We will uphold any theory or practice, no matter how absurd it may be, so long as our doubts remain quiescent. The wisest, greatest minds of every age hav been the most activ in upholding whatever may hav been the fashion of their time. As the author truly says, when reviewing the wonderful ruins he has made, astonished, as he well may be, at his own havoc, the wisest of us are like mules hitched to a turning post and made to go round and round. When the hitching strap is taken off we still continue to go round and round from force of habit. That no attention has been given to this work in the scientific (so called) publications is only another proof that there is popery in science as well as in religion and medicin.

CLARKE IRVINE.

A Letter from California.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: We are keeping the fires of liberty bright and burning here Under the auspices of Liberal League 190 we celebrated Thomas Paine's birthday in excellent style. Our principal speaker was Charles Bright, a distinguished Australian Liberal. For local speakers we had J. L. Hatch, president of the League; Leonidas Hamilton, a young lawyer; I. N. Choynski, an editor, and Addie Ballou, prominent in Spiritual circles. The speeches were excellent, the audience large and intelligent. The best report of the proceedings was given by the Daily Examiner, the leading Democratic journal of the city.

Under the auspices of Auxiliary Liberal League 190, also, we had a splendid lecture by Charles Bright on Monday evening last, the subject being "What Civilization has Done for Christianity." The lecturer spoke extemporaneously, and handled the subject in a masterly manner. The audience enthusiastically applauded. Resolutions of sympathy with the oppressed and outraged Russian Jews were passed by acclamation, and the Russian consul in this city was politely requested to transmit the respectful petition to his imperial majesty of all the Russias. His majesty is appealed to in person in the resolutions to stay the crime and carnage produced by the most fearful fanaticism of this or any age.

Mr. Bright departs for the East to-day, and will call at the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We bespeak for him a hearty reception. In religion the gentleman is a Spiritualist, and, like the hosts of Spiritualists throughout the country, he is heart and soul with us non-Spiritualists in the great Liberal crusade against the gigantic superstition called Christianity. Previous to his departure he was tendered a farewell social meeting by Wm. S. Ray, a young and successful merchant of this city. Assembling at the comfortable and hospitable home of Mr. Ray, he and his estimable lady made the guest of the evening and all others present perfectly at home. We hope to hear that Mr. Bright will hav a successful eastern tour. "A stranger in a strange land," we hav, to the best of our means, received him cordially here. Ever for universal mental liberty,

San Francisco, Mar. 1, 1882. BYRON ADONIS.

Still Unconvinced.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Wakeman, in his article in reply to his critics, complains that his critics hav commenced too soon to criticise him, and should wait until he has completed his statements. He says I entertain inconsistent views of him, and it can't be wondered at that I get so confused about his treatment of the difficult subject in hand. To say one is a deep, logical reasoner, and yet is liable to reason wrong and commit mistakes, was not, I should think, very inconsistent. A deep, logical reasoner, no matter how level his head may be, is not infallible, and is sometimes as liable to make mistakes as other people, particularly if he has a hobby to ride. Probably we all hav our hobbies, and perhaps Mr. Wakeman is not an exception. I would walk a hundred miles to see the man who never reasoned wrong or never made a mistake.

Now, I would ask him if protoplasm, as he describes it, is not a germ? He says that it is the bridge over the chasm between inorganic and organic matter; that all organisms, all life, originate from protoplasm, and only from protoplasm. If this is true, is not this protoplasm a germ? I would call it so, and did, but did not say that Mr. Wakeman called it a germ. I think I made no dogmatic assertions about this matter, one way or the other, but simply asked him how he knows that organization and life originated from protoplasm, and only from it. This question he has not answered, or only so far as to say that scientists are now substantially agreed upon this hypothesis. And he answers the question in regard to the origin of protoplasm by saying that this wonderful substance is a purely natural product, and quotes Haeckel, Huxley, Spencer, and all evolution biologists. Now we might say a tree, a pumpkin, or a horse was purely a natural product; yet that is not answering the question how and in what manner vital organic life is generated in the first place.

Mr. Wakeman says that if I think the scientists are wrong, I hav only to show life is something besides protoplasm. Now I hav never asserted that life is not in protoplasm, or that it is in something besides that substance. I am a mere inquirer, and, if I recollect right, I neither asserted nor denied anything. I freely own my ignorance in these matters, and of course am not going to try to explain things I know very little about. He defies me to show any life that is not in the matter called protoplasm He may well do that; I pretend to no knowledge of the unknowable or unprovable. But it is rather for him to show that there is no life other than in the matter of protoplasm. The burden of proof rests on him, not upon me, as I hav neither affirmed nor denied anything.

Mr. Wakeman says, "What I was trying to point out was that the music was in the piano, but not in the matter of the piano per se—that is, not in the matter of which the piano was made." But this is not an analogous case, not a fair comparison, by any means. The piano is a mere dead mechanical machine, and cannot produce any sound of itself, either whole or in parts, but must depend entirely on outside forces to produce the music. Not so with a living, organized, vital structure; all its manifestations of life are within itself, and not an outside force. The comparison is wide of the mark.

The trouble with me, says Mr. Wakeman, is that I seem to hav no conception of the modern phase of Materialism, which rests upon modern physiology and psychology, which regards life, feeling, thought, soul, not as materials or entities at all. Here Mr. Wakeman is mistaken a little. I hav been an out-and-out Materialist for fifty years, and never hav believed for a moment that life, spirit, soul, or intelligence was either a material or spiritual entity; they are nothing more, of themselvs, than the effects of the action and reaction of matter, the result of the chemical and electrical changes that are constantly going on. But very likely I am an old fogy with regard to this new school of Positiv philosophy that has become popular in some quarters of late, where they hav inoculated religion with science. It seems to me most absurd to attempt to form a religion out of science. I hav very little conception of such a religio-science, such an unnatural, mule-like hybrid as that. I belong to that school of Materialism of which the distinguished Dr. Charles Knowlton was a member. I was early in life imbued with Materialistic views. My parents being of the Quaker school of religion, I was not very much stuffed with superstitious nonsense about gods and devils, heavens and hells, ghosts and witches. What little religion I had, if I had any, was evoluted out of me before I was of age.

It seems to me this new Materialism inaugurated by Compte is running too much to seed; it needs the pruning-knife badly; that branch of it called Positiv philosophy, being nothing but a "sucker," should be taken off at the root. This stuffing science with religion has resulted from the foolish cry made by Christians, "What will you giv us in the place of Christianity, and the religion that you are robbing us of?" And so these scientific philosophers hav made a sort of composit religion out of science, Materialism, and Atheism—strange materials, truly, to make a religion of. Among the absurd cries that hav been uttered against Infidelity, this cry that it is robbing the world of Christianity, and this clamoring for a substitute, is the most foolish. It is precisely like a patient saying to his physician: "Doctor, now you hav cured me of the fever, what disease do you propose to giv me in place of it? I can't do without one." "Well," says the doctor, "I can giv you the small-pox. How will that do?" Now, these Positiv philosophers may be curing the fever, but are they not spreading the small-pox?

I hav no religion, and no gods to serve; yet, perhaps, I hav as keen a relish for the true, the good, the grand, the beautiful, as most persons; and I hav never thought of making a religion out of such materials, and hav ever regarded religion and superstition as one and the same article. Nor do I think that these Positiv philosophers and biologists, Comte, Spencer, Wakeman, and others, will ever be able to make this unnatural religion stick. I doubt if, on an average, one person in fifty would hav patience to read Comte's "Positiv Philosophy" through; and those that hav patience and time to read it will hardly profit by it as a religious work. It strikes me that this Positiv religion is not rightly named. It has no tangible central figure to worship. It certainly is not equal, by a long way, to the ancient sun-worship. If worship must be done, what more appropriate object to worship than the glorious old sun, the grandest object ever in our view, in whose light and heat we liv, move, and hav our being? It is horrible to contemplate the deplorable condition we would be in here on our little planet if that glorious, life-giving orb were blotted out of existence. I confess to a feeling of sympathy for those ancient sun-worshipers.

Our duty here is plain and simple: Let us do as we would wish to be done by; be just and true to ourselvs as well as to others;

Be just, be kind, be honest and true,
And banish all sects and all creeds;
In this we shall find a plenty to do;
Let's root out all of the weeds.

J. M. KING.

Origin of the Christian Mythology and Religion, Briefly Stated from Known History.

History records that in the first three centuries of this era was witnessed the gradual downfall and eventual extinction, in that time, of the ancient pagan religions, of the mythologies of Greece and Rome. During that transition in the overthrow of those ancient faiths and associated religious rites, much anxiety for the peace of society and safety of governments was naturally felt to be involved, though, for centuries before, those myths had been only passivly maintained by the educated classes. By many with such lessening regard that they were considered as only poetical illusions—frequently derided—but still observed some of the associated rites, because they served to bind together the unthinking masses of the people in national unity, as their most valued merits. But a change was inevitable, and in the extinction of such old mythologies there was necessarily created, in general society, much consternation, and consequent distrust in any permanency of faiths, or governments, and general confusion and anarchy were the inevitable results; as the natural fruits of general ignorance, when neither printing or public schools had been invented or adopted.

Such disruption of old faith, holy-day ceremonies, public festivities and general weakening of governmental control; with the prevailing tendency of our race to hav some form of binding religions belief, it was natural to seek for some higher unity and more powerful intelligence than man possesses, and so for some adequate first cause for natural phenomena, it became the most adaptable period to found a new faith, in which the then new Christian legends, taking the monotheistic form in place of the worn-out old pantheistic confused beliefs of many ruling gods, rapidly gained adherents. But, unhappily, with the Christian substitute it was encumbered with very many contradictions and wholly unhistorical traditions; with consequent better schisms, which soon degenerated—in the second century—into a polytheistic trinity, with its strange worship of a mythical son of man as equal with God, and, indeed, usurping his prerogativ, as an odd mixture of old personal mythologies.

Such confused transitional state of society and creeds, or, rather, want of unity in definit beliefs, made the two or three first centuries of this era the most fanatical periods in history, in which designing knaves and tyrants found this opportunity for priestly and saintly sway, mingled with terrorism; which knew no honest bounds in their then forged fictions, palmed upon credulous ignorance.

Here was the great opportunity to forge history out of assumed traditions—which no reliable historian, or other intelligent authorities, confirmed, or even named, as occurring—by either Romans, Greeks, or the Jewish Josephus—that in the beginning of the first century there existed a miraculous personage, assumed to be a messiah, born of a virgin, who was overshadowed and impregnated by God, and their offspring Jesus afterward performing miracles in raising the dead—even the long dead saints to rise and walk about the city, and the sun to be darkened for hours at his momentous death, etc. Here was the fabulous foundations of quantities of supernatural follies, and soon various unknown and unscrupulous fanatical writers advanced to the front, as the especial opportunity for assumed particulars of such fancied mysterious character—needing no limit for their fictions. And, to giv such narrations the more hold upon credulity, they dressed their unnatural assumptions in cant phraseology, accompanied by varied and contradictory supernatural power (according to fancy of the different writers), with which they invested their mythic hero, in dogged statements of great miracles which they assumed that he performed from one to two hundred years before such writers existed, but such bold assumptions were all sufficient to enlist proselytes among the credulous, ignorant masses, thirsting for marvels, and thus to maintain a roving race of priestly fanatics and expounders to propagate and perpetuate their unhistoric assumptions. In progress of time this dominant fanaticism affected more intelligent classes, through policy and fear, to pay some homage to such fanaticism, in contributing their wealth to build churches, and to support priests and idle monks, until it became a dominant fashion to be conspicuous supporters of the church.

It was not until after the expiration of the first century that such traditional messianic personage (not historical, for there was no such historic character) was fanatically elevated to the rank of God, in forming a trinity; and, thus, a polytheistic faith which artfully embodied in his assumed miraculous birth character, death, ascension, etc., traits belonging to the mythical personages of the old Eastern mythologies—thus largely blending the old and new faiths—which more easily attached fanatical adherents to their unwarranted and irrational assumptions. A trinity being thus seen as the simple product of seeking strange gods to gain proselytes for the new imposition upon credulity. Even the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher said, "It must be admitted that Christ was not named as a part of the godhead, to form a trinity, until after the first century."

The now too readily accepted gospel narrativs are historically proved not to hav been written before the second century, and so such writers not being eye-witnesses their relations are simply traditional at best, and their saintly assumed authors are unknown, being unhistorically prefixed to such writings for effect, and to cover their evident falsity. Though some enthusiasts assume that their writings were based on a more ancient and original gospel, of which there is no mention or proof that any such ever existed. The existing gospels in the third century were arbitrarily selected from a mass of other fanatical writings of the same ilk by a quarrelsome Ecumenical Council, and dogmatically declared to be the accepted creed or dogma for Christian adoption, though of no more authority than, and equally as irrational as, those rejected (by a small majority of votes) now called apocryphal. Such doctrins, or gross impositions, being enforced during many succeeding centuries by the most abhorrent persecutions against unbelievers, until the Reformation brought some relief from such barbaric cruelties.

Nothing is really known about any such person as Christ from authentic history, and some of the early and more honest fathers of the church considered him as only the personification of the soul, but not as a real person. All claims about his miraculous birth, character, and doings; his peculiar death, resurrection, and ascension, are simply artful assumptions, and written so long after the assumed occurrences that they can be nothing better than vague, unreliable traditions at best, portrayed and colored by designing deceivers in their contradictory statements. Such is the baseless fabric of a trinity and the weird atoner of others' sins—the last not so easily got rid of, even by added priestly impositions. Such are mere fictions, without even a foundation of any known facts relating to such a character beyond fanatical pretenses of many centuries since, which no known contemporaneous writers even mention, and much less confirm, such assumed occurrences, including that of the sun being darkened for hours and the long dead saints rising and walking about the city of Jerusalem at his death, which marvels could not hav escaped the observant curiosity of intelligent Greeks and Romans.

The Christian religion is based on an irrational mythology, and so is, of course, as much of a mythology as any of the pagan mythologies, except in the lesser number of their gods; as all we can possibly know of God is from his works—the Book of Nature—and that proclaims him infinit. Thus the assumption by Christians that the godhead is a trinity is a clearly proved man-made mythology, as there cannot be but one infinit. Again, the Christian mythology claims that "Mary's son is God most high," and thus "Mary as the mother of God," together with the existence of a devil—as the antagonist of God—which are thoughtless degradations of his infinitness. Such combined associations or mythological divisions of his self-evident unity and infinit power are positivly irrational and irreverent and strange delusions for this nineteenth century. My other papers and books prove, scientifically as well as rationally, an intelligent creation and immortality for all minds—without any fanciful emotionalism of biblical cant and irreverence—which needs no priestly aids to comprehend such common sense views of God and nature.

An infinit God is ample for every good, and so needs no mythological aids; and animal selfishness is ample for every evil, and so deeds no mythological devil. All mythological religions serve only to stultify our race with fabulous follies instead of reason by seeking for strange gods, and thus maintaining degrading superstitions with such unnatural assumptions, which denies to the one real God of nature his infinit prerogativ, and deprives man of his unity of adoration, and thus of his common sense views of nature and its author. Such also degrades man and narrows his more natural charitable fellowship—now severed by anomalous hostil creeds—and too prevalent inhumanity toward other sentient animals, which the Bible arrogantly and cruelly teaches are only "the brutes that perish"—therefore their feelings are seldom respected.

Thus it must be seen that the Christians of to-day are but perpetuating a mythological religion most nineteen centuries old, without any real historic foundation beyond culpable fanaticism. God, or the first great cause of all phenomena, must be too infinitly above man to be belittlingly associated with any mythology or mankind division of his infinitness, and to whom alone our adoration is due.

Some people attach great importance to the founding of this era as Anno Domini, as if it was adopted in the year 1, as denoting an important event; but that is a great error. The designation of this era was first proposed by a fanatical Christian monk named Dionysius, in the year 516, but was not used in any book until the year 748 as A.D. CHAS E. TOWNSEND.

The Pilgrim.

From the west to the eastward there passes,
Through the land of the Arab and Turk,
Past the mosques of Mohammed's disciples,
And the fields where the civilized work;

Past the caves of the seven deep sleepers,
Who rested for hundreds of years;
Past Smyrna and Patmos and Scio,
The homes of old poets and seers;

A pilgrim from lands occidental,
With face ever set toward the sun,
As the earth's revolution diurnal
Round the great solar orb is begun.

He has stood on the bema of Lysias,
Of Georgias and Æschines grand,
And the hill where Paul spoke to young Athens
The words they could not understand.

He has wandered in walks academic,
Made classic by Plato of old,
Who builded ethereal castles,
And loved quite unpassioned and cold.

He strolls on the banks of the river
The Romans revered as a god;
Drops a tear on the graves of the heroes
Who sleep under Tuscany sod.

Beyrout, Baalbec, and Damascus,
He pictures with versatil pen;
Sees Jerusalem, Palestine, Nazareth,
And makes them historic again.

By Galilee's shores he reposes,
And dreams to the sound of its waves;
In the wonderful waters of Jordan
His Infidel person he laves.

So ever from west to the eastward,
He journeys by night and by day,
And the hearts of the homekeeping thousands
Will follow his arduous way.

No deity ask they to keep him,
But trust to the powers that be,
For Yahweh and Chemosh and Baal
Are as dead as the Palestine sea.

So we'll speak to the waves of the ocean,
To bring the bold voyager home,
As the pagans prayed to the Tiber
That rolled by the towers of Rome. G. E. M.

A Plan to Curtail the Increasing Power of Catholic Institutions.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav read with concern your article in your issue of March 4th, on the Catholic church. The new political idea set forth by Mr. Brad Schieffelin to be incorporated in the Constitution of the United States I think worthy of all who would establish permanently our freedom, which is menaced by the church of Rome not only, but by the tremendous and seemingly irresistible centralizing forces which the spirit of monopoly is constantly creating.

Simple as effectual is the remedy proposed, and it does not require long and deep reflection for an intelligent mind to see it is not, however, doing much toward aiding in the accomplishment of so desirable an end simply to acknowledge to ourselvs or others that the idea is a good one, but if we would hav it a statute we each can do much toward accomplishing it, and with very little trouble. It is certainly the paramount need of the day, and every Liberal is especially interested in the preservation of our free government, for if that be destroyed the growth of Liberalism will be checked.

The proposed amendment is that "no citizen of the United States shall giv or bequeath by will or testament to any one legatee more than a fixed or limited amount of property," which does not interfere with the testator in making what disposition he likes of it in his lifetime. For further information I would advise every Liberal to write to Hon. Judge D. D. McKoon, 252 Broadway, New York, secretary of a committee engaged in the forming of a new party whose platform embraces this idea with others of a novel as well as practical character to effect its object, which, I understand, is to make the government a true instead of a sham democratic republic, which it seems to hav been since its foundation. Taxation of Church Property in Michigan.

The question of church taxation is now before the extra session of the Michigan legislature, and the subject is being discussed by the press throughout the state.

Some six thousand names to petitions for the repeal of the law exempting church property from taxation hav already gone before the legislature, and the number is increasing daily.

My experience in Michigan for the past winter has convinced me that there are more live Freethinkers in the state, according to the inhabitants, than in any other state in the Union. And these people are now demanding even-handed justice from their legislature—demanding that the large amount of property invested in churches pay its proportion of the taxes of the state. And the Christian church of Michigan, by opposing this just demand, shows itself to be the fraud that it is. With a sanctimonious face these pious Christians read on the their Sabbath day the eighth commandment—"Thou shalt not steal"—and all the while they know that by exempting their church property from taxation they are indirectly stealing money out of the pockets of the non-church people of the state, who are compelled, against their will, to pay these taxes. They are, in fact, as guilty of stealing as the highwayman who compels you to stand and deliver to him your money.

S. B. McCracken, Esq., of Detroit, who, I believe, is chairman of the executiv committee of the N. L. L. of Michigan, is taking the lead in this movement, and devotes most of his time to the work, and I hope our Liberal friends of Michigan will remember he cannot liv on air and water and clothe himself with fig-leaves. If every one in Michigan who desires to see this movement succeed would send Bro. McCracken a dollar they would do much to bring about the desired reform.

The following very sensible editorial I cut from the Detroit Evening News, the paper that has the largest circulation of any one in the state:

"The number of petitions for the taxation of church property which are pouring in upon the legislature, show that the question is not a purely speculativ one in this state. It is true the number of signatures to them is perhaps a small one compared to the long list that could be obtained even in this city alone in favor of the exemption. It must be remembered, however, that when a wrong is done by which only a few suffer, and by which the great majority profit, the protest of the few who are wronged should hav more significance than a demand for a continuance of the wrong by the many who derive benefit from it. It is not likely, however, that the legislature will pay much attention to these petitions at the present session. The reform sought is one which will require a long agitation and much hard work and discussion. The churches themselvs are now so unanimous against paying their just share of the costs of government that the proposal to tax them will hardly be listened to with patience in religious circles. There are many denominations which in time may be made to see that it is as much in the interest of religion, as of irreligion, that religion should not be a 'dead-head' in politics."

H. L. G.

P. S.—Since writing the above, I notice that the question of church taxation has been brought to a vote in the house of the Michigan legislature. The vote stood—for the taxation of church property, 29; against the taxation of church property, 47. Representativ Hopkins, of Detroit, was the mover in favor of the repeal of the exemption laws. John Moore, of Saginaw, was the champion of the church. I hope our Liberal friends will remember him at the next election, and the other members who voted with him to sustain this great injustice. Name and Address Wanted.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you kindly allow me to say to whom it may concern, through your columns, that if the person who recently forwarded to me several little pamphlets with the request in pencil mark, "Exchange for 'Design in Nature,'" will send me his or her name and address, I will be pleased to comply with the request made? The parcel came from across the line, and I think from one of your readers; but as I am unacquainted with the handwriting, and there is no name or address given, I know not to whom I am indebted. Very truly yours, ALLEN PRINGLE.

Selby, Ont., March 5th.

P.S.—I hav great pleasure in informing you, Mr. Editor, and your many readers that the Evidence Amendment act, for which we hav been petitioning Parliament lately, has just passed the Ontario Legislature, whereby all unbelievers may hereafter giv evidence in all courts in this province by making an affirmation instead of taking the Christian oath. Mr. Milne and the Chicago Clergy.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Milne's brave and outspoken utterances in Chicago hav aroused the orthodox clergy in that city and put them on the defensiv. Last week I read a long sermon from an Episcopal preacher of Chicago "answering" Milne, and to-day's Chicago Tribune has a sermon from Rev. J. H. Barrows and one from Dr. Lorimer—both efforts in that direction. They succeed just about as well as they did in answering Ingersoll. The multiplication table is a hard thing to refute. Mr. Milne's shot made a bad hole in the old orthodox ship of Zion, and now all the clergy of Chicago are at work at the pumps to keep the old hulk from sinking.

WATERLOO, IOWA, March 5, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 to help friend Bennett home on his Round-the-World trip. I would hav sent before this, but I hav been too short of cash this few past months. If I am too late with my $5 you may credit it on my subscription to the paper, which I expect to read while I liv. MRS. M. REPP.

CORNPLANTER, PA., Feb. 29, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $8—$5 for the Round-the-World trip for Charles B. Lawrence, and the balance please use as directed. I hope this is in time for Mr. Lawrence's name to get in the first volume all right. If I find the "lamp still holds out to burn" I may send one or two more "V's" this week yet.

ROCK SPRINGS, WY. TER., March 6, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10—three dollars for subscription to the paper for 1882, and five dollars to add to the Round-the-World fund to help bring the old veteran, Mr. Bennett, home, and the balance for books as per order. With many thanks for past favors, I remain, Yours truly, NATT RYLAND.

METAMORA, OHIO, Feb. 25, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: A few weeks ago a friend and subscriber of yours loaned me a few copies of your paper, and I was so well pleased with them that I subscribed for a trial trip of three months, and now I wish to extend it to a full year. I formerly took the Boston Investigator, but had got rather cold in Liberalism as there were no other Materialists in this vicinity that I know of, and Mr. Kahle came upon me like a new dispensation, stimulating my old feelings into new life.

By the way, Mr. Kahle lost his very estimable wife here last December. She was a woman loved by all that were acquainted with her. Mr. Kahle's health is quite poor, but is improving.

Thinking so much of your paper I hav secured two subscribers, and think the leaven is working to the end that I will procure more. I also inclose $5 for Mr. Bennett's Round-the-World trip. You can place my name in the first volume if not too late. Please send me the inclosed list of books.
Yours truly, SANFORD M. CLARKE, M.D.

FONTANA, KAN., March 1, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Having received your card of Feb. 22d, telling me that my time as a trial subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER was up, I will send $8 with this for the Round-the-World trip and the paper for the next twelve months. I read the paper for part of a year some three or four years ago and now for the last three months, and like it so well that I will try it a while longer. I want the trip Round-the-World, as I hav not read it all in the paper, not having taken it all the time; and then I want the paper to send to some of my needy friends who are not over-stocked with truthful or Liberal reading matter; so please send on the paper and the book as soon as it is printed. Please say in your next issue when or about when we can expect the book. I will say to Mr. Bennett, Take a good look all around the world, and tell us where the best part of it is, for I want to go and liv there. I hav no fears about getting in a good part of the next world. It is only this one that bothers me. With best wishes for Mr. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER outfit, I am sincerely your friend and brother for truth and liberty,
B. W. COOK.

BANGOR, ME., March 8, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Please add one more "V" to the Round-the-World fund. Many thanks for the extended opportunity, otherwise my name would not hav been added to the starry list. The question is whether those that come in at the eleventh hour are entitled to the same blessing as those that come first. In this case I claim that we are, for it is said the last sent is to bring Mr. Bennett home. If that is the case, we are as worthy (if not more so) as the first, for we certainly cannot afford to send Mr. Bennett to the Holy Land and leave him there, as we hav a great work for him to do here yet. We cannot part with a man that kicked and struggled as he did to get out of the Jordan. If he had been a Christian no doubt he would hav gone to the bottom, but Yahweh didn't want an old Infidel drowned in that sacred water; neither did we. I don't think Mr. Bennett was made to be drowned, and I hope not to die in a Christian penitentiary. I hope that he will liv a long time yet to hunt out and expose Christian bigotry. They feel their props giving way under them, and that is what makes them so mad. The work has commenced, and they cannot stop it. May the leaven work until it leavens the whole world.

Mr. Bennett's letters are so very plain and interesting it is almost like taking the trip oneself to read them. He says that he could not find a sign of Mrs. Lot. For my part, I am glad the old lady has melted away, because, if he had found her, he would hav been just risky enough to hav snatched the old lady to pieces to bring to his many curious friends, and he might get himself into a fuss. It would hardly pay to run a great risk just for a little salt when it is so plenty and cheap at home. May Mr. Bennett be blessed, as he has been, with good health and return to his family and friends, is the wish of a friend and truth seeker, SARA E. GOULD.

BURR OAK, MICH., Feb. 6, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: I hope I may not trespass too much in asking room in your crowded columns for this notice of another grand, good meeting of our Liberal League, No. 167, held last evening.

Just one week from our Paine celebration we had the gratification of listening to a powerful lecture two hours in length, delivered by H. L. Green, who late on the day previous, and unexpected to all, got among us. It was immediately decided that he should speak at our place of meeting, he agreeing to take his chances for an audience on so short a notice.

Getting into the carriage himself with Mr. M. P. Thurston, and taking a two or three hours' ride among the Liberals of this vicinity on Saturday, he was rewarded for said ride by being introduced on Sunday evening by President E. E. Campany to what is here considered a large audience, who frequently and vociferously applauded him, as in a plain and candid manner he showed the absurdity and inconsistency of the foolish stories contained in the Bible. The manner in which he handled that book proved that he has devoted a great deal of time to its study, and that he is now making a good use of the time so spent in nobly striving to free his fellow-man from the superstitions of the past, no fair-minded person can, I think, deny. His few short stories by way of illustration, together with the terminating results of his many conversations held with persons of intellectual ability and high social standing in life, breathed a hope that brighter days and a happier future await the human race, a future when man's noblest and highest aim in life shall be to endeavor to make his fellow-creatures happy, to strive to make his heaven on earth, and to liv for the good he can do, cherishing no hopes of eternal happiness nor fears of endless suffering in a life which he does not or cannot know anything about; a future, however, if ever to bless mankind, will be won through the never-ceasing exertions in that direction of the Freethinkers of the world, among whom the name of H. L. Green will ever be associated; and were I to venture a word of cheer to him who is thus fearlessly pleading the cause of human liberty, I would say this: Pursue the course you are now taking; let your light continue to shine. It cannot fail to penetrate the murky clouds formed by the erroneous teachings of Christianity that now shut out the sunlight of truth and reason from many a brilliant mind that will not, like the heroic and eloquent George Chainey, shake off the fetters of church and creed and boldly grasp the glittering gems of Freethought and free speech that are ever to be seen dancing on the sparkling waves of that beauteous sea of life over which the mind of man, untrammeled, proudly takes its onward course. S. K. THURSTON.

SHELBY, MICH., Feb. 27, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find the pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1882, and I am very glad to think I can help even that much to keep our iconoclast up. I am not going to praise the paper any more, for I hav come to look on the ship as only doing its duty, and who but a hypocrit wants to be fed constantly on "taffy" for doing honest duty? When the battles were being fought, then words of encouragement and cheer were all proper and in place. Aggression and enterprise are the rule now, but hard work, patience, and telling blows of self-defense were the rule then.

H. L. Green has been with us, and now you ought to see and hear the venom and spite and the squirming and hateful looks of that old serpent, Christianity. If we were not so poor Mr. Green should giv us a series of lectures at least three times a year. I must giv him the credit of being the pioneer in our section, and I hav only the following fault to find: He preaches the religion of humanity radically, and thinks and talks it that the proper thing to do with Guiteau is to hang him. I may hav a wrong idea of the religion of humanity, but it seems to me to make that kind of use of the assassin savors strongly of Christian revenge and Roman Catholic propagandism, and it certainly is no rule for Freethinkers and evolutionary reformers to follow, and Green knows it, and for the life of me I can't tell why he does it unless it be to keep on the good side of that rotten old organization called the Republican party, or its more corrupt congener, the Democratic party; but I and a lady friend of mine with whom he is acquainted are the only ones who find fault with him in this part for his humanitarian views. The end and aim of punishment are restraint and reform; when it does more than this it looks as though old Uncle William's God had been around with his ancient free and accepted wooden mold-board doing a job that he would repent of as usual. But what is the use of my finding fault here when the balance of his audience, with one exception, applauded? The only regret I hav is that I could not, on account of poverty, pay Mr. Green five times as much as I did, and I thank him sincerely for the assistance he has rendered me, for I am the only dyed-in-the-wool Materialist there is in this county, and I want him to understand that tha latch-string is always out when he comes round, and so long as he is the same H. L. Green that I hav met he is welcome, and I will divide my last crust with him. JOHN M. LOGAN, M.D.

DEERSHILL, OHIO, Feb. 8, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Being furnished at different times by some kind friend with copies of your very excellent and truthful paper, I am constrained to write to you and giv you my experience with Christianity. I will be sixty-six years old April 15, 1882, if I liv till then When eighteen years of age, I joined the Presbyterian church in good faith, and tried to liv accordingly, but was meanly treated and withdrew; but being very anxious about my soul's salvation, I joined the Methodist church, and was disappointed worse than before. Not willing to giv it up—being in dead earnest—I went to the Disciples church, and was immersed, and tried hard to find the road to heaven, but got in the woods worse than ever, and am truly sorry to say that a meaner set of scoundrels I never got among than the whole three were; all they wanted was my money, and I found that out, so I left them. I believed in the atonement and all the orthodox dogmas extant, being so taught in infancy; but common sense and due reflection, properly exercised for about fifteen years past, tells me there is but one God, and no more, and God is the universe, nature, and immutable laws. I therefore came to the conclusion that I knew nothing about this world before I came into it, and am just as ignorant of the future until I get there. So I am willing to trust to the same power or being, be it what it may, to take me out of this world, and place me wherever it seemeth good. At the same time I shall do all I can for the comfort of the whole human race, while here, in every way. I am a Deist in every sense of the word. I believe in no crucified gods, not one in the whole sixteen I read about. The fall of Adam and Eve is the grandest theological lie ever told for the benefit of priests and parsons, to enable them to liv in ease and luxury, and gratify their appetites at the expense of ignorant fools, of which I was once one in blind and good faith. But now I see clearer, thank God. I find by history that Christianity has spilt more blood than would float the navies of the world, and spent more money than would make a paradise of this earth, and giv a pleasant home to every soul on it. It is truly strange that the watchmen on the walls of Zion will resort to falsehood to establish their false doctrins, but they get their warrant from the Bible, and even Paul confesses that he lied unto God's glory. My experience of sixty-five years teaches me that Christians of a later day are by no means slow in following Paul's example. ALEXANDER AULD.

MR. EDITOR: There is a debate to be held here in Lenape hall, March 11th, 17th, and 18th, between B. F. Underwood and Rev. A. R. Horne, on the general falsity of the Bible. We anticipate a lively debate, as the Christians hav trotted out one of their heaviest guns. Some of the clergy are already trying to persaude the holy man not to argue the question, as no good can come out of it. They may not be able to convince him of that fact, but Mr. Underwood, we think, will. Respectfully, A. J. READING.

CAMPTOWN, PA., Mar. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Reason, liberty, and love are the triune god of humanity. They are the sweet germs from which grow all the joys of our higher nature.

The pure spring of mental liberty on this continent first broke forth from the mountain head and heart of Thomas Paine, and became the source of that great river which is a well-spring of gladness flowing ever from one heart to another, and will continue to flow until it becomes a boundless ocean which shall roll in multiplying waves, and yet kiss the farthest shores of humanity.

Orthodox belief is a cage in which the mind is dwarfed and imprisoned, and nature's choicest gift, the love of humanity, totally annihilated. Oh, those four words, "the love of humanity," how full of the deep, rich music of the heart, that forever must remain unexplained, except to those who from experience hav had them engraved on the tablet of their heart by the burning fire of true love! Those who hav had that experience know how utterly impossible it is to aspire to a higher ideal of happiness in this life than the love of humanity. It is a crystal fountain of never-failing joy, and from this fountain flows a purling stream of the milk of human kindness, broadening in its onward way, and coming out into the full light of reason's lamp, it is wooed by that wondrous orb until it rises in a vapor, and, falling in refreshing showers, reflects to us the rainbow of science—the joyful promis and declaration that the deluge of superstition is fast receding from the face of the earth, the tops of the mountains appear, the valleys will soon be reached, and then the voice of every nation will be raised in honor and thanksgiving to the only god, which is reason, and the great high-priest, which is common sense.

It is this that we regain when we declare our minds free to soar in that unlimited space of thought defined by these two words, "mental liberty." It is the long-lost savior of mankind that has been sacrificed and crucified thousands of times by believers in the mythical dogmas of the church.

How narrow must be the views of one who can see all that is good and beautiful in their church and creed! That church and creed must disappear before reason and science, like dew before the summer sun, it is self evident, is a matter of time. Then, Liberal friends, let us tire not in holding the lamp of reason; for her light shall dispel the darkness of superstition, where the densest undergrowth now prevails, sapping the nourishment from the stately trees of liberty and love. MISS FLORA A. PATTON.

SOUTH ACWORTH, N. H., Mar. 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me, as a reader of your valuable paper, to contribute to the correspondents' department of your columns a few thoughts that hav occurred to me in the last few weeks. I would suggest that Liberals, when speaking of "gospel shops" hereafter, call them "Guiteau mills," as it is very evident that if there were no churches, Bibles, or priests, there would be no Guiteaus, Freemans, or Sylvesters. Three-quarters of the inmates of our insane asylums are made insane by the Bible and the doctrin of the bloody sacrifice taught by the Christian church. Ninety-nine out of every one hundred murderers are believers in the all-atoning blood of blessed Jesus. Indeed, I think it strange that there are not more Christian murderers in the world, considering the lessons of blood they hav learned from their God-book. Then the Christian eats his God and drinks his blood. Perhaps the taste of blood has the same effect on them that it has on a tiger, for nearly all religious fanatics (cranks) want blood. Whatever is most innocent and helpless is most acceptable to his God for sacrifice. Hence the religious fanatic instinctivly turns to his sleeping child, butcher-knife in hand, as a fitting sacrifice to his God; and, if he has no child, he proceeds to sacrifice some other person, by stabbing him in the back, or roasting him to death over a slow fire. If Christians would read the Bible as Liberals do, to see what it really contains, I think they would get disgusted with it and its God. I don't see how any person of sound mind can believe in any such God.

I am glad to see that Mr. Bennett's health remains good. I wish I could contribute a "V" for the Round-the-World trip, but cannot at present. I can only hope that he may complete his journey and return home safe and well, and then make a tour of the United States. I should consider it a greater honor to take him by the hand than U. S. Grant, or any other man that I know of. Hoping that Brother Bennett may liv to eat the chicken that scratches over Comstock's grave—if it don't kill the chick—I remain, Yours truly, J. A. ALLAN, JR.

MAYFIELD, KY., Feb. 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I pen you a few lines in favor of the good old TRUTH SEEKER. I read Mr. Bennett's letters, and they are very interesting, he givs such fine descriptions of towns, etc. I liv in a great Christian community, and glory in having sent our preacher around this enormous globe called the earth. May God help our man on his journey, and see him safe at home at the old TRUTH SEEKER office, well and sound. We go to church and hear them brawl and squall around worse than heathens. Talk about preaching to the heathen! The heathen should preach to them and teach them some manners and how to behave. I hav been talking to some of my friends, and trying to induce them to send in their "V's," but they are slow in doing so. Good luck to D. M. B. Yours faithfully, C. H. MORRIS.

BRAIDWOOD, ILL., March 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The Cincinnati Star has rehashed an old story, told some forty or fifty years ago, in its account of the lightning affair, given in your issue of February 18th, entitled "Struck Dead." It was then thought very fishy by many. The only difference I now recognize in it is its location. It happened first in New York.

There hav been several good things put before the Liberals lately, among which that orphan asylum shines with luster; a monument to Paine is beautiful, a palace car to meet Bennett is splendid, and a history of the Revolutionary war, written in truth, with Paine's name in it, is no more than justice. I will hav one if written.

And now I want my say, I hav just five dollars to put in a female college so supported that poor girls can get a good education free, and in which anatomy, physiology, and hygiene shall be the principal branches taught. I can giv many reasons for the above which I now omit. FERRIS BURR.

FARLEY, IOWA, Feb. 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: With this mail I send you some papers with marked articles, not asking you to print them, but to show you in what direction the Western press is drifting. Every day we find articles which would not hav been admitted five years ago. The majority of Western editors are Liberal in their religion, if not right-down Infidels. We hav but little trouble about getting any article published if it is impersonal and in decent language. The popular mode among our editors seems to be to first say a few bad words about Bob. Ingersoll and then publish his speeches or extracts from them. This smooths it up with the Christians, and it givs countless thousands a chance to read the great Infidel's writings and sayings and then judge for themselvs. There is no doubt that Infidelity is rapidly increasing in the Western states. We can see a marked change here in the last five years. Railroad men, traveling salesmen, doctors, lawyers, and a very large proportion of mechanics are Materialists almost to a man. We hav every cause to rejoice at the progress of our cause, and every Liberal should do something toward pushing the war with superstition to a successful ending.

H. GILMORE.

TOLEDO, OHIO, March 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: What awful examples are being daily exhibited by Christians in the sight and hearing of us poor sinners! Each day we see a goodly share of the daily newspapers filled with church quarrels and fearful frauds culminating among the self-styled models of perfection, who stand in the sanctuaries of the Christian tabernacles and expound the contents of that old book called the Bible full of history of crime and criminals, whom we are called upon to consider sacred characters, and suitable specimens for us to revere, and fall down and worship. And as a result of such a course we are compelled continually to read of and witness such disgraceful scenes as the existing quarrel in Holland, Michigan, among the Dutch Christians in the secession of the radical ring of that clique of candidates for heaven's high honors, they having kicked out the Masonic portion of their picked party. Well, we poor Infidels should not censure them for such a course, for are they not carrying out practically the principle promulgated by their Holy Bible, and the miserable foolishness of Milton's "War in Heaven?" We should not interfere, but let the Kilkennys kill each other. It must be all right when Mr. Powers, the people's preacher in Congress, opens the proceedings in Congress, on the memorial occasion, in referring to the awful outrage of their distinguished member of the Y. M. C. A., Guiteau, by saying, "O Lord, we thank thee for this occasion."

M. O. WAGGONER.

SARANAC, Feb. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Miss Bowen, who climbed to the top of the meeting-house steeple and hurrahed for Ingersoll last fall, received a set of gold bracelets worth $50 as a Christmas present from Bob, and the Christians around here feel awful bad about it, and I presume that they wish that hurrahing for God paid as well as hurrahing for Bob.

I attended a meeting last evening, and the burthen of the discourse was the decrease of interest in religion as preached twenty-five years ago. The preacher was an old war-horse of the last decade, and he has discovered the weapons he then used are out of date and are worthless except as souvenirs of the barbaric past, hence his groanings. God does not seem to use the same means now that he used to, and the prayers of the Home Missionary Society that God should remove your correspondent by death seems to hav no affect upon him at all, or he has no time to attend to the matter as yet, as it is only eight or nine months since they asked him to make such removal. Well, let them pray on; yes, and pray to their God to murder a fellow-being because he advocates a better religion than they do, and in the mean time I will try to enlighten the people and show them that faith in man and not in God, gods, ghosts, or devils is the faith that will lead to happiness here and hereafter, if there is a hereafter.

With kindest regards for THE TRUTH SEEKER and its champions, I am yours for right, truth, and justice in all things, giving to all what I ask for myself, freedom of thought, C. L. FROST.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA., Jan. 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am anxious to do what I can to aid in the circulation of your valuable paper. The letters of Mr. Bennett are attracting much attention, and are read with deep interest by the people. Inclosed I send you $1.50 in payment for THE TRUTH SEEKER for Mr. Jonathan Garbes. He wants the subscription to commence with the letters of Mr. Bennett if possible, and he promises to aid us in the circulation of the paper. JAMES HUTCHINSON.

BRANDON, MANITOBA, Feb. 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry that I hav been so negligent in forwarding my subscription to your noble paper, but the truth is that I hav had so much trouble of late that I could not attend to anything, having lost my dear wife and a loving child with that fell disease, typhoid fever. Being left alone amongst comparativ strangers to me in this great Northwest, my only consolation at present is in reading the columns of your noble paper.

This is a great country in the very sense of the term, where fortunes are being made rapidly in real estate. Lots are being sold here at fabulous prices, and those men who were shrewd enough to invest when first put on the market are now rich. Towns are springing up as the railway proceeds westward, and there is a general rush for lots.

This is the most orthodox country I ever put my foot in, the church being crowded every Sunday, showing that people do not think for themselvs. I hav met some fine Liberal men here, and and among them William Winters, who showed me the greatest kindness possible in my sad bereavement. He is a stanch Liberal and an original thinker, and I hav great pleasure in introducing him to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav done all I could to circulate copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER on the Pacific coast and here, in order to spread the truth among the people, and hope ere long to be able to report a better state of the Liberal cause in the Northwest than at present.

Inclosed find $3—$5 on account of THE TRUTH SEEKER for myself, and $3 for Mr. Winter.

Yours for mental liberty, D. M. MCMILLAN.

ADRIAN, MICH., March 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER I noticed a little article written by S. P. Heinekin in the Franklin, Ind., Jeffersonian. He relates a story that he got from a friend of his in Wisconsin, who, it seems, was acquainted with a man by the name of Robert Ingersoll. Then he goes on to tell us that this Bob (as he calls him) took it into his head to pay a visit to Henry Slade, the celebrated slate-writing medium, and that on that occasion he had such a test of slate-writing as to about convince him of the truth of Spiritualism.

Now, Mr. Editor, if the writer of this article means our Infidel (as the church calls him) scientist, Robert G Ingersoll, I should like to know, through our ever open TRUTH SEEKER, how much truth there is in it from Robert G. Ingersoll himself, and I know there are many other truth seekers, as well as myself, that would like to know the facts in the case. Will Mr. Ingersoll please rise and explain? and oblige

MANY TRUTH SEEKERS.

Words of Wisdom from Goethe.

THE VOCATION OF MAN.

Noble be man,
Friendly and good,
For goodness alone
Stamps him diverse
From all the creatures
That walk the earth.

Hail to the unknown
Mightier beings
Whom we anticipated
What in the human
Typed we behold
Leads to a faith
In the primal Divine.

For Nature knows
No feeling for man
The sun doth shine
On the bad and the good;
On fair and on foul
With indifferent eye
Look moon and stars.

Wind and water,
Thunder and hail,
Rush on their path,
And with hasty clutch
They seize as they pass
This one and that.

Even so Fortune
Blindly seizes
Now the light locks
Of innocent boyhood,
Now the bald crown
Of the hoary offender.
Bound by eternal
All-embracing,
Iron decrees,
We must accomplish
Each man his fated
Circle of being.

But in the human Range of his action
Man, like a god,
May achieve the impossible;
He distinguishes,
Chooses, and judges,
And gives to the moment
The stamp of endurance.

He alone
Rewardeth the good,
Chastiseth the bad,
And all extravagant
Random endeavors
Binds with the bond
Of a common design.

And we wisely
Adore the immortals,
Deemed them brothered
With what is most human,
In the great cosmos,
Willing and working
What in their small lives
Men may achieve.

The noble man
Be friendly and good,
Shaping unwearied,
The useful, the right,
Planting before us
A sensible type
Of those beings unseen
Whom by faith we divine!

"The Crisis."

BY C. FANNIE ALLYN.

Hear the cry of Reason ringing like a resurrection call,
"Up and help" the cause of Freedom, men and women, one and all,
Till Superstition's phantoms like wither'd branches fall,
As Truth goes marching on.

Let the "summer soldier" falter, and the "sunshine patriot" die,
"They who stand it now deserve the thanks" of millions by and by,
As the golden Sun of Science lifts her holy light on high,
And Truth goes marching on.

"Let not blood of children crying, curse our cowardice" to-day,
"The harder comes the conflict, more glorious triumph's way,"
"Ye that dare oppose the tyrant and the tyranny," obey
The truth that's marching on.

"'Tis the business of the little minds to shrink" at custom's frown,
"The heart that feels not now is dead" to Truth's divine renown;
"The times hath found us" asking for Humanity's fair crown,
As Truth goes marching on.

We'll part in peace, "maintaining an independent mind,"
Our "Bible in the Heavens and Earth" we'll dare to seek and find,
Our "duty to our fellow-man," and the "Rights of all mankind"
The Truth that leads us on.

The Burden of Life.

BY ALHAZA.

What, a burden? The burden of love?
You labor, both early and late,
And stooping beneath a rich treasure,
You pass through a beautiful gate,
With no gentle footsteps to meet you,
No smile of affection to greet you,
You lack the sweet burden of love.

I thought my poor heart-strings would break;
I own that he did not speak mildly;
His words are a stream that runs wildly,
And bitter the drops in love's chalice,
I drank of the cup for his sake.
No thought hav the breezes of malice,
Though shuddering farewells they take.
There is something so shining about him,
And a spell that I cannot dissolve
Has forged the sweet chains I am wearing.
To break them, if I should resolve,
What could there be joyous without him?
To lose his deep musical tone,
All the beauty of earth would be gone!

THE BRAIN AND THE BIBLE; or, The Conflict Between Mental Science and Theology. By Edgar C. Beall. With a Preface by Robert G. Ingersoll. Price $1.50. Sold by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street.

This is a good book. It teaches the value of mental science, and shows conclusivly that this science leads to the religion of Humanity, and is wholly inconsistent with any form of Bible theology. It is a fearless book. The author is a man of sincerity and undaunted courage. He tackles the whole army of ghosts, ancient and modern, and makes fearful slaughter of them.

How can ghosts and ghostly leaders stand before him? He cuts the ground entirely from under them by showing that we hav in mental phenomena and mental science a complete explanation of them. When science really explodes our illusion, what fools we are to pretend that we will keep on believing it, just as though nothing had happened! Does mental science explain theology, ghostology, and Spiritism? Experts in that science, from Maudsley to our author in this book, so assure us. We assert that it is the bounden duty of every person, before making up his or her mind on this subject, to find out what modern mental science or the science of psychology does teach on this subject. How foolish it would be for people to say that the Ptolemaic astronomy was the oldest and most generally believed, and most satisfactory, and therefore they would not look into the modern astronomical heresy of Copernicus, Bruno, and Galileo! Yet that is just what thousands of people persist year after year in doing about the brain, the mind, and the emotions of man, and also his mental illusions.

This book approaches the subject from the right side—that is, from the side of the physiology of the brain and nervous system. It begins with the truth that lies at the base of phrenology under the hands of Gall, Combe, and also of Auguste Comte. From thence the author shows what the capacities, knowledge, and hopes of man really are. He shows that superstitions, including Christianity, were forced upon man in his infancy and ignorance by a nature that he could not understand. But now it is the glory of man to rise above these natural terrors by science, and that the greatest aid in so doing is mental science. This is a hopeful book. For the author is not afraid of the results. He sees the defects of Liberalism in its infancy and in its disorganized forms. Yet in that he sees the hope of the world. We earnestly recommend his hopeful and reconciliativ view to those Liberals who are so bigoted that they cannot see that all Liberals are parts of one grand army lying helpless because of the narrow-mindedness and pride that keep them from co-operating under one general League. He says (pp. 226–228):

"American Liberals hav even been accused of wishing to encourage the dissemination of obscene literature. The sea has bounds, but the slough from which superstition draws its missils seems to have none. This most unkind thrust has been dealt in consequence simply of certain perhaps overzealous, though honest, efforts to avert the evils and abuses growing out of a legislativ system [Comstockism] which is believed by many to be unconstitutional, and likely to pave the way for a restriction of the purest literature of Infidelity. Our leaders, foreseeing the difficulties in the way of adjusting anything so intricate, hav, it is true, advocated somewhat different and conflicting schemes in regard to this matter, but they hav disagreed only as to the most legal policy to be pursued for the protection of the legitimate literature of Freethought. And the idea that any class of representativ Liberals are in favor of promoting licentiousness, is simply absurd. Indeed, one reason why we oppose the Bible is because it contains numerous passages totally unfit to be read by any man or woman, much less a child; expressions and narrativs extremely coarse, without the merit of teaching any profitable lesson. And yet this vulgarity is said to be the Holy Word of an omnipresent, omniscient, and omnipotent God!"

We beg leave to ask the candid attention of all Liberals to this candid statement of their position. That is the first step toward mutual understanding and harmony. It is only by such appreciativ views of each other's motivs that the Liberal cause can be served and furthered. We thank our author for his noble words in this behalf, and we hope that they will bear fruit. For it is only by the union of all Liberal hearts and hands that the grand object of the author and his work can be achieved, which we could not state so well as in his own concluding words (pp. 262, 263):

"Properly defined, religion means simply the bond between man and the highest object which he can love, and toward which he can feel a sense of duty sufficiently strong to disciplin all his faculties, and prescribe to him a rule of life. Hence, it is right that in this sense we should hav a religion. But instead of the God of the Bible as the chief object of our consideration, we would devote our efforts to our fellow-men, and make the sense of our obligation to them, if not to ourselvs, curb every tendency to evil. Those who could be insensible to such a religion as this, would be callous to every thing good in the religion of Christ. There can be no really lofty motiv in worshiping a conditionless, infinit being of whom we can form no clear conception, or at lest whom we could neither benefit nor injure. But we can add to the happiness of mankind, and in so doing we exercise all our highest and noblest powers. This, then, is our substitute. Instead of God, we would liv and labor for mankind. Instead of Christianity, the Religion of Humanity."

THE GODLY WOMEN OF THE BIBLE.

I hav just arisen from a reperusal of this book, and must say had I daughters I should not want them to pattern after those saintesses there described, for well I know that a faithful portraiture has been drawn of those ancient goddesses set up for us modern sinful women to follow. From my very childhood, yea, babyhood, I hav wondered and wondered how Sarah could be called "good" when she lied to please her husband, and put herself in the power of a foreign king, to say nothing of the sacrifice of the virtue of her maid, Hagar, that priceless boon, that I was early taught I must not relinquish but with my life.

And then the lying Rebecca, described by the men of God as the very acme of beauty, sweetness, modesty, and chastity—"at the well"—I could never reconcile the inconsistency! But time would fail me should I mention Lot's amiable daughters, Leah and Rachel, Tamar, "Rahab the harlot," Naomi and Ruth, Hannah, Michal, Abigail, Bathsheba, Abishag, Elijah's and Elisha's women, Queen Esther and Hosea's prostitutes, and numerous other women of the Old Testament. The "mother of God" (Mary) in the New, along with all that tribe of holy of holies, who administered to Jesus Christ, and who were ministered unto by him, that the Ungodly Woman has delineated as being anything but models for us women of the nineteenth century to follow. Yea, were these godly ladies to lead such lives to-day in Massachusetts or New York, the laws would consign nine-tenths of them to the penitentiary or the gallows. And yet, how dead to this fact are the women, the mothers, of the present! They permit their dear little susceptible girls to attend Sunday-school, where they are taught to reverence these vile women of the Bible as holy, and as examples for their imitation, the preachers, the majority of lecturers, the religious, and even secular literature, aiding and abetting in this nefarious work! But these women and mothers are ignorant of the true character of these ancient women when viewed in the light of this age of reason and morality; therefore we hail this book as a necessity to them, especially for their children's sake, and to woman universally, that she may learn the true nature of Bible teachings in regard to her sex and its ruinous effects on man also. We wish this book was in the hands of every woman in the land, for in revealing to her the immorality of the Bible God and the Bible writers it exposes the animus of God's word, and will in time destroy her belief in and reverence for such a mass of filthy lies, inconsistencies, dogmas, and barbarous laws against her own sex, thereby rendering her oblivious to her true demands, and enabling priestcraft to fasten more secure upon her the false conceptions of Christianity, causing her to believe that only in the perpetuity of the doctrins of that accursed book can civilization be secured, the arts and sciences flourish, morality and good order be maintained, and a millennium of peace on earth and everlasting bliss in another world attained. Woman as a voter, unless unbound from the creedal chain of these dogmas, would put God in the United States Constitution, the pope or clergy at the head of the nation, and inaugurate a reign of superstition and terror second to no era in the world's history.

For these reasons we welcome the "Godly Women of the Bible," trusting many will purchase, read, ponder, and act, never for one moment fearing that it is indelicate for them to examin outside of the word of God what is sacred inside, and is affirmed was placed there as infallible history for the world's instruction, example, and salvation for all coming time.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. A poem. By Samuel P. Putnam. Price, 10 cents. For sale by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth st., New York.

I hav just read our good friend Putnam's poem, "Ingersoll and Jesus," and I think we shall do a good work if we buy half a dozen or so of them each one of us, and scatter them among our pious neighbors. The title will insure the reading of them, and no one can fail, as they read, to see that the two men if they would really meet now would agree in sentiment as fully as Mr. Putnam dreamed they did. Robert would say, "So would I," and Jesus would exclaim, "That is so," and for once a dream would be realized in all its fulness.

I hav never missed reading and appreciating anything I see from Mr. Putnam's pen since I fell in love with his "Gottlieb's" heaven and his "Prometheus." His "Golden Throne," in Chainey's This World, is growing intensely interesting. We should all encourage such good writers by buying their books. ELMINA.

WHAT MYRON HOLLY DID FOR LIBERTY. By Elizur Wright Price, $1.50. For sale by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, New York.

One more good book written by one good man about another good man comes as a new claimant upon our affections.

"What Myron Holly Did for Liberty" is well worth your purchase and perusal. It is a pleasantly written biographical sketch of a good, true, honest, and conscientious man—a man who had few equals as citizen, father, husband, or friend—a man who was far-seeing, and generally correct seeing and able to do.

His whole life was one great work for humanity, and one of his latest utterances was, "I never deceived anybody in my life." His work for the emancipation of the slaves was equaled by that of few and excelled by none. To read this book is to virtually liv again that long struggle for the right.

He also bent his powerful energies to oppose the despotism of the Masonic fraternity, and during the little excitement of the Morgan murder he was an untiring worker for liberty, right, and justice. Only those who knew what Masonry was then, compared with what it is now can realize what Myron Holly did toward breaking the back of the most powerful organization the world has ever known. This is real history, and I hope our good friend Elizur Wright will be kept busy filling orders for the book. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared o step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

which is the doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

Gems of Thought.

It is more blessed to giv than to receive.—Jesus.

Our ideas of God arise from reflecting on ourselvs, contemplating our own intellectual and moral qualities, and ascribing them to an imaginary being beyond the range of the senses, and connecting this being with the operations of nature. And the conceptions of God, I need hardly say, will always correspond with our moral and intellectual development, because, as Schiller expresses it, "man paints himself in his gods;" or, as another German philosopher, Feuerbach, says, "man projects himself into objectivity." "God," says Luther, "is a white sheet of paper which contains nothing save what thou hast written thereon." Jupiter, a brave and amorous Greek, was a projection of the Greek mind. Jehovah was a partial, changeful, vindictiv being, as faithful as though reflected from a mirror.—Underwood's Our Idea of God.

Will anybody venture to affirm that either the church of England or the kirk o' Scotland teaches truth without any mixture of error? Hav there not long been in the church of Scotland two very different schools of theology? During many years, Dr. Robertson, the head of the Moderate party, and Dr. Erskine, the head of the Calvinistic party, preached under the same roof—one in the morning and the other in the evening. They preached two different religions, so different that the followers of Robertson thought the followers of Erskine fanatics, and the followers of Erskine thought the followers of Robertson Arians, or worse. And is there no mixture of error in the doctrin taught by the clergy of the church of England? Is not the whole country at this moment convulsed by disputes as to what the doctrin of the church on some important subjects really is? I shall not take on myself to say who is right and who is wrong. But this I say, with confidence, that whether the tractarians or the evangelicals be in the right, many hundreds of these divines, who every Sunday occupy the pulpits of our churches, must be very much in the wrong.—Macaulay's Speeches.

Popular opinions on subjects not palpable to sense are often true, but seldom or never the whole truth. They are a part of the truth; sometimes a greater, sometimes a small part, but exaggerated, distorted, and disjointed from the truths by which they out to be accompanied and limited. Heretical opinions, on the other hand, are generally some of those suppressed and neglected truths, bursting the bounds which keep them down, and either seeking reconciliation with the truth contained in the common opinion, or fronting it as enemies, and setting themselvs up, with similar exclusivness, as the whole truth. . . . Every opinion which embodies somewhat of the portion of truth which the common opinion omits, ought to be considered precious, with whatever amount of error and confusion that truth may be blended.—Mill's Liberty.

Nothing is meaner than the love of pleasure, the love of gain, and insolence; nothing nobler than magnanimity, meekness, and philanthropy.—Epictatus.

The poet Lucan predicts a time when all laws shall cease, and nations disarm, and all men love one another; and Quinilian teaches that we should "giv heed to a stranger in the name of the universal brotherhood which binds together all men under the common father of nature;" and Seneca says that "we are members of one great body, and born for the good of the whole;" and Juvenal declares that it is "mutual sympathy that distinguishes men from the brutes."—T. W. Higginson.

The consideration and contemplation of nature is a sort of natural food, if we may say so, for our minds and talents. We are elevated by it, we seem to be raised above the earth, we look down on human affairs; and by fixing our thoughts on high heavenly things we despise the affairs of this life, as small and inconsiderable. The mere investigation of things of the greatest importance, which are at the same time, very secret, has a certain pleasure in it. And when anything meets us that appears likely, our minds are filled with pleasure thoroughly worthy of a man.—Cicero's Academic Questions.

I hav learned
To look on nature, not as in the hour
Of thoughtless youth; but hearing often times
The still, sad music of humanity,
Not harsh nor grating, though of ample power
To chasten and subdue. And I hav felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air,
And the blue sky and in the mind of man,
—Wordsworth.

While saying that the Catholic religion is the strongest, safest, most pure, and consistent of all Christian faiths, permit me also to say that for this very reason I would do more to put it down, more to exterminate every vestige of it, more to totally annihilate it, than I would all other systems of Christianity. Kill the parent tree and the branches and buds must die. Destroy the root, and the whole plant will soon wither and decay. The world has no need of any religion, The mere belief in creed, dogma, or church has no reforming or elevating effect upon humanity. A good moral life is a lesson to all who behold it. Whatever is said by Christna, Christ, Paul, or any great and good hero in any book of fiction, or any historical or biographical work that is true, is worthy of your acceptance as a rule of action, let us love, cherish, and remember. But records of bloody wars, cruel persecutions, and childish, peuril, nonsensical pages of old time literature, smirched here and there with foulness and obscenity, should never be called holy, pure, and divine; should never be kept as the best book for family reading or school-room use.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

"Will you tell me," asked an old gentleman of a lady, "what Mrs. ——'s maiden name was?" "Why, her maiden aim was to get married, of course," exclaimed the lady.

A Bible Lesson.—Who was Eli? Eli was a priest of the Lord, without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life; his sons were sons of Belial, and he cured Naaman's leprosy by being fed by a raven forty days and nights in a wilderness, from which he was taken to heaven in a chariot of fire, whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead, world without end. Amen.

Several gentlemen were standing on the corner of Galveston avenue when one of the most fashionable ladies of Galveston passed on the sidewalk.

"Ah!" exclaimed one of the gentlemen, "what a complexion! There is nothing to beat it in Galveston. I am proud of that woman, I am."

"Are you her husband?" asked a stranger.

"No, sir."

"Her father, then?"

"No, sir; I am no relation of her; but I am proud of her complexion. I am the druggist that sold it to her. I make it myself."

THE WAIL OF "THE STREET."

After Tennyson—a Long, Long Way.

Broke, broke, broke,
On thy "longs" and "shorts," Wall street!
I would that my tongue could utter
The wail of my balance sheet!

Oh, well for the rampant "bull"
That tosseth "Northwestern" at bay!
Oh, well for the scheming "bear"
That huggeth "Preferr'd to-day.

And the "margin" sharp goes on
To his mansion on Murray Hill;
But oh, for the clutch of a real greenback!
For the sound of a chink that is still!

Broke, broke, broke,
Or busted! soever it be,
But the saving grace of a played-out share
Will never come back to me!

A surveyor who was running township lines in a new county in Michigan last fall was engaged by a farmer to survey the line between his farm and that of a neighbor. They had a line fence, but had engaged in several disputes as to whether it was on the divide. The surveyor was making preparations when the owner of the other farm approached and inquired:

"What are you going to do now?"

"Find the exact line," was the reply.

At this the man wheeled and went off on a gallop, and he was seen no more until the line was run. The surveyor and the first-named farmer had just completed the work when the other came up to within about ten feet of them and asked:

"Well, hav you got through?"

"Yes; all through."

"And is the fence a foot on his farm?"

"No; he has two feet of yours, and the fence must be moved so that you can hav it."

The man sprang upon a stump, faced a thicket about five rods away, and yelled out:

"You there Reuben and James and Samuel! The survey is made and we are all right! You kin shoulder them shotguns and go back to the sawmill, and if you meet the old woman coming with the pitchfork you kin tell her to turn back and git up a squar' dinner for the surveyor."

"I'm looking for the responsible man of this printshop," snorted a broad-shouldered tramp, edging his way into the managing editor's office. "Show me the high daddy that bumps out the literature for this magazine. Whoop! Giv me room! Where's the he pelican that licks the postage stamps for this periodical? Wah-h! I'm a snortin' alligator of the briny deep. Where's the man that chews soap for this job office?"

"I represent those various functions," repeated the managing editor, drawing a saber out of his ear. "What kind of an advertisment do you want?" and he poured a handful of gunpowder into a hollow tooth and cocked it.

"What do you mean by publishing my name in this yere second-hand almanac? What's your justification for dragging me through this two-shee! poster? Who said I was dead? Who killed me? Who put my name in this prescription label? I'm Jim Currie, of Texas! Hear me? Who's the man that wrote me up as a murderer in this dime-museum program? Giv me his spine! Hand me one of his eyes!" and the stranger danced across the local room and back.

"I'm the man," said the managing editor, slipping a repeating rifle out of his sleeve. "I wrote that article," drawing a handful of dynamite out of a pimple on his nose. "If it isn't satisfactory [taking a keg of gunpowder out of his sock] it can be fixed."

"I want an apology or $4 in cash, and I'll get it, if I burst this type-writer!" yelled Mr. Currie. "Gimme justice or $3.50, or I'll bang the side lights out of this bill-board quicker'n a streak o' lightning 'll scorch an old maid! [I'm the shiverin' walrus of the growing Southwest! Gimme satisfaction or $2.75, or you'll hear this first lesson in easy spellin' whoopin' through space! Wah h—h!"

"You light down the inside of the building," howled the editor, drawing a fourteen-inch bowie knife from his knee-joint, "or I'll crawl inside of you!" and he rammed a twelve-pound cartridge into his elbow. "Jump through the roof or I'll bite you in half and throw the rest away!" and he clawed at twelve or fifteen feet of planking and slammed out the side of the building with it.

"Ain't you going—?"

"Don't you get—!"

"See me—!"

"Get—!"

"Wah-h-h-h!"

And the stranger went out and told his abettors that the thing wouldn't work; the Eagle was all out of money, and couldn't put up for a glass of beer, while the managing editor started on an editorial demonstrating the lack of corporate sympathy for pauper criminas.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.
REPLIES TO THE
"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."
By ALLEN PRINGLE.
This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Vol. 9. No 12. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, March 25, 1882. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

TALMAGE said in his last Sunday's sermon that Christ gets down on one knee and raises us to glory and immortality by a "dead lift."

THE American Bible Society refuses to aid in sending out a certain Burmese Bible because the word "baptize" is translated "immerse."

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher up at High Bridge has scripture texts printed on candy, and in that way is able to induce the rising generation to swallow them.

REV. HENRY GALLAWAY, of North Topeka, Kan., is under arrest for bigamy. Rev. Thos. Ewing, of Leavenworth, Kan., is undergoing trial for bastardy. Rev. B. F. Parlett, a noted revivalist of Alma, Kan., has become insane. Etc.

D. M. BENNETT, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, collided with the oily Joe Cook in India in January, and Joe got the worst of it. It was not a physical contest, however. Joe disseminated a slanderous story among the Indian heathen, and Bennett forced his words down his throat. —Truth.

THE Rev. Justin D. Fulton, of Brooklyn, in speaking last Sunday of John Dwyer, the prize fighter, recently deceased, made the assertion that one of the latter's right-handed cross-counter blows, that knocked his opponent down every time, didn't begin to hav the force of the spirit of God when it struck a man.

Truth, a daily New York paper of pronounced Freethought tendencies, commenting on Talmage's lectures against Ingersoll, declares that "Talmage is a humbug in spite of himself." We beg to disagree. We hav carefully watched the career of the Jabbernacle orator, and we take him to be a very unconscientious and conscious humbug indeed.—London Freethinker.

FOR "repelling the onslaughts on Christianity made by that eloquent but misguided champion of Infidelity, Ingersoll," the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage has been invited by Gov. Jarvis, of North Carolina, all the state officers, and the federal officers in the state, to visit Raleigh. If the people of North Carolina like the kind of a minister Talmage is, he is just the kind of a minister they will like.

THE Rev. Mr. Donehoo, of Pittsburgh, preached in favor of good Sunday newspapers. The religious journals of that city thereupon assailed him, on the ground that he was encouraging Sabbath breakers. An argument used by one of them was that Sunday publications were made with a view to financial profit. "And every religious sheet in this city," the clergyman retorted, "is issued purely and solely for the sake of money-making."

THE Milan, O., Monthly Review says: "We see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that Mr. Bennett, the editor, who is now somewhere in the Holy Land, has concluded that he cannot get the notes of his travels in two volumes, therefore we may expect three volumes, all for five dollars. Those who wish the works, and surely we all ought to hav them, as it is the first history of that country written from a Liberal standpoint, should send in their 'V's' "while there is yet time.'"

LONG after the Reformation Protestant indulgences were granted in England. On the fly leaf of the first volume of the register of Plympton is written: "Whereas I certainly know that the wife of Edmund Parker, of Bovington, in parish of Plympton, is under such a distemper of bodie that she is not fitt to eat any salt flesh or fish whatever, therefore I think fitt, as minister of said parish, to license her to eat flesh during the time of her sickness according to the lawes and statutes of the realme in that behalf. Given under my hand March 4, 1600. Simon, D. C." Another entry, dated two years later, and signed by another clergyman, givs a similar indulgence to John Slanning.

THE action of the Massachusetts legislature in again voting down woman suffrage is taken greatly to heart by the promoters of the movement. The defeated bill was to provide only for the extension of the ballot to women in municipal elections, and its success was quite confidently expected. On the same day an amendment striking the word "male" out of the state Constitution was passed by the Iowa legislature, preparatory to a vote by the people. Wyoming has had woman suffrage twelve years.

AT the meeting presided over by Cardinal Manning at the London Mansion House, for the relief of Russo Jewish refugees, a letter was read inclosing a memorial signed by 1,589 Oxford undergraduates. It said: "We wish publicly to state our belief that it is only by granting to all classes equal rights and privileges before the law, and by frankly laying aside prejudices of race and religion, that the common welfare of Europe can be advanced." Cardinal Manning said that he knew of no more unprecedented or gratifying outburst of feeling from Oxford undergraduates.

THE eccentric evangelists who are carrying on the work of the Salvation Army in Philadelphia announced for Sunday a most remarkable series of exercises. They declare their intention of holding a "Real Hallelujah Spree." This extraordinary service will be led by Shouting Annie from Baltimore; Capt. Pilgrim Charlie, who is heralded as the "Salvation Wonder;" Capt. Joe, the Hallelujah Carpenter and Glory Milt, the Hallelujah Drummer. Part of the performance will be a "Knee Drill" by the "Blood and Fire Brigade." Following on this will be "sharpshooting by the soldiers." From such announcements it might be expected that something would be said or done well worth hearing or seeing by those who are fond of sensation. Instead of this, the speeches are generally as vapid as can be. They consist in the relating of the experience of the Salvationists and in loud and wordy exhortations which are of no particular account.

WINWOOD READE, in his "Savage Africa." reports the following as actually uttered from a pulpit by a Sierra Leone negro: "My breddren, you see white man bad too much, ugly too much, no good. You want sabby how man like dat come to lib in the world. Well, I tell you. Adam and Eve, dey colored people, very handsome; lib in one beautiful garden. Dare dey hab all tings dat be good. Plantains, yams, sweet pototoes, palm wine, too much! Den dey hab two children, Cain and Abel. Cain no like Abel's palaver; one day he kill 'im. Den God angry, and he say, 'Cain.' Cain go hide himself; he tink him berry cleber. God say again, 'Cain, you tink I no see you, you bush nigga-eh?' Den Cain come out, and he say, 'Yes, massa, I lib here—what de matter, massa?' Den God say in one big voice like de tunder in de sky, 'Where 'm broder Abel?' Den Cain turned white all over with fear. Dat de first white man, bred-ren."

EVANGELIST HAMMOND wanted to show the children of Memphis, Tenn., how Satan goes about "as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour." In order to do this effectually he got down on his hands and knees on the pulpit platform and executed motions like those of a quadruped. One of the religious papers of that region criticises Mr. Hammond severely for this infraction of the ordinary rules of pulpit gesture. It is the more severe in its criticism because of the noise made by Mr. Hammond in simulating the roar of the terrific creature. This is regarded as not a correct representation of the noise made by the king of beasts. As to the roar or other noise made by old Satan himself, the critics had never heard it; yet they suspect that Mr. Hammond has not rendered it with accuracy. Mr. Hammond has of late years become very portly, so that he cannot with ease go through the motions incident to the portrayal of the habits of a personal devil. This fact lays him open to all the more pungent criticism when he attempts to do that in which a lithe and athletic evangelist might reasonably hope for better success.

COMMENTING upon the result of his third election, Mr. Bradlaugh says: "Once more my constituents hav indorsed my actions, and renewed to me their expression of confidence. Now the struggle is more grave, more serious than ever. The House of Commons, by a large majority in a very full House, has again decided that it will not permit the law to be obeyed. So far as one man may, I intend to contest that decision. Those who voted in the majority knew that the courts of law were powerless to enforce the law against the privileges of Parliament. The House of Commons while breaking the law, has at its service against me the police, whose duty should be to arrest law-breakers. My duty is to take my seat. I shall try to perform that duty. The House of Commons, by sheer force and brute violence, last year prevented me from taking my seat, and inflicted on me serious bodily injury in so preventing me. Conservativ members of the House of Commons of high rank hav actually expressed the shameful hope that the disgraceful scene of August 3d might be repeated. In all this the House of Commons has not only acted illegally; it has also acted dishonorably. If it meant me not to sit it should hav taken away my right to sit, and thus hav relieved me from the duty. It leaves me the empty title to the seat; it leaves me with the duty to take that seat; but it deprives me of speech and vote, and by force hinders me from doing my duty. Possibly the majority in the House of Commons hoped, by means of this virtual disfranchisment, to make my constituents so discontented and dissatisfied with me that I should fall into disfavor in Northampton. But my constituents are generous with me, and are determined not to visit on me the gross wrong done to them by the House of Commons. They bid me hold and take the seat they hav given me, and I will try to do so."

A FRIEND in Canada writes: "I send you the Toronto Globe of March 8th, in which you will find an article on Bradlaugh that I think you will consider worth reproducing. Of course it is not ahead of the doctrins that you so vigorously propound; but it is gratifying to see the same doctrins so firmly held by a paper eminent for prudence and worldly wisdom. The Liberals on your side of the line are, I know, apt to ask, Can any good thing come out of Canada? Let them read the following article, and then judge for themselvs: 'The British House of Commons is making progress steadily but slowly, as is its wont. It has now rejected by a majority of only fifteen the proposal to legislate in favor of permitting affirmation to take the place of the oath when necessary. By the time Bradlaugh has been returned once or twice more by his constituents, it will no doubt hav educated itself up to the point of foregoing its prejudices and acting reasonably. The absurdity of insisting upon the oath, and nothing but the oath, from its members, after the principle of affirmation has been adopted in the courts of justice, is too manifest to be perpetuated. It seems rather hard, though, that the one constituency of Northampton should be put to all the expense and annoyance involved in the education of its honorable members. This case affords a good illustration of the way in which bigotry often overreaches itself, and defeats its own ends. Mr. Bradlaugh's constituents hav returned him, and will no doubt continue to do so as often as necessary, partly because an attempt has been made to persecute him, and partly because Englishmen are too strongly wedded to the principle of religious freedom and full toleration to suffer a representativ to be perpetually excluded from Parliament on account of his religious opinions. Those who voted for his expulsion must hav done so either on personal or on religious grounds, neither of which can be accepted as valid by a people who cherish civil and religious liberty.'"

GREAT exertion is being made to secure the pardon of Sergeant Mason, the soldier who shot at Guiteau. His court-martial trial is said to hav been illegal, a military tribunal being secondary to the civil courts in time of peace. On this plea Mason's council will demand a new trial.

THE Rev. Mr. Hinman, who sued his bishop for slander, will probably succeed in establishing a pretty bad character before the trial is ended. He was sent as a missionary among the Western Indians, and testimony goes to show that his ministrations, especially to females, were not always of a spiritual kind.

A MEETING of the electors of Northampton has approved Mr. Bradlaugh's conduct in the House of Commons, and passed resolutions authorizing the executiv of the Liberal and Radical Union to sign a petition to the House praying that he be heard at the bar in support of their claim of the right to be represented in the House by speech and vote of duly elected members.

RECENT disclosures, and the publication of letters never before made public, put the late President Garfield in the attitude of a traitor toward General Rosecrans, commander of the army of the Cumberland. It seems that even while Garfield was on Rosecrans's staff, and his confidential friend and companion, he was writing letters to state officials, particularly to Chase, secretary of war, calculated to damage his superior officer in their estimation, and which finally secured Rosecrans's dismissal from the service.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

MELCHISEDEC'S SIXTEENTH VISIT.

1. The Venerable Visitor entered the room so quietly, and in every way so imperceptibly, on this occasion that the most acute observer could neither have seen nor heard him; but he was really just as much there as on any of the previous occasions. His salutation was of the usual character, and his manner gentle and peaceful in the extreme. His remarks were in this wise:

2. Well, my friend, thou hast seen more to-day of the wonders of this holy city, and hast presented to thy view more of the claims for miracles and supernatural performances. Those thou hast seen to-day are the invention of the priests of a rival system, but they are no more absurd, no more monstrous, and no more untrue than those presented to thee yesterday and the day before.

3. Of this I see thou art already apprised, and there is little danger of the ridiculous claims of either system making a convert of thee; but, on the other hand, they must disgust thee with the utter want of truthfulness and good sense which prompts men to engage in such disreputable attempts to establish falsehood. It is a sad thing that in men's zeal to bolster up supernaturalism the most barefaced falsehoods are perpetrated.

4. But this is what must be done in all cases when miracles and the claims of supernaturalism are to be passed off as realities; falsehoods have to be used for the purpose, and the thing can be done in no other way. Every time that the supernatural is claimed a falsehood has to be uttered. Truth never requires falsehood to sustain it; fictions and fables always do.

5. The belief in the supernatural is only entertained when nature is not properly understood, and the more thoroughly nature and her laws are studied and known, the less chance there is for the recognition of the supernatural. Supernaturalism, then, is the child of ignorance; and ignorance and superstition are synonymous terms. Nature and naturalism are the great truth of existence, and supernaturalism is the great lie.

6. Supernaturalism has been the work of priests in all the ages of the past. It was priests who first educated the childish mind of primitive man to accept the supernatural, the moving of natures forces by a power superior to itself; and it has been the continuous work of priests. It began, of course, low down in the scale, and has greatly improved as the millenniums have passed by.

7. At one time in man's career every force and operation in nature was believed to be a personal being, or a personal being was believed to rule over it and to manipulate it, and this being was thought to be a bad one; thus devils and demons were accepted by man in his infantile state long before gods were believed in. Every feature and modification of nature's forces that caused pain and discomfort was believed to be the work of a demon or devil, and how to placate these evil beings was man's early study.

8. Thus it can easily be understood that devil-worship is older than god-worship; but as evolution is a great law of nature, this feeling was bound to be modified with the movement of time, and gods gradually came into fashion—or, in other words, the devils evolved into gods, and the bad beings came to be regarded as good beings.

9. This change was not sudden, nor was it full all at once; the devils gradually improved, and by degrees lost their evil character, at first being partly bad and partly good. This was peculiar to no one nation, but common with nearly all nations, and the Jewish people were no exception. Yahweh-worship was at first a species of devil-worship, and the first conception of him was little better than a devil.

10. Neither did he evolve rapidly; he retained his cruel and malicious characteristics for a long time, and, as I showed in my earlier visits, was subject to freaks of anger, temper, and malice. He was also narrow and circumscribed in his partialities, claiming but a small fraction of the human family as his favorites, friends, and family, while the other ninety-nine-hundredths of the world's inhabitants were his enemies, for whom he wished the worst of evils, including destruction and death.

11. It was the character of these devil-gods to be the deadly enemies of all the nations in existence, save the one who accepted them and had created them. They were a part of the time good to their own people, but always inimical and full of hate for all other nations.

12. As men's minds grow, their conceptions of their gods also enlarge; thus it is seen that the small, circumscribed, and narrow Yahweh of the Jews, and who, strangely enough, was adopted by all the Christian nations, has so grown that he seems to regard gentile nations with quite as much favor as his original preference, or first love.

13. And he has also become so much civilized and humanized that his character is much improved. He once delighted to be considered the god of war, of battles, of bloodshed, carnage, fury, and death; the more the human family was made wretched, the better he was pleased; but now he has become so far modified, so far civilized, that he likes to be called a god of peace, of kindness, and of love. He claims, too, to love all nations alike, and to regard the whole human family as his children.

14. This progress of the gods has always been in keeping with the progress of mankind; for it must never be lost sight of that the gods, like the devils, have been the creation of man, and for this reason the gods have improved as man has improved—the gods always following and never leading. As a stream can never rise above its course, so gods can never become superior to their creators.

15. Gods and devils, being the representatives of supernaturalism, are, to the fullest extent, the representatives of falsehood, the indices of the ages of ignorance, the proofs of the crude and imperfect age of the human mind. So long as supernaturalism is accepted by man, so long must he remain in the domain of darkness and falsehood, so long must he be deprived of the volume of truth which is his natural and legitimate heritage.

16. As fast as man learns to understand and accept the truths of nature, so far as he has the intelligence and mental vigor to throw off the shackles and blinding mists of supernaturalism, so rapidly will he advance in the clear light of nature's truths and fully become enlightened by the great sun of perfect intelligence and the great source of life and truth. When man learns to discard supernaturalism he will take the high position which destiny has in store for him, and he will be led on by the spirit of truth to the eminence of perfect knowledge and happiness. As long as man hugs supernaturalism to his bosom, so long will darkness and error surround him, and as soon as he can throw off the incubus of supernaturalism, so soon will he be free, unfettered, and joyous. Naturalism advances civilization and human progress, but supernaturalism retards both.

17. The priests being the authors of supernaturalism, they are also the class who will fight for its continuance. Their trade rests upon the claims of supernaturalism; their pretense is that they have knowledge of the will and desires of the gods; that they possess influence over them; that men need priests as mediators between the gods and themselves, and that it is the ministration of the priests that will save men from the eternal fires that must otherwise everlastingly overwhelm them. Thus the priests are the authors of supernaturalism and its defenders. To this extent they stand in the way of the world's progress, and they must be superseded by the teachers of truth before ignorance and superstition can be banished from the world, and before perfect mental liberty can have full rule.

18. The legitimate inference, then, is that the priesthood are the enemies of the human race instead of its friends. They belong to the past rather than to the present. They clog the wheels of progress instead of helping them forward. Yes, they are the enemies of mankind instead of its friends. Teachers of science and truth will always be necessary; the young and illy-informed will always need instruction; the elements and the lessons of truth will always need to be clearly expounded, but the priesthood, who insist that supernaturalism is a reality and that men must bow down before it, can far better be dispensed with than not.

19. I will now take up the subject considered at my last two visits and recall more of the absurdities and falsehoods contained in the New Testament, especially the fourth gospel attributed to John, though, as a matter of fact, John did not write it, nor was it written till about a hundred years after John had paid the debt of nature and was laid in his grave. I will, however, criticise it all the same, because it is accepted as divine and revealed truth in which can be no error or imperfection.

20. The style of the fourth gospel is wholly different from the first three; it was written by one familiar with the Greek literature and philosophy as well as with the Greek language, while the other three are far more Jewish in character. The fourth gospel is a polemic rather than a narrative, but still it is sufficiently a narrative to show many positive discrepancies and contradictions when compared with the other three.

21. The fourth gospel was written to establish the divinity of Jesus Christ and his identity with the being who was supposed to be the creator of heaven and earth, but still it has nothing to say about Jesus being divinely begotten, nothing about the visit of Yahweh to the virgin, nothing of the wonderful overshadowing business. It would seem that the writer or the fourth gospel was ignorant of all this, or he thought too little of it to deem it worth repeating.

22. Although the fourth gospel omits that remarkable incident, it contains many others not contained in the other three, and to that extent is wholly unlike the others as much as though it was the record of the life of the some other god than Yahweh. Some of these discrepancies and contradictions should be mentioned.

23. The fourth gospel is the only one that conveys the idea that Jesus had an individual existence previous to the time when he was begotten and entered into the world. It is the only one that takes the peculiar position that the son and the father are one and the same person. It is the only one that hints that a being could be his own author or father.

24. The fourth is the only gospel that says that John the Baptist used these words: Behold the lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world; the only one that mentions the incident that Jesus attended a wedding in Cana of Galilee, and on that occasion manufactured a quantity of wine. If it was true that this miracle caused his disciples to believe in him, Matthew, being one of his disciples who believed in him, it is very singular that he had not a word to say of the affair.

25. The fourth is the only gospel that alludes to Nicodemus, to his stealthy visit to Jesus at night, and the enigmatical and metaphysical disquisition of the second birth. It is the only one which gives the conversation between Jesus and the woman of Samaria; the only one which mentions the miracle of healing the impotent man—thirty-eight years an invalid—at the Pool of Bethesda; the only one which gives the astounding information that many of the disciples of Jesus forsook him and walked no more with him.

26. The fourth gospel is the only one that makes any mention of Jesus ever writing a word, though even in the sand, which nobody ever read or was ever benefited by; the only one that intimates that Jesus ever read a word—and that from the Jewish law in the synagogue of Galilee; the only one that mentions that Jesus performed the astonishing miracle of curing a man blind from birth by a mixture of clay and water, which to the medical faculty must stand as an impossibility, and which they will never be able to repeat with the same result.

27. The fourth gospel is the only one that mentions the extraordinary and impossible miracle of raising Lazarus from the dead, and after he had been so long dead that decomposition had set in. If that great event really took place there is no question but what each evangelist would have detailed the account in full. The fact that the fourth is the only gospel that even hints at it, and as that was not written till a century and a half after the miracle was claimed to have been performed, makes it very safe to pronounce it an utter falsehood, especially since it must have been false though each of the gospel writers and a thousand others had protested it was true.

28. The fourth is the only gospel that mentions the close friendship which existed between Jesus and Mary, and her anointing the feet of Jesus; the others have it that it was his head that she anointed; the fourth is the only gospel that mentions that Jesus washed the feet of his disciples, that is the only one that speaks of him, when arrested, as being taken to Annas, the high priest; the only one that makes Pilate to ask Jesus, What is truth? the only one that says the mother of Jesus witnessed his execution; the only one that says a Roman soldier pierced the side of Jesus with a spear.

29. The fourth is the only gospel that mentions Jesus, during his ministry, making five separate visits to Jerusalem, while the others speak of only a single visit; it is the only one that represents his ministry to have lasted for the period of several years, while the others make it but twelve, or at the most only eighteen months. It is impossible to reconcile these contradictions with truth. There is no system of facts or of reasoning that will justify such radical differences.

30. It is the only fourth gospel that mentions Nicodemus's providing a hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes with which to embalm the body of Jesus; the only one to claim that Jesus made repeated appearances to his disciples after his resurrection, and also that he remained with them many days before his ascension; the others represent that his ascension took place immediately, while the writer of the book of Acts says there were forty days between the resurrection and the ascension. Such positive contradictions are most unfortunate, for some of them must necessarily be false, if not all.

31. The fourth gospel differs from the second and the third in mentioning the ascension of Jesus up to heaven. That, it must be admitted, if true, is one of the most important events in the career of Jesus, besides being one of the greatest miracles ever performed. The fact, however, that the first and fourth gospels have not a word upon the subject, proves unmistakably that the writers knew nothing of the claim, or that they did not deem it worthy of mention. It is not at all likely that they believed the legend to be true.

32. The other omissions of the fourth gospel are equally noticeable, and show that the entire story is of the most unreliable character. The fourth gospel mentions very few of the miracles claimed by the other gospels, but, as indicated, has a set of its own. It has nothing of the Sermon on the Mount, which plays so important a part in the first gospel. It says nothing of the parables of Jesus, which are a most important feature in the other gospels. The first gospel gives twelve parables, the second but three, while the third gives sixteen. Such serious discrepancies loudly proclaim the unreliable character of the story. The parables given by the first gospel are unlike those given by the third, and the latter are much the shorter.

33. It is most singular that while the other gospels assert that John was present on the occasion of raising Jarius's daughter, of the transfiguration, of the agony in Gethsemane, etc., the fourth gospel has not a word of either. If the writer was present when those things took place, his narrative is incorrect, as he does not mention them; and if he did not know of them, the writers of the first three gospels were clearly guilty of falsehood.

34. It is a trifle singular that the third and fourth gospels say that Satan or the devil, entered into Judas, and induced him to betray his master, while the other two say nothing of the kind, and leave the reader to suppose that Judas acted from his own motives and impulses solely.

35. In one respect the fourth gospel is decidedly superior to the other three—it has little or nothing about devils. The first gospel contains one case where the devil cast out by Jesus acknowledged his messiahship; the second gospel has four such cases; the third three, while the fourth has none. If the devils had really said this, and the writer of the fourth gospel was present when those devils talked in that way, he assuredly would have availed himself of such important testimony.

36. The fourth gospel has nothing to say about the little speech of Jesus to Peter about the latter being the rock upon which the church was to be built; about those whom he looses on earth being being loosed in heaven; about those he binds on earth being bound in heaven. It is possible that the writer of the fourth gospel deemed Peter too false and impetuous a character to have such extraordinary power placed in his hands, and did not care to repeat the remarks that confer no credit upon the person who uttered them.

37. The language of the fourth gospel is very enigmatical, mythical, metaphysical, obscure, and confusing, and totally unlike that of the other three. It makes Jesus to give long and continued discourses which the others do not give, and makes the style of his teaching wholly unlike the others. It places Jesus in the position of a person who wishes to befog his hearers instead of giving them clear and explicit language which they could not mistake.

38. The last verse of the fourth gospel may be taken as an index of the misstatements, or the very poor judgment of the writer. He says if all the things which Jesus did were written, the world would not be able to contain the books containing them. This is a most extravagant statement. The world is large enough to contain a full account of all the deeds performed by a thousand million times as many people as are on the whole earth; how absurd, then, to talk about the world not being large enough to contain an account of the deeds performed by a person but thirty years of age!

39. I will now retire and leave thee to thy own reflections and repose. I do not presume that I have suggested thoughts that thou hast not entertained before, but there can be nothing amiss in calling again to mind the inconsistencies and falsehoods of what is called a revealed word. I bid the a peaceful good-night.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

SEVENTEENTH DAY—MORE HOLY PLACES.

1. It is hardly needful to dwell at length on these, but it will be sufficient to merely name the places without giving their particular localities or describing them. Among the places outside the church of the Holy Sepulcher, and which are claimed to be identified, are the house of Pontius Pilate, where his wife had a dream about the trial of Jesus, and where she warned her husband to have nothing to do against that man.

2. The place where the palace of Herod stood is pointed out, whether by the aid of the Empress Helena or not is not stated; also the chapel of our Lady of Grief is another place sacred to the Virgin, and the palace of Herod, though whether it was Herod the Great, or his grandson Herod the tetrarch of Galilee, the Scribe will not have the hardihood to say.

3. Prominent among the holy places is the house of Saint Veronica, the young woman who felt a sympathy for Jesus when under the fatigue of carrying his cross, which, by the bye, was done by Simon of Cyrene. Besides falling so many times, he was thrown into a profuse perspiration, when the dear soul took her white linen handkerchief and wiped his face, and the remarkable result was attained of his face being photographed or printed on the linen. This miracle is amply corroborated, the identical handkerchief being in several cathedrals in Europe. There is one in Paris, one in Aix-la-Chapelle, one in Cologne, one in Milan, and one guarded with great care in St. Peter's at Rome, which cannot be seen save by paying a considerable sum of money. How can any one doubt a miracle of which there are so many proofs in existence?

4. The places are not only pointed out where Jesus fell with the cross the first time, and run his elbow into a solid stone; where he fell the second time, and made another big dent in a stone with his elbow; when he stopped to rest and leaned his head and shoulder against a rock to rest, and left a print of both upon it; where he fell with the cross the third time, making another deep impression in the rock; where he fell the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth times as he staggered along that sorrowful way under the heavy load; but the place is just as accurately indicated where Simon shouldered the cross at the Hall of Judgment, whence he bore it, without falling once, to Calvary, and thus saved Jesus the trouble of carrying it altogether. It is singular that the cross which got Jesus down twelve times, when he did not carry it, should not have thrown Simon, when he did carry it, and that Jesus should have been so very much fatigued by the weight of the cross which Simon bore all the way himself.

3. Next is the Judicial Gate, or the entrance into the Judgment Hall, whence the sacred staircase was taken which is now in the church at the Lateran in Rome. Next Peter's prison; next the house of Simeon, who was struck dumb; next the chapel of Mary Magdalene, who reformed her manner of life and did not see so much promiscuous company as before; next the house, now the chapel, of Anna, the mother of John the Baptist; next the numerous places on Mount Zion, where the holy man David used to indulge in some of his idiosyncrasies; next the house of another Mary, the mother of St. Mark; next the church of St. Savior; next the great altar, called by the Latin name of the Major Altar.

6. Next the church which stands on the spot where the Last Supper was partaken of; then there is a church of St. Thomas, who was a little slow about believing some things; and another holy relic, which should not be left unnoticed, is one of the stones brought from the Mount of Olives, and from the roadway where Jesus passed along on the ass which he sent his disciple to take whether the owner wished to lend it or not, and where, after the garments and olive branches were thrown in the way for him to ride over, at the time the people were shouting hosannas about the son of David (by the way of his step-father), and at the time he made the sage remark that if the people did not thus shout the stones themselves would cry aloud. Well, this is said to be one of those stones which would have cried aloud if the people had not. Just think of what a curiosity—what a privilege it is—to see a stone which would have cried aloud, only it did not;

7. A little outside the walls, down in the valley of Jehosaphat, the place is pointed out where St. Stephen, the first Christian martyr, was stoned, and, close by, the very place where Paul stood when he held Stephen's garments; another place is where the body after being stoned was laid for burial, and but a little way off is the tomb of the Virgin, where her bones were laid at rest after she gave up the ghost; though how she was allowed to die is one of the greatest marvels connected with the whole story. Why Yahweh did not take her up and have her sit at his right or left hand, just for the good she had done, even if she was incapacitated for further duty, seems singular indeed, and only shows how readily some persons forget the favors they have received.

8. There is a church at the tomb of the holy Virgin, which is claimed to be the oldest Christian church in existence; and, by the bye, there are also a number of other oldest Christian churches. Forty-seven handsome steps lead to this one, and it is claimed that it was built by the sainted Empress Helena. Beside the Virgin, the bones of her husband also rest here; here are also reposing the osseous remains of Joachim and Anna, the parents of the Virgin, the latter of whom was also a virgin when she bore Mary, and more particularly afterward; for be it known that an immaculate virgin was necessary to bear the right sort of girl to assist Yahweh in begetting the little Jesus. So it follows, of course, that Mary was the daughter of Anna, but not the daughter of Joachim. She was necessarily the daughter of Yahweh himself.

9. It is true the divulging of this truth makes the connection between Yahweh and Mary of about the same character as that of Lot and his daughters; but what of that? Was not Lot a man of God, whom Yahweh showed special favors to, and did not an ecumenical council eternally settle it that the Virgin was an immaculate conception the same as was Jesus? Her mother was a virgin as really as herself, and so perhaps it was all the way back, and possibly some future council may so decide it.

10. So accurately are the places preserved where all these holy events took place that the identical spot is marked where the Virgin dropped her belt on a certain occasion, but it is probable that it required St. Helena to tell where that spot was; another place where she prayed; another place where she wept. Of the chapels the numbers are great—one is a chapel of the creed; another the chapel of the father; the chapel of the angel; the chapel of the apostles, and others too numerous to mention.

11. There are many other holy places about this holy city, and though the greatest pains may be taken to enumerate them all, it is greatly to be feared that some may be omitted. There is the church of the Ascension; the ruins of the tower of the Nun of Galilee; the place of St. Pelagia (it is not much known who he was); the well of Nehemiah; the place where the paschal lamb was slain; where Jesus washed feet; the place where the Holy Ghost came down on the day of Pentecost; where the lot fell upon Matthew; where James was consecrated; where Peter denied his master when the cock crew; where St. James said mass before the blessed Virgin; where the wicked Jews attempted to steal the body of the Virgin; where the blessed Virgin was translated; where Jesus was in prison; where the Virgin stood when she heard of the arrest of Jesus; where Peter wept, and more holy places without number.

12. A common carnal-minded person who has not the ability to discern spiritual things may be unable to understand how all these localities were discovered and determined after all the centuries of war, carnage, and confusion that passed over the country and city; but it should be remembered that the sainted Empress Helena spent considerable time in this country, and that she was so highly inspired, and had the gift of dreams and visions to such perfection, that she had little or no difficulty in settling all these little difficult cases; and if it so happened that any of these points escaped her attention, the church has been full of godly-minded persons but little behind St. Helena herself, who were amply able to adjust any of these knotty questions. They could tell the very place where any ancient event took place, and if necessary they could invent the incident and then tell where it took place.

13. There is one matter of which mention should be made in connection with the holy city, and that is the Wandering Jew, and what is here written about that celebrated character is taken from St. Mark (Twain), whose veracity will hardly be questioned: And so we come at last to another wonder of deep and abiding interest—the veritable house where the unhappy wretch once lived who has been celebrated in song and story for more than eighteen hundred years as the Wandering Jew.

14. On the memorable day of the crucifixion he stood in this old doorway with his arms akimbo, looking out on the struggling mob that was approaching, and, when the weary savior would have sat down and rested him a moment, pushed him rudely away and said, Move on. The Lord said, Move on, thou, likewise. And the command has never been revoked from that day to this. All men know how that the miscreant upon whose head that just curse fell has roamed up and down the wide world for ages and ages, seeking rest and never finding it—courting death, but always in vain—longing to stop in city, in wilderness, in desert solitudes, yet hearing always that relentless warning to march, march on.

15. They say, do these hoary traditions, that when Titus sacked Jerusalem and slaughtered eleven hundred thousand Jews in her streets and byways, the wandering Jew was seen always in the thickest of the fight, and that when battle axes gleamed in the air he bowed his head beneath them; when swords flashed their lightnings he sprang in their way; he bared his breast to whizzing javelins, to hissing arrows, to any and to every weapon that promised death and forgetfulness and rest. But it was useless; he walked forth out of the carnage without a wound.

16. And it is said that five hundred years afterward he followed Mohammed when he carried destruction to the cities of Arabia, and then turned against him, hoping in this way to win the death of a traitor. His calculations were wrong again. No quarter was given to any living creature but one, and that was the only one of all the host that did not want it. He sought death five hundred years later in the wars of the Crusades, and offered himself to famine and pestilence in Ascalon. He escaped again; he could not die.

17. These repeated annoyances could have at last but one effect—they shook his confidence. Since then the wandering Jew has carried on a kind of desultory warfare with the most promising of the aids and implements of destruction, but with small hope as a general thing. He has speculated some in cholera and railroads, and has taken almost a lively interest in infernal machines and patent medicines. He is old now and grave, as becomes an age like his; he indulges in no light amusements save that he goes sometimes to executions and is fond of funerals.

18. There is one thing he cannot avoid; go where he will about the world he must never fail to report in Jerusalem every fiftieth year. Only a year or two ago he was here for the thirty-seventh time since Jesus was crucified on Calvary. They say that many old people who are here now saw him then and had seen him before. He looks always the same—old and withered and hollow-eyed and listless, save there is about him something which seems to suggest that he is looking for some one, expecting some one—the friends of his youth perhaps. He always pokes about the old streets looking lonesome, making his mark on a wall here and there, and eyeing the oldest buildings with a sort of friendly half interest; and he sheds a few tears at the threshold of his ancient dwelling, and bitter tears they are. Then he collects his rent and leaves again.

19. He has been seen standing near the church of the Holy Sepulcher on many a starlight night, for he has cherished an idea for many centuries that if he could only enter there he could rest. But when he approaches the doors slam to with a crash, the earth trembles, and all the lights in Jerusalem burn with a ghastly blue. He does this every fifty years just the same. It is hopeless, but then it is hard to break habits one has been eighteen hundred years accustomed to. The old tourist is far away on his wanderings now. He must have a consuming contempt for the complacent infants who go skurrying about the world in these railroad days and call it traveling. All I have revealed about the wandering Jew can be amply proven by reference to our guide.

20. Of course the Scribe was not fortunate enough to meet this rather antiquated individual, as he possibly may be spending the present season in the vicinity of the North Pole, but he (the Scribe) wishes right here to assure his readers that he accepts this story about the wandering Jew with the same amount of credence that he does all the other remarkable yarns that are repeated of the individuals and miraculous events which have transpired in this holy city and country. For further particulars inquire of the guide or Moody and Sankey.

21. There are numerous other sacred places which the pilgrims did not visit, but so far as the Scribe is concerned he is surfeited with them and longs to get out again into some part of the world where the devil is supposed to hold rule and where there is not quite so much holiness.

22 This country of sacred places, churches, chapels, and shrines brings some incidents to the mind of the Scribe which he has heard. In this Land of Yahweh the bones of any dead man have only to be found to afford good reason for a chapel to be erected or a shrine to be set up. Once upon a time a native in this country had a faithful donkey, which, after a lifetime of hard service, could no longer keep up the process of breathing, and quietly yielded up the ghost, whereupon the bereaved owner laid him by the roadside and covered his body with stones.

23. The body of the defunct jackass remained there several years, until the meat upon the bones had entirely disappeared and naught but the bones remained. At length some pious Christian, in hunting for sacred relics and sacred bones of departed saints, had the good fortune to find those of this individual of the asinine species, and by the discerning instincts which a saint is supposed to possess readily perceived that he had discovered the bones of a departed saint of the first water, and with commendable promptness he erected a shrine over the bones and started a holy shop or prayer factory for the offering of prayers and the performance of miracles, and as the results produced were of the most astonishing character, a lively trade was done and many a shekel brought into the holy treasury.

24. Thus the business at this pious shop throve until by chance the owner of the defunct donkey discovered that the shrine had been erected over the bones of his former four-footed servant, and that those very bones had performed all the miracles. The joke was too good to be kept; so he let the facts be known, and after that that shop was known as the Shrine of the Holy Jackass.

25. One pious story brings to mind another: Once upon another time a man of the world was sojourning for a season in a town where unusually holy shrines, chapels, and churches had been erected to the blessed Virgin, which were by the faithful held in the very highest esteem. But on an unlucky day this graceless sojourner strayed into one of these holy places, though he had little respect for holy things.

26. While standing there he felt a necessity for attending to a demand of nature, and, with shocking sacrilege, he did not leave the place for the purpose. But, unfortunately, it so happened that he was discovered in the very act, and the utmost indignation and horror, of course, was aroused that the shrine of the blessed Virgin had been thus desecrated and outraged. The vile sinner was at once arrested and thrown into prison, and the indignation against the wretch arose to such a pitch that even his life was in great danger.

27. In the fearful dilemma he invoked the aid of a shrewd legal gentleman, who at once took in the critical situation, and informed his client that his only chance was to give a plausible reason for what he had done; otherwise his life was not worth a groat. By the advice, then, of this astute lawyer, his client made this plea:

28. He had for many long months been a sufferer from obstinate constipation of the bowels, and he had tried all remedies and used all expedients in vain, and had employed the most learned medical men without the slightest relief, when it had occurred to him that he would visit the shrine of the Virgin, and implore her aid in his behalf. Accordingly he visited the holy place, offering up a fervent prayer to the Virgin, and, wonderful to relate, his prayer was answered on the spot, and his stubborn malady was at once removed.

29. This plea was a most ingenious one, and saved the poor man's life, and, what is more, suddenly raised him in the estimation of the populace. They accepted him as a devout worshiper of the blessed Virgin; they recognized him as one whose prayers are miraculously answered, and they decided that the highest honors should be paid him. So, in place of taking his life, they clothed him in rich robes, carried him around the town upon their shoulders, and considered him a veritable saint.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

PERSONS MET WITH.

1. Among the persons met at the hotel in the holy city may be mentioned Sir Arthur Cunningham, a dignified Englishman, pretty well advanced in years. He is distinguished as the man who suppressed Fenianism several years ago.

2. Another party was the pious Mr. Miller and wife, of Bristol, England, who is noted for the power which he possesses over the deity to induce him to listen to his requests and fulfill all his desires. He is able to report most astonishing achievements he has made by dint of his prayers—churches built, orphan asylums established, the inmates fed, and many more astonishing things not necessary to repeat. It is said he can pray at a mark and hit it oftener than any other expert in the business.

3. Another person seen is Captain Condor, also of England, who has been engaged for many years in making excavatings about the holy city, and writing a book descriptive of his labors. He has a force under his direction now. He is employed by the Palestine Exploration Society, and is paid by the fund raised for the purpose. He is an active-looking man.

4. Another character is an enthusiastic Swede with a red head, who has come to the Land of Yahweh to find the ark of Shittim wood which used to be the residence of Yahweh before so many larger and better places were provided for him. This erratic Swede can think of little else than the ark of the covenant, and he roams over this desolate land, looking high and low for that ark; but, up to this date, he has not found hair nor hide of it. Nobody can tell him what has become it. Unfortunately he has not the wonderful ability of dreaming out the location of holy places, and, in consequence, it is to be feared he is spending his time, his strength, and his money in vain.

5. Among the most pleasing persons met with is Colonel Joseph G. Wilson, the American consul for the holy city. His home is Fort Madison, Iowa, and he has been here some four years, and has necessarily learned much about the country. From him many points were obtained, and many facts learned.

6. His position brings him more or less in contact with the natives of the country, the Bedouins, and the Syrians. It is amusing to hear him relate many of the incidents which come under his observation. When travelers from America wish to visit the country beyond the Jordan they apply to him, and he sends word to some sheik east of the Jordan to come and see him. In two days the sheik puts in an appearance, and readily enters into a contract, which he most scrupulously carries out.

7. He mentioned, as an illustration of the morals of the sheiks and their faith in prayer, this incident: An old sheik said to him that Allah had been very good to him, and had hearkened to his prayers. On one occasion he had met a young sheik who had a very fine mare, which he (the old sheik) greatly desired, and he asked him what price he wished for the animal; but the young sheik said no price could be placed upon the beast, for he should not part with her, because he had inherited her from his father, and could not give her up.

8. The old sheik was grieved at this intelligence, and prayed morning and night to Allah to give him that beautiful mare. For some time he thought Allah did not hear him; but he continued to pray, and at length Allah heard his prayer, and was so good as to answer his request. This was the way in which it was done:

9. One day he was out in the desert upon his fleet horse, when he spied the young man on the beautiful mare, and the desire to possess her was stronger in him than ever. He immediately pursued the young shiek with all the speed his own swift horse was capable of. In a short time he overtook him and, with a well-directed aim and a powerful arm, drove his spear through the young man's body, and in a moment he was lying writhing and bleeding in the sand. Thus, said the old sheik, did Allah answer my prayer, and give me the coveted mare.

10. He said, in extenuation, that he often looked back to that event, and could see the young sheik, in the very prime of life, lying there on the ground, wallowing in his gore, and sometimes he almost thought it was not quite right thus to put the young man to death; but, said he, what will a man not do to obtain such a beautiful mare? And again he consoled himself that Allah had been good to him, and heard his prayer.

11. The Bedouins are strict to keep their contracts, but they hesitate not to steal or rob, even from each other. They prefer not to take life if it can be avoided, even when they despoil and rob strangers; but they will kill, if they find it necessary, in their robbing enterprises. The different tribes are often engaged in war with each other, and believe it perfectly legitimate to take from their enemies all the property they can.

12. The tribes hold what they have on the community plan, but the sheik has more advantages and perquisites than the masses. His position is inherited, but he is expected to show himself a brave and wise leader of the tribe, and is looked up to as a superior man who must be obeyed. His rule is imperative.

13. Upon asking what the law-making power is among them, the colonel said he inquired of the old head sheik with regard to that, and was informed that the head shiek convoked all his subordinate sheiks when any question had to be decided; and, said the old shiek, I sit quietly and hear all their talk, and when they have finished I do as I think best.

14. Polygamy is common among all the Arabs, and when a man is able to support two or more wives there is no prohibition against their indulging in their taste for more matrimony. Divorce is also very easy among them; if a man becomes dissatisfied with his wife, he can at any time send her home to her parents. The position of the woman is a menial one, being little more than a slave to her husband. She is not supposed to know anything, and education is out of the question for her. It is very common to see the Arab women carrying heavy loads along the road, while the husband is riding on the donkey, horse, or camel.

15. The men and women are both physically well-made—of good hight, straight, and of good figure. They are not given to obesity, like most Europeans, and it is very seldom that a fleshy Arab is seen. It is often said that the men are better looking than the women. Some of the young women look very well, but they seem to lose their beauty early, and by the time they are forty look like hags. They are dark, but have straight hair.

16. There are many Bedouins roving over the Land of Yahweh, and they often prey upon the more numerous class of ordinary Arabs and Syrians, who are disposed to remain permanently in one place and pursue agriculture for a livelihood. There would be more prosperity in the country were the government better and taxes not so heavy. The Turkish rule is replete with dishonesty and corruption, and the oppression which grows out of it bears the hardest upon the poor tiller of the soil.

17. Syria is now ruled by five viceroys, called pashas, the seats of whose governments are respectively Damascus, Aleppo, Tripoli, Acre, and Jerusalem. The population of Palestine is somewhere about 200,000, while that of Syria entire is in the neighborhood of 2,000,000.

18. The Jews, as before remarked, are not self-sustaining, but live largely upon the contributions sent from their brethren in various countries. It is much the same with the Christians; they may be said to be flourishing to some extent, having well-built churches, convents, etc.; but these have been constructed with money sent in from various Christian countries, and a steady influx of funds is forwarded to keep up the annual expenses of the various institutions. The holy land is quite a tax to the Christians of the world, but they will cheerfully expend many thousands of dollars per year to keep up their foothold in the country. As Christianity had its origin here, they are very anxious to hold control of the country as widely as possible.

19. The business of Jerusalem is of a limited character. But few goods are sold, except at retail, and that to no great extent. A large share of the money in circulation is brought into the country by pilgrims and visitors who come here to see the land once selected by Yahweh in preference to all other countries of the globe. A little trade is done in the manufacture of various articles from olive-wood, which are principally sold to visitors. Several of the mechanical trades are feebly conducted. The stores and bazars are small and inferior.

20. As before remarked, the prevailing religion of the country is Mohammedanism, which is, There is but one god, and Mohammed is his prophet. They believe that six great prophets have been sent from Allah—Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mohammed—the greatest of whom is Mohammed. They accept the Jews as true believers from the time of Moses to Jesus. They deny the existing version of the Pentateuch, the Psalms, and the gospels as being authentic or inspired. Only the Koran is the true word of God, and has come down unaltered from its original composition.

21. Moslems accept the doctrines of the immortality of the soul, and future rewards and punishments, and do not deny that women have souls. The more enlightened of them receive in a figurative sense the poetical descriptions of the joys of heaven contained in the Koran. Admission to paradise is asserted to be won, not by merit, but by the mercy of Allah, and also by absolute decree. Predestination, however, is differently taught by the different sects among them, for they are divided into about as many sects as are Christians. But all Moslems hold that a portion of the human race is elected to eternal happiness, and another portion to eternal misery. The difference, then, between them and Christians is not very great, save in the prophet or leader which they accept.

22. The Moslem officers of religion, or priests, attached to the mosques are, first, the warden (na'sir), who is the trustee of all the endowments of the mosque, and he appoints all the other officers; next, the ministers (imaums), whose duty it is to keep up the Mohammedan services; next, the kateeb, who publicly prays and preaches on Fridays, the Mohammedan Sabbath. The ra'tib recites certain prayers at stated times daily. The call to these prayers is chanted from the galleries of the minarets by officials called muezzins.

23. Prayer, alms-giving, fasting, and pilgrimage, and also frequent purifications by washing, are scrupulously enjoined. Prayer must always be preceded by washing, as from a person not clean prayer is without effect. The dress should also be clean, and the ground should be covered with a piece of carpet. No people in the world pray more, and prayer is conducted on the street, in the shops, and wherever the devotees are. On entering a mosque they always remove their shoes, perform their ablutions at the tank, if not already purified, and then, turning their faces toward Mecca, go through their repeated orisons and prostrations. They rise, bow, and kneel again in course of the prayer.

24. The Greek Christians are far the more numerous in Palestine and Syria. The Greek church separated entirely from that of Rome in 868, when Photius was elected patriarch of Constantinople by the Emperor Michael. They have no special articles of faith of their own, but adopted the Nicene and Athanasian creeds, with very slight alterations.

25. Images are not tolerated in Greek churches as they are in the Romish, but pictures of a stereotyped class are much used. They invoke saints as intercessors, and pray for the dead, but do not maintain the Romish belief as to purgatory. They do not hold to infallibility of the patriarch nor the church. They acknowledge the seven sacraments, baptize by immersion, believe in transubstantiation, and mix the communion wine with warm water. They do not forbid marriage among the priesthood.

26. The Roman Catholics are making some headway in Palestine, but are found only in the towns. They are the deadly enemies of the Greek Christians, and their quarrels are constant and bitter. The priests have privileges not enjoyed in Europe, for instance, they may have wives, if married before ordination.

27. The Marionites since 1180 have belonged to the Romish church. They are principally in Lebanon, and number nearly two hundred thousand.

28. The Copts are poorly represented in Palestine, though they have a chapel and a share in the church of the Holy Sepulcher. They more usually act as clerks and other employees in the mercantile and public offices. They derive their name from Coptos, now Kobt, in Egypt, and are the sole representatives of the ancient race who built the pyramids. They are Christians. Baptism is practiced by them; children are circumcised, confession is required and is indispensable immediately before partaking of the sacrament. They fast on Wednesdays and Fridays, and observe the seven great feasts, viz., the Nativity, the Epiphany, Annunciation, Palm Sunday, Easter, Ascension, and Whit Sunday. They are not allowed to intermarry with persons of any other sect.

29. The Protestants are very limited in Palestine. About two hundred are in Jerusalem, a few in Nazareth, a few in Bethlehem, and that is all.

30. The Jews of Palestine, as already indicated, are a mixed multitude. The two principal sects are the Sephardim and the Ashkenazim; the first are Spanish and Portuguese, and the latter Polish, German, and Russian. These are again divided into the Perooshim (Pharisees), and the Chasidim (pious)

31. They keep five public fasts; the fast of Gedaliah, celebrated on account of the murder of Gedaliah (2 Kings, xxv), and kept about the middle of September. 2. The fast Asaar-Bedebeth, 10th of Debeth, corresponding with the 23d of December, on which day Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem. 3. Fast of Esther (see book of Esther). 4. Fast of Sheba-Asaar Betamoos, 17th of Tamoos, corresponding with the 25th of June, on which Moses broke the Ten Commandments; on the same day the sacrifices ceased in the first temple. 5. The fast of Tischa Beab, 9th day of Ab, about the middle of July, because on that day it was decreed that the generation which left Egypt should die in the wilderness; the first and second temples were destroyed; Bither was taken, and thousands of Jews put to death, and Turrus Rufus plowed up Mount Moriah. The Chasidim have a sixth fast, the 9th day of Adar (March), because Moses died on that day.

32. The festivals kept by the Jews are Passover, Pentecost, New Year, Day of Atonement, the Feast of Tabernacles, the Feast of Purification, the Dedication of the Temple, and the Feast of Esther. Every Saturday services are preached in the chief synagogues, and the Psalms are read between the afternoon and evening services. Short portions of the law are also read on every Monday and Thursday, because Moses went up on Mount Sinai to receive the Ten Commandments on Thursday and returned on Monday.

33. A word about the lepers of Jerusalem. They number about fifty, and are a most miserable set, as they are everywhere. There are three stages of the disease. It first breaks out on the back, between the shoulders, in whitish, scurvy spots; the next stage is marked by swelling of the joints, inflammation of the face and other parts, with an affection of the organs of speech, which makes the voice husky and unpleasant. In the third stage the bones decay, the fingers rot off, and the victim is a mass of sores and putrefaction. The disease is incurable, and makes the sufferer utterly wretched. It is not rapid in its course, but the victim suffers many years. They marry only among themselves, and their children seem as healthy as the children of other people; but about the twelfth year the disease usually shows itself, and then leads the sufferer a most miserable existence. It would seem that marriage should be prohibited among them.

34. The winters in the Land of Yahweh vary not a little in severity, and the rain-fall is much greater some years than others. Some winters there is twenty inches of snow at a time, which remains on some weeks, while in other winters there is but little snow, and it soon disappears. Some years the entire rainfall is but sixteen inches, while in other years that amount is more than doubled.

35. A striking feature to strangers in this city are the water bottles, made of the skins of goats, dried with the hair on, and sewed up as when on the body. It is very common to see men carrying around these bottles filled with water, upon their backs, with the legs of the animal and the other parts sticking out as in life. The neck of the goat makes the mouth of the bottle. One feels hardly anxious to drink from these bottles. Most of the water used is rain-water, stored in cisterns.

36. The pipe so largely used in Constantinople and all Moslem towns, called nargileh and chibouk, is often seen here in this city. It consists of a flexible tube nearly ten feet long, and a vessel containing water, at the top of which is the receptacle for the tobacco. The smoke is forced through the water, which cools it, and is said to add strength to it, so as to cause sickness to those unaccustomed to it sooner than an ordinary pipe. And to smoke one of them seems to require a much longer time than the usual mode.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

MELCHISEDEC'S SEVENTEENTH VISIT.

1. The Venerable Visitor made his appearance on the last night of the Scribe's tarry in the holy city in the same manner that he had on previous visits, and after a few words of salutation and remarks of a general nature he proceeded to continue the review of the improbabilities and absurdities of the books of the New Testament, following those already mentioned, as follows:

2. The account in Acts of the resurrection of Jesus varies from the accounts in the gospels; in fact, no two accounts agree. For instance, Matthew says Jesus appeared first to the two Marys, and afterward to the eleven disciples away off among the mountains of Galilee; but the appearance could not have been eminently satisfactory, for he says some doubted, though probably not without reason. Mark says Jesus appeared to one Mary, and that afterward he appeared to two disciples as they were walking into the country, but when the two told of the appearance they were not believed. The same writer says Jesus afterward appeared to the eleven while they were at meat, at which time and place he made his ascension into heaven. Luke says Jesus appeared to Mary Magdalene, Joanna, Mary the mother of James, and other women with them; and on the same day to two others while on the way to Emmaus. They, however, did not recognize him until he made himself known to them. They returned to Jerusalem and reported to the other disciples what they had seen, and while they were talking Jesus again appeared to them and took supper with them.

3. John states the appearances thus: Jesus first showed himself to Mary Magdalene, who did not know him, and on the same evening he appeared to his disciples in a room with the doors closed, and after eight days he appeared again in a similar manner, and still again at the Sea of Tiberias, but he was not recognized until he made himself known, and directed them where to cast their net. The writer of Acts makes quite a different story of it, saying Jesus was with his disciples for a period of forty days, when he ascended up to heaven. Paul again makes the appearance of Jesus unlike any of the others, naming six different appearances. He says Jesus was first seen by Cephas and the twelve; next by over five hundred at once; next by James, then by all the apostles, and last of all by himself. How can such great differences in statements be reconciled? The larger share must be false statements.

4. The account of the ascension is quite as contradictory. The first gospel says nothing of it. Mark says he was taken off from a place where the disciples had partaken of a meal, probably in the room of a house; Luke says he led his disciples out as far as Bethany, where he blessed them, when he was parted from them and was carried up into heaven; while the writer of Acts says after he had talked with his disciples about the Holy Ghost coming upon them, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight. The diversity of statements certainly does not indicate accuracy of narratives of a real event.

5. The Judas story has been alluded to; Matthew says Judas repented, threw down the money at the feet of the priests, and went out and hanged himself. The writer of Acts says that with the money he purchased a field, after which, falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out. Could both be true?

6. It seems to have been a species of unusual severity to strike dead Ananias and Sapphira for telling a falsehood or keeping back a part of the property they had contributed, while millions have told more criminal falsehoods without receiving the slightest punishment.

7. It is not a probable story about the angels opening the prison doors and setting the prisoners free. It was a decided departure from the general rule. Many an unfortunate prisoner has been compelled to serve out a much longer term of imprisonment without any help from angels.

8. The story of the remarkable conversion of Saul by smiting him to the earth and depriving him of sight is a remarkable story; besides, it is related in different places in different ways.

9. The claims of Peter raising Tabitha from the dead and performing marvelous cures of long-standing ailments are too unnatural to be true.

10. It is too extraordinary to be true that an angel took Peter out of prison, and took off his fetters and chains. It is not customary for angels to do things of that kind. The freeing of Paul and Silas by an earthquake gotten up for the occasion is of the same improbable character.

11. The claims that Paul restored a dead man to life and performed miraculous cures are of the extravagant, untruthful character, and wholly unworthy of credit.

12. Passing over the epistles of Paul filled with his theories and doctrinal notions, several of which epistles are not genuine, not having been written by Paul; the epistles of Peter, the second of which is pronounced spurious; the three epistles of John, the last of which was surely not written by John, which is unequivocally pronounced spurious, all of which books are subject to much criticism, the wild, erratic, and visionary book called Revelations is reached, and this closes the New Testament collection. The leader of the Reformation, Luther, pronounced it fit to be thrown into the Elbe, and a prominent Christian writer said it was well calculated to make a man crazy, if not so already.

13. Among the wild visions detailed therein, a few may be mentioned: The Son of Man was seen in the midst of seven candlesticks, clothed with a garment down to his feet, girt about the paps with a golden girdle. His head and hair white like wool, his eyes as a flame of fire, his feet like fine brass, his voice as the sound of many waters; in his right hand seven stars, and out of his mouth a sharp, two-edged sword. With all these appendages he must be a formidable character indeed.

14. Another unmeaning vision is of the four beasts, each with six wings, and full of eyes before and behind, the same being around the throne, from whence proceeded lightnings and thunderings, the beasts resting not day nor night, saying, Holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty, which was and is, and is to come. After which the four and twenty elders fell before him that sat upon the throne, etc.

15. Of a similar character is the vision of a white horse, a red horse, a black horse, a pale horse, the falling of the stars from heaven to the earth, the departing of the heavens as a scroll, and other crazy images of the same kind.

16. Another similar vision was of the four angels standing at the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth; but where the corners of the earth are is not quite clear, nor how the angels hold the winds.

17. Another wild vision is of a third part of the sea becoming blood, which made a third part of the creatures die in it, upon which a great star fell from heaven, and a third part of the sun and moon was smitten, a third part of the stars darkened. It is very clear that the person who had that vision must have been fully a third part demented or insane.

18. Another of these godly visions is about the seven vials of God's wrath, discovered by the seven angels. Vial No. 1 Noisome and grievous sores; No. 2. The sea becoming as the blood of a dead man, and every living thing in the sea dying; No. 3. The rivers of waters and fountains becoming blood; No.

4. The sun receives power to scorch men, and scorching them with fire; No. 5. Poured upon the seed of the beast, their kingdom full of darkness, which caused them to gnaw their tongues with pain; No. 6. The great river Euphrates dried up, and unclean spirits like frogs came out of the mouth of the dragon; No. 7. Voices and thunders and lightnings, and a greater earthquake than ever since man lived took place upon the earth; the clouds fleeing away, and the mountains also, so that they could not be found. That was a pretty bad lot of vials, and the wrath of a very undesirable kind. A man far gone with delirium tremens or with insanity might be supposed to have such a vision as that.

19. The angel who stood in the sun and spoke with a voice so loud that the fowls in the atmosphere of the earth heard him, must have had very strong lung power. He invited them to the supper of the Great God, to partake of the flesh of kings, the flesh of captains, the flesh of other mighty men, and also of the flesh of horses. Not a very desirable supper, though.

20. The binding of the great dragon, the devil, for a thousand years, and then casting him into the bottomless pit, where he could fall at the rate of five hundred miles an hour for all that time, and not begin to reach a stopping-place, perhaps served him right; but who knows what such insanity means?

21. Another of the same kind of vision is that of the great white throne fleeing away from the face of him who sat upon it, but could find no place to go to. It must have been appalling to witness such fearful commotions. About the same time the books were opened, and then another book, when death and hell gave up their dead and both were cast into the lake of fire. Nobody ought to be sorry that they met with such a fate.

22. The visions of the remarkable woman may be considered a great favor. She was clothed with the sun, she had the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars. The worst of it was, though, she was with child, and travailed with great pain to be delivered. It is to be hoped she got through with her troubles as well as could be expected.

23. That was a more fearful vision about the great red dragon with seven heads and ten horns, with seven crowns upon his heads, and with the largest tail on record—large and long enough to draw after him the third part of the stars of heaven and cast them to the earth. Just think for a moment what a tail that must have been, and how high the earth must have been piled with the debris of so many stars, especially when nearly all the stars are millions of times larger than the earth!

24. It was too much for a dragon with such a tail at that to take after the woman in the family way; it was enough, surely, to mark her child in the most terrible manner. What a beast! he wished to devour the child as soon as it was born; but luckily the child was caught up into heaven, and the woman escaped to the wilderness. Let it be hoped that the dragon starved to death.

25. It seems, however, a little further on that the great Archangel Michael had his attention called to this terrible dragon, and that he and his angels fought with the dragon and his angels; and, as might be expected, Michael came off first best, and cast the dragon and his angels into the center of the earth, where it is to be hoped that Michael will see that he ever remains. How many were killed and wounded is not stated, but Michael must be considered a tremendous warrior.

26. But Michael made the mistake of not thrusting the dragon so far into the earth but what he got upon the surface again, and went once more for the woman. He was very wroth at her, and cast out of his mouth a great flood of water to wash her away; but the earth again came to her rescue, and opened its mouth and swallowed the flood, which, perhaps, would otherwise have drowned the woman; and she was also presented with a pair of wings, with which she ought to keep out of the way of that bad dragon ever after.

27. There was another woman—a very bad woman, and when a woman is bad she is generally very bad—but this one was uncommonly bad, and was arrayed in purple and scarlet, and decked with gold and precious stones. She also sat on a scarlet-colored beast, and the kings of the earth committed fornication with her, and she made the inhabitants of the earth drunk with the wine of her fornication. She was very fond of the blood of the saints, and she took so much of it that it made her very drunk; but she at length came to grief, as all bad women are pretty sure to do; and she stopped making the nations drunk, stopped drinking herself, and finally fell away, and, let us trust, was never seen again.

28. The description of the New Jerusalem is far more pleasant than the visions of big dragons and bad women. It descended out of heaven; it had the glory of God; its light was like the light of a jasper-stone, clear as crystal; its wall was great and high, and had twelve gates named after the twelve tribes of Israel. It went very much by twelves; the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apostles. It was four-square, and its length and breadth just equal with its hight, thus making a perfect cube. It was of very respectable size, measuring twelve thousand furlongs each way, much larger, thou must admit, than this puerile and almost contemptible city, the old Jerusalem, from which it was named.

29. But it was as rich as it was large; it was made of pure gold, like unto clear glass—what a curious kind of gold, and how heavy the cube must have been, and what a strong cable it must have required to let it down out of heaven with! and the wall was of jasper, or rather the first foundation of the wall was jasper; the second, sapphire; the third, chalcedony; the fourth, emerald; the fifth, sardonyx; the sixth, sardius; the seventh, chrysolite; the eighth, beryl; the ninth, a topaz; the tenth, a chrysoprasus; the eleventh, a jacinth; the twelfth, an amethyst. The twelve gates were twelve pearls, doubtless of very large size. The streets of this heavenly city were of pure gold, and as transparent as glass (heavenly gold seems to hav the quality of transparency which earthly gold does not possess). In this city was the river of the pure water of life. On either side of the river grew the tree of life, and this tree bore twelve kinds of fruit, one variety ripening each month.

30. The leaves of this tree also possessed very healing qualities and cured all the nations. There was no night in this city, and the sun and candles and lamps and gas and the electric light were equally unnecessary. How the inhabitants could sleep where there was so much light is not fully explained. But, joyful to relate, there was to be no more curses there; and if a time is even to come when cursing shall go out of fashion, let everybody rejoice. It ought to be a pleasant residence if those in the upper stories do not interfere with those upon the ground floor.

31. It is a matter for rejoicing that the New Jerusalem is so large and capable of accommodating such a great number of people—divided into rooms sixteen feet and eight inches square each way it affords 69,120,000,000,000 rooms, which should comfortably accommodate two persons each, say a male and female—and without companions it would be but an indifferent heaven, with all the transparent gold and jasper and sardonyxes, and topazes and chalcedonies and all that—and thus afford, without crowding, ample room for 138,240,000,000,000 persons, which would, indeed, constitute a good-sized colony.

32. On the basis that for five thousand years the earth has had a population of 1,000,000,000, and that this number has been renewed three times every century, the number who have lived in the world would be 15,000,000,000,000, but besides affording space for all these, rooms would remain for 123,240,000,000,000 more people, which, at the same rate, 3,000,000,000 every century, will require 41,080 years more to afford people enough to fill all the rooms, and this without sending any of them to the bad place. If this is not a cheerful prospect, where is one to be found? There seems, at all events, no necessity for sending poor souls to hell for want of room in the New Jerusalem.

33. I have noticed but a portion of the absurdities and impossibilites of the Jewish and Christian scriptures, but perhaps enough to give an idea of the mass of senseless legends and falsehoods which religious people readily accept as the word of God, the holiest truths of heaven. I am not, of course, conceited enough to suppose I am the first to call thy attention to them, but I wished to make mention of them in connection with my remarks.

34. Aside from these contradictions in the scriptures there are hundreds of others, which can easily be pointed out, but I do not propose to ask thee to listen to them, as thou art already familiar with them. My purpose is largely accomplished. I have visited thee every night during thy sojourn in the Land of Yahweh, and I will make thee one more visit, though by to-morrow night thou wilt have passed beyond the bounds of the land, and be by the side of the sea, in the land of the ancient Philistines, or Phœnicians.

25. I will once more bid thee good-night, trusting that the visit thou hast made to the Land of Yahweh, the remarks thou hast made upon the same, and the hints I have dropped, may be of some service to those who may read what thou hast written. May peace and contentment abide with thee.

CHAPTER XL.

EIGHTEENTH DAY—DEPARTURE FROM THE LAND OF YAHWEH.

1. On the morning of the seventh day of the twelfth month the pilgrims, having completed their allotted days in the Land of Yahweh, set their faces toward the land of the Philistines, even to the city of Jaffa, which beforetime was called Joppa.

2. Four of the pilgrims, of whom the Scribe was one, and Bridges, Getz, and Lefebre the others, at about the eighth hour, took their seats in a German spring wagon, while the other five elected to ride on horses; but the four were well satisfied with their choice, for it was an agreeable change to be once more in a wagon; and truth compels the statement that the road is far better than could reasonably be expected in such a land of rocks and hills.

3. Toward a score of years ago a pasha of this country obtained permission to construct a road from the holy city to Jaffa, a distance of nearly forty miles. All persons living within ten miles of the road were assessed a certain tax to pay for its construction, and the farmers all along were forced to give many days' work on the road without pay. So it turned out that the pasha made a large sum of money, but a fair road was constructed over the limestone hills, winding and twisting up and down in the most serpentine manner.

4. While on the top of some of the hills the view of the surrounding country was very fine, and an occasional olive grove, and here and there a piece of land cultivated, looks as though the few inhabitants along the road were trying to raise something to eat.

5. It was with no feeling of sadness that the Scribe turned his back toward the holy city, with the consciousness that he would soon be out of the Land of Yahweh, for he has never visited any country of which he was so heartily sick. It has no ruins of antiquity that are of the slightest interest to look upon. There is no certainty that two stones lie upon the other that were so placed by the Jews. There are some relics of the work done by the Phœnicians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Saracens, the Christians, the Turks, and the Syrians, but nothing that is positively Hebrew, save some prostrate tombs, and a few things of that kind.

6. All that makes the journey through this miserable country endurable are the early associations. The places are here which were read about in childhood, in youth, and in manhood; and though they possess but little importance from any other point of view, this very fact clothes them with interest. One likes to see the men he has heard so much talk of, and to look upon the places he has read and heard about.

7. After leaving the holy city, going westward, the rather unsightly Russian buildings are passed on the right, said to have been erected for the accommodation of pilgrims visiting Jerusalem; and on the left are a convent and German orphanage. There are also in this direction several modern, pleasant-looking residences, some of which have been built by Jews of some wealth who have come here to spend the remainder of their lives. There is the prospect of a considerable population thus springing up outside the city walls.

8. The view of the city from the west is not particularly pleasant, as the wall only are seen, with a few buildings rising above them; but, nevertheless, a look behind must occasionally be taken, for, in all probability, the holy city and the clear-topped hills which raise their heads all around it will never be seen again.

9. To the northwest of the city is the high hill Neby Samevil, from whose top it is said one of the finest views is to be obtained that the country affords. It is 2,650 feet above the sea level. It overlooks Jerusalem, the Mount of Olives, Bethlehem, the Frank Mountain, and off to the east the Mountain of Moab, the valley of the Jordan, and the Dead Sea. It is supposed to be the Mizpeh of the Old Testament, where the people were summoned by the prophet Samuel to be ready to fight Benjamin, and where Saul was made king.

10. On a plain six hundred feet below is El-Jib, the ancient Gibeon, one of the principal cities of the old Hivites. From this place it was that the people played a sharp game upon Joshua by dressing themselves up in old clothes, with sacks upon their asses, and wine bottles old and rent and bound up, and old shoes and clouts upon their feet, and all their bread and provisions dry and musty. In this way they journeyed to Joshua at Gilgal, representing that they had come from a very far country; and the bloody old general was outwitted, and entered into a treaty with them to not fight them; but he took revenge upon them afterward by making slaves of them—hewers of wood and drawers of water.

11. There is, however, not a little dispute as to whether this locality is the real Gibeon. Those who would be authorities and decide this knotty question often have the most bitter quarrels, and after they have been listened to the hearer knows no more than he did before.

12. A little further on to the left a zig-zag road is descended into the valley of Kolonieh; to the left, again, is a rather pretty village for this country, called Ain Karim, around which is a pleasant growth of olive-trees and fig-trees. It has a population of some eight hundred, mostly Greek Christians. This is claimed by some to be the Emmaus of Luke's gospel, as are also half a dozen other places. In the valley is the bed of a stream which runs briskly in the rainy season, and the pebbles are worn smooth by the frequent washings. Here David is held to have found the stone with which he slew the monster Goliath, and the battle-ground was not far away.

13. Kirjath-jearim, on the northern boundary of Judah, the next noted locality reached was one of the four cities of Gibeon. Urijah the prophet is said to have been born here. It was to this place that the ark in which Yahweh took up his lodgings was brought from Bethshemesh, and here Yahweh killed 50,070 men in a small harvest field because one of them raised the lid of the box and disturbed him.

14. The ark rested at Kirjath-jearim for twenty years, when David gathered all Israel together and had it moved to Jerusalem, on which occasion the godly man became very hilarious and danced naked in a manner which made the maidens blush and caused his wife Michal to be very angry. It was in connection with this terrible box that the well-disposed Uzzah met the sad fate of losing his life, because, with the best motives in the world, he raised his hand to prevent the old box from tumbling off on to the rocks, bursting open, and spilling its contents upon the ground. But this was too much for Yahweh to put up with, and, being in one of his unamiable moods, he killed Uzzah on the spot.

15. Here in this locality is a ruined old church, sometimes called the church of St. Jeremiah, on the merest supposition that this is the ancient Anathoth where Jeremiah was born; and besides being a prophet to the Jews, it was the easiest thing in the world to make him also a Christian saint.

16. On, a little farther west, is the village of Amwas, another place claimed to be Emmaus. Here are the ruins of an old church and a fountain which possesses miraculous healing powers sufficient to cure all manner of diseases. This small village was an important town in ancient times. Here Judas Maccabeus gained a victory of Georgias. The Roman general Varus burned the town in the year 4 A.D. It was rebuilt in 220 by Julius Africanus, and by him named Necropolis. For a thousand years it was regarded as Emmaus, but for five hundred years has been abandoned as that locality.

17. The road, leading west most of the time, is down hill, as Jerusalem and its surroundings are more than two thousand feet above the level of the sea. Many of the hills are steep, and, but for its serpentine character, the road would be very precipitous. A feeling of gratitude toward the dishonest pacha, even though he made a fortune in the construction of the road, was felt by the pilgrims as they moved over it; if it is not as smooth as could be desired, it is far better than was looked for in the Land of Yahweh. It should also be stated that the line of wagons is run by a German company.

18. The driver, also German, is a regular Jehu, and he pressed on up hill and down hill, keeping his three horses, driven abreast, in a pretty constant trot. The same horses were driven all the way through, with two stops of an hour each for feeding. At the first stop, at a khan by the roadside, the pilgrims partook of lunch, and were assured that they had passed the boundary line of the Land of Yahweh and were now in Phœnicia, or Philistia. Khans take the place of country hotels, and afford refreshments and lodging to travelers.

19. The pilgrims had now descended from the highland and were on the level of the plain of Sharon, which extends from the foot of Carmel on the north to Jaffa on the south. While still on the high grounds a fine view was had of the Mediterranean and the level lands which border upon it. The prospect was a welcome one, for the Scribe as well as the others was anxious to get away from the Land of Yahweh, and by sea is the mode of getting somewhere else.

20. Openly spread before the view is the valley of Ajalon, where Joshua performed his remarkable feat of stopping the moon, while at the same time he compelled the sun to remain a whole day on Gibeon. In this vicinity he and his men did terrible fighting, and Yahweh assisted him by throwing down big rocks from heaven upon the hated Canaanites. How the stopping of the moon could have made any difference is hard to understand; if the sun was detained a dozen hours it would seem the moon could have been permitted to go on about its business.

21. The village of Latrun was passed on the left. Here, tradition says, dwelt the penitent thief who was crucified with Jesus; and it has been discovered by the help of St. Helena, or some other equally talented person, that an earlier acquaintance existed between this thief, whose name was Demas, and Jesus. When Joseph and Mary (according to Matthew, but contrary to Luke) fled into Egypt they came this way, and the two thieves, both the penitent and the impenitent, fell upon the Holy Family and demanded backsheesh for ransom. But Demas, touched with the grace of the divine infant, protected him from the brutality of his accomplice. This incident, it is affirmed, was remembered on the cross, when the pentent thief threw himself upon the mercy of Jesus, and was promised a reception in Paradise.

22. A short distance south of this place, in ancient Philistine, stood the temple in which Dagon, the big god of the Philistines, had his dwelling-place, and where the presence of the shittim wood-box containing Yahweh made old Dagon fall over on his face and break his neck. Yahweh was not the kind of a god to brook opposition in the form of a one-horse Philistine god. It was from here that the young cows left their calves and hauled on a cart the box, Yahweh and all, to Beth-Shemesh.

23. While making this day's journey, especially after the plain was reached, many farmers were seen plowing with grotesque teams, generally of diminutive cattle, sometimes a pair of asses, occasionally an ass and a heifer yoked together, and in a few instances a camel singly. The plow of this country is constructed of two slim poles, one passing through a mortise in the other, and a small iron shoe or plow-point placed upon the upright part. The ox-goad is a feature; it is an inch thick, eight or ten feet in length, and has a dull steel point in the upper end. It was with one of these goads that Shamgar slew six hundred Philistines (Judges iii, 31).

24. Ramleh is a good-sized village, containing four thousand inhabitants. It stands upon the lower end of the plain of Sharon, and is the last place at which the pilgrims halted previous to reaching Jaffa It is tolerably well built for this country, but its streets are dirty and odorous. Nearly a third of its inhabitants are Christians, and the others are Moslems. It is well supplied with gardens of orange-trees and a few palm-trees, surrounded by impassable hedges of the prickly cactus, which grows to a great size.

25. A square tower, nearly a hundred feet high, and supposed to be of Saracenic construction, affords from the top a view of the plain of Sharon, which stretches away to the north; the long line of hills of rock in the Land of Yahweh; the somewhat desert country to the south all the way to Ashdod, Askelon, and Gaza; and the Mediterranean in the west.

26. Tradition says the house of Nicodemus was here. It is also claimed to be the home of Joseph of Arimathea, this being the Arimathea where he dwelt. Here the caravans between Damascus and Egypt halted as they met those between Jaffa and Jerusalem. The town was probably of Saracenic origin, being attributed to Solyman in the eighth century. It was a halting-place of the Crusaders, and it suffered in the wars between the Christians and the Moslems. In the time of the French invasion Napoleon made this town his headquarters. It is about ten miles from Jaffa.

27. The plain of Sharon is nearly fifty miles in length, with an average width of eight or ten miles. Some portions of the land are very good. It is said to grow a profusion of flowers, but the celebrated rose of Sharon is now unknown, some insisting that one flower is that rose and some another. The most common claim is that the real rose of Sharon was a species of mallow. This plain of Sharon formed the better portion of Phœnicia, and was not a part of Palestine.

28. At the entrance of the village waited half a dozen wretched lepers, sitting by the roadside, holding up their hands, or the stumps where the hands should be, and crying out with voices painful to hear. From this place it was two hours' ride to Jaffa.

29. Here, before final leave is taken of the cheerless Land of Yahweh, monotonous and uninviting, the Scribe will say he is clearly of the opinion that he had never visited a land he was more glad to get away from; but still he feels glad that the company of which he was one have had so pleasant a time within its borders, that continued good weather has smiled on them, and that no serious accident has befallen them.

30. Of the 5,600 square miles in Palestine, the Scribe estimates that but about one thousand square miles were ever plowed or could be; and that, perhaps, another thousand might be cultivated with a pick-axe and crow-bar, in growing vines, fig-trees and olive-trees, while all the rest of the country is nothing but naked rocks. Two thousand square miles is a generous allowance for all the land in the country, capable of any sort of cultivation. Three counties in Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, or Kansas would in fertility and productive ability equal this entire land.

31. The Scribe will quote here the truthful remarks of Mark Twain about this country, who expresses his views better than he can express them in his own language: Of all the lands there are for dismal scenery, I think Palestine must be the prince. The hills are barren, they are dull of color, they are unpicturesque in shape. The valleys are unsightly deserts fringed with a feeble vegetation that has an expression about it or being sorrowful and despondent. The Dead Sea and the Sea of Galilee sleep in the midst of a vast stretch of hill and plain, wherein the eye rests upon no pleasant tint, no striking object, no soft picture dreaming in a purple haze, or mottled with the shadow of the clouds. Every outline is harsh, every feature is distinct; there is no perspective—distance works no enchantment here. It is a hopeless, dreary, heart-broken land.

32. Small shreds and patches of it must be very beautiful in the full flush of spring, however, and the more beautiful by contrast with the far-reaching desolation that surrounds them on every side. I would like much to see the fringes of the Jordan in springtime, and Shechem, Esdraelon, Ajalon, and the borders of Galilee; but even then these spots would seem mere toy gardens set at wide intervals in the waste of limitless desolation.

33. Palestine sits in sackcloth and ashes. Over it broods the spell of a curse that has withered its fields and fettered its energies. Where Sodom and Gomorrah reared their domes and towers, that solemn sea now floods the plain, in whose bitter waters no living thing exists, over whose waveless surface the blistering air hangs motionless and dead, about whose borders nothing grows but weeds and scattering tufts of cane, and that treacherous fruit that promises refreshment to parching lips, but turns to ashes at the touch.

34. Nazareth is forlorn; about that ford of Jordan when the hosts of Israel entered the Promised Land with songs of rejoicing one finds only a squalid camp of fantastic Bedouins of the desert; Jericho the accursed lies a moldering ruin, to-day, even as Joshua's miracle left it more than three thousand years ago; Bethlehem and Bethany, in their poverty and their humiliation, have nothing about them now to remind one that they once knew the high honor of the savior's presence; the hallowed spot where the shepherds watched their flocks by night, and when the angels sang peace on earth, good will to men, is untenanted by any living creature, and unblessed by any feature that is pleasant to the eye.

35. Renowned Jerusalem itself, the stateliest name in history, has lost all its ancient grandeur, and is become a pauper village; the riches of Solomon are no longer there to compel the admiration of visiting oriental queens; the wonderful temple, which was the pride and the glory of Israel, is gone, and the Ottoman Crescent is lifted above the spot where, on that most memorable day in the annals of the world, they reared the Holy Cross.

36. The noted Sea of Galilee, where Roman fleets once rode at anchor, and the disciples of the savior sailed in their ships, was long ago deserted by the devotees of war and commerce, and its borders are a silent wilderness [of rocks]; Capernaum is a shapeless ruin; Magdala is the home of brigand Arabs; Bethsaida and Chorazin have vanished from the earth, and the desert plain round about them, where thousands of men once listened to the savior's voice, and ate the miraculous bread, sleep in the hush of a solitude that is inabited only by birds of prey and skulking foxes. Palestine is desolate and unlovely. And why should it be otherwise? Can the curse of deity beautify a land? Palestine is no more of this work-day world. It is sacred to poetry and tradition; it is dream-land.

37. With sufficient pandering to popular prejudices, the foregoing extract contains the truth; and such is the Land on Yahweh, about which such great promises were made, which was to be forever a possession of Abraham and his seed, an everlasting inheritance which should not be taken from them; this is the vaunted promised land which was chosen in preference to all the lands of the globe. This is the wonderful Land of Yahweh in which he attempted the greatest enterprise which a god ever undertook.

38. Here is where he chose a tribe or a race of men which he loved more than all the other races upon the earth, and to whom he made more brilliant promises than a god ever made to a people before or since; here is where he was vexed, annoyed, and disappointed; and here is where he deserted the people he had chosen and fostered, and then turned out to be scattered over the face of the earth without a home or a land to call their own. This emphatically was the land of great expectations and great disappointments—great hopes and great failures—when a god attempted far more than he could accomplish.

39. Here is the land in which we are solemnly told that an infinit and omnipotent god attempted a marvelous enterprise of teaching a chosen people to obey his laws; to be a guide and pattern to all the nations of the earth, but which proved to be disobedient, rebellious, and utterly unworthy. This is where the Infinite and the Omnipotent was utterly thwarted, for his people went astray, the land which he said flowed with milk and honey is largely a barren, arid desert, where vegetation cannot exist; little but weeds and thistles are to be seen.

40. It may all be because Yahweh in his anger cursed it; but what kind of an infinite god is it who, in attempting such an enterprise, could not see what the result must be? In other words, is it not only a finite and weak sort of god who would attempt more than he could accomplish? who could not see the end, and who could not tell at the outset of the experiment what the result must be?

41. But as this land is to-day it has ever been. Those rocks were rocks ten thousand years ago; those hills which are white, chalky, and drear to-day were white, chalky, and drear thousands upon thousands of years ago. The climate may have changed somewhat, as it has changed in Asia Minor and southern Europe; rains may not be so abundant as three thousand years ago, but Palestine was always a contracted, rock-bound, hard, and stony land.

42. Here, indeed, is a sad warning to all ambitious but blind gods who may feel like attempting great enterprises they are unable to carry out; who may desire to sound their trumpets and call the earth to witness their marvelous exploits. Before such inexperienced gods go so far as to make laughing-stocks of themselves, let them call over this way, view the rock-bound Land of Yahweh, and read its mournful, unfortunate history.

A Young Man Who Is to be Pitied.

BARNESVILLE, OHIO, March 10, 1882.

MR. D M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: To you and all Freethinkers—to the Infidel world—I commit the following:

MY DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS IN HUMANITY: I wish to relate my religious experience. I am a young man, twenty-seven years of age. I was born and always lived in Barnesville, Ohio. Three years ago I was a Freethinker, Infidel, Atheist, and Materialist in the strictest sense. I was very radical, and I also disbelieved in the immortality of the soul. I was an Infidel from my youth up. I was a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Freethought papers. I took THE TRUTH SEEKER some four or five years, during which time I worked a great deal for Infidelity. I was liberal in buying Freethought books. I hav distributed thousands of tracts.

A great change has come over me. I am now a Christian. I believe in God, our heavenly father; I believe in the immortality of the soul; I believe in Jesus Christ; I believe the Bible as the inspired word of God. I am very firm in my present religion. Nothing could take me back to Infidelity now. I wish to say that I am far happier and better satisfied than when an Infidel. I hav had my present belief about a year. I united with the Methodist church on December 4, 1881. My conversion from Atheism and Infidelity to God and Christianity was slow, gradual, and by degrees. It began about three years ago, at which time I quit reading THE TRUTH SEEKER and Infidelity after I lost faith in Infidelity and began to believe in Christianity. It took about two years for my belief to change from one extreme to the other. Oh, I thank God for the change in my belief! How happy and peaceful I am now! My friends, you hav no idea how nice, loving, comforting, consoling, and peaceful it is to be a believer and follower of Christ. I love Christianity with all my life. I could not liv without God now.

My friends, I wish to God that every one of you would experience such a change of belief as I hav. I write this letter for the cause of Christ, and hoping it will console some one or many who may not know which road to take. I know Christianity is true—come with me, friends. I feel that if you are not converted to Christianity, it will not be well with you in the life to come.

My conversion was caused, principally, by the loving and kind influence of Christian young ladies. I never keep the company of any but Christian young ladies. God bless those young ladies; to them I owe a great deal for their influence upon me religiously. It seems to me a horrid thing for a lady to be an Infidel.

Another religious influence I had was the study of music—the divine art. I am a musician. Music and Infidelity will not mix very well. There is nothing on this earth more like heaven than the divine art, music. Religion and music go hand in hand.

I hav just subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER for a short season. I wish to keep myself a little posted as to what the Infidel world is doing.

Barnesville is a place of about twenty-five hundred inhabitants. It is a religious place. The church won one hundred and fifty souls in this place this winter.

Freethinkers, listen to my prophecy: I believe the time is coming when Robert Ingersoll will renounce Infidelity and become a Christian. What would be the result of such a change as that? I await. Friends, do not forget what I said about Ingersoll. Ere he dies I believe he will hav converted more souls to Christ than he has to Infidelity.

It is no small affair for an Infidel to become a Christian. Do not deny that an Atheist can be converted to God, for you hav a case in me at least, and I think there are many others. The present minister of the Methodist church of this place was an Infidel and Atheist at one time. He has read Paine, Voltaire, and all Freethought works. He also read Ingersoll's lectures a few years ago. This minister is the finest and most Christ-like reverend we ever had. Yes, our minister, like myself, was once an Atheist. Christianity is true. Glory to God in the highest!

I thank Mr. Bennett for his kindness in publishing this letter. My friends, with kindest wishes toward you all, and hoping that I shall meet you all in the happy summer land in the sweet by and bye, I bid you adieu

Very respectfully your friend, WM. W. SCHOLES.

The above letter was sent to us with an imploring note to print, and the expectation that we would publish it free of charge, with full name and address. Whether there is an advertisment concealed somewhere in it or not we cannot say: we can't find it if there is. Mr. Scholes sends the price of four months' subscription, and as we always do anything in our power to oblige our subscribers, we giv his letter publicity. But we want him to distinctly understand that his threat, conveyed in his private letter, to write to the leaders of Freethought and tell them of our refusal and his miraculous conversion in case we declined printing it, has no effect upon us. The editor of this paper went to a prison cell once rather than back down from what he considered right, and the pro tem editor has heard more dire threatening from Christians than Mr. Scholes can hurl without dying of fright. The only thing we are afraid to do is to do wrong, and we do not consider it wrong to refuse to print some communications.

But we really can see no good reason for Mr. Scholes to hav been converted. At least, he givs none. He says: "I am a Christian," "I believe in God," who, he asserts, is "our heavenly father" "I believe in the immortality of the soul." "I believe in Jesus Christ." "I believe the Bible." What is all that to a rational man? Because he feels a pain in his little stomach, we are not going to cry. He offers no proof of God; he simply believes, believes, believes. His "conversion" is all emotional, like a man with the delirium tremens who imagins he has snakes in his boots. He has been to a Methodist revival, and, being an emotional young man, the preacher, music, and girls hav got the best of him. Without doubt he is very firm in his belief, but thousands hav been firmer, and then been wrong. On what does he base his belief in the existence of God? What one little fact does he present? What fact does he bring forward to show that Jesus ever existed in real flesh and blood, or how a being of real flesh and blood could be the son of a ghost—an intangible nothing? Simply believing that Jesus was the son of God does not prove it.

Mr. Scholes professes to believe the Bible is the inspired word of God. He has become a Christian. Does he intend to follow the Bible in everything? Is he now going to take no thought for the morrow? Is he going to stone to death his brother or wife for believing in another God than his? His threat to us looks as though he were of the church militant. The religion of Jesus, he says, is "loving, comforting, consoling, and peaceful." He is sweetly thankful that he is in the arms of Jesus. He is happy that he is going to be saved and sit at the right hand of God, the four beasts near, with the hundred and forty-four thousand saints dressed in white robes, bowing continually before the throne, and singing the song of Moses and the Lamb (that song which no man can learn), while penetrating even up to that throne, he hears the shrieks of the damned as they writhe and groan in endless torment. If he can be completely happy while thus surrounded, we do not envy him his new-found Christian heart.

The Christian religion, he says, is loving. Was it love that made God create a hell for his people and his people for a hell? Is it love that keeps life in a soul only to torment it? Was it love for mankind that drowned a world? Was it love that caused God to command Moses to kill all the males of the Midianites, and "burn all the cities wherein they dwelt, and all their goodly castles with fire?" Was it love that gave thousands of virgins to the brutal lust of soldiers? Was it love that inspired the command, "When thou comest nigh unto a city to fight it, then proclaim peace unto it, and when thy God hath delivered it into thine hands thou shall smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword?" Was it love that said, "Suffer not a witch to liv?"

The Christian religion is a religion of love, is it? Was it love that built the Inquisition? Did love invent the rack? Did love invent the pulleys, wheels, and thumbscrews that crushed the life from thousands? Did love drag a man from the arms of his wife and babe to the moldy dungeon or the burning pile? Did love ever bury living human beings in the ground? The love of God inspired the massacre of St. Bartholomew, but did love of man ever murder sixty thousand human beings?

And the Christian creed is comforting! It must be comforting to know that you will be saved and your wife be damned, for the families are mighty few that will all get to heaven. It must be comforting to be singing psalms around the throne with your son and daughter groaning and shrieking in hell. Yes, not only comforting, but consoling, to the true believer must be the reflection that he has given up reason and love for blind faith and selfish comfort! Very consoling to embrace as a religion of love and comfort and peace a religion that has been one of hate and unrest and disquiet, of warring sects and contending factions, of intolerance, bigotry, and oppression.

Peace in the arms of Jesus! the arms which brought a sword that for long centuries never knew a sheath but human flesh. Peace in the arms of Jesus—the man whose name has been the war-cry of hundreds of armies, and the open sesame of thousands of dungeons! In the name of Jesus men hav been tortured in every conceivable way. In the name of Jesus they were led to the stake, and that name was the last that rung in their ears as their lives went out in flame and ashes. In the name of Jesus every conceivable crime has been committed, and if the Decalog had been as long as the Atlantic cable every commandment would hav been violated by the followers of Jesus.

Mr Scholes says he knows Christianity to be true. How does he know it? Does he know there is a heaven? Does he know there is a hell? Does he know Christ to be the son of God? Does he know how, or when, or by whom the gospels were written? Does he know how three can be one or one three? Does he know what his trinity is founded on, and that the word is in the Bible? Does he know that the Bible is the word of God? (And if the St. James version is the true word of the true God, whose word is the revised version?) How does he know that Adam was the first man, and that all men sinned through him? Is he prepared to accept with his Christianity the cosmogony and the astronomy of the Bible? Is he prepared to throw overboard all science and accept as fact the childish speculations of barbarism? He has accepted the Methodist creed. He must consequently believe that the word of God is the only rule of conduct, and that all preachers are ordained directly of God. Then he must believe that all the Methodist ministerial seducers were appointed by God, and he must also acknowledge that God knew when he appointed them that they would seduce the lambs of their flock. If he does not acknowledge this, then he takes away God's omniscience—a rash thing for a Methodist to do.

And speaking of Methodists, how does he know the Methodists are the correct sect? How does he know but the Catholics, or Episcopalians, or the Moravians, or the Presbyterians, or the wet-all-over Baptists, or the sprinkle and the-grace-of-God Baptists, or the marry-as-many-as-you-can Mormons, or any of the other innumerable sects may hav hold of the right end of the religious horn? In matters of such immense moment one can not be too particular in selecting the right road to heaven.

But probably Mr. Scholes chose the road lined with the prettiest young ladies, as he says he was converted by young ladies, aided by music. That is probably so. We hav often noticed that young ladies in sore want of beaux select the Methodist church in preference to any other. We used to go to a Methodist church ourselvs to see the girls, and only ceased our visits by quoting in the hearing of of an officious elder that trite and true remark that "a Methodist could be made out of anything above a bundle of straw," for which we were made the special subject of prayer. After that we waited outside for our girl.

But how did those Christian young ladies convert Mr. Scholes? Was it by recounting the story of the Virgin and the Ghost, or how sundry nameless and unmentionable women were healed and comforted by Jesus? Did they tell him how the ancient godly women ministered to the wants of the ancient godly men, and draw a picture of how happy a man could be in the arms of Jesus and Christian young ladies? And then the music was too much for Mr. Scholes. The penetrating squeak of the tuneful fiddle went straight to his heart, and the bass tones of the organ drew his face down to a length compatible with conversion. After this who shall say music hath not charms, etc.? Henceforth every missionary to the Fiji Islands shall take a fiddle instead of a flannel shirt, and to China must be sent the melodious gong so dear to the Chinese heart. What if the old Connecticut Christians did say music was of the devil and smash the melodeon offered them as sacrilegous? Mr. Scholes has been converted by an organ, and hereafter that instrument must be recognized as a missionary agent.

As for the prophecy that Ingersoll will be converted, we shall hav to wait awhile to see it. Ingersoll has had worse things than that said about him. Unless he gets softening of the brain, or the Lord resumes the miracle business, we hav no fear. But if he should die in the penitentiary or in the church it would not make the astronomy of Joshua true, or the story of the creation any the less a lie.

And then Mr. Scholes's particular reverend has been an Atheist! Well, we never heard a revivalist or a temperance fanatic talk who had not been an Atheist or a drunkard. We hav often wondered where in the name of Jove all the Atheists and drunkards keep themselvs before they get converted to their respectiv fanaticisms, for we never find them while they are in their "original sin." But, in addition to having been the blankest kind of an Atheist, this particular reverend is now Christ-like. Does he carry his Christ-likeness to robbing cornfields, stealing men's asses, asking his mother what she supposes he has to do with her, plucking out offending eyes, etc., or does his Christ-likeness begin and end by being a mendicant with no place to lay his head? We'll wager it is not the latter. Without pay there would be very little preach, and no pray at all.

We hav no doubt we shall meet Mr. Scholes in the summer land, if there is one; for never having despoiled an Egyptian, or slain a man and buried him in the sand, or killed a man for the sake of his wife, or stoned a witch to death, or destroyed a man's property by driving devils into it, or made drunkards by turning water into wine for men already "well drunken," or told people they could believe or be damned, or stole corn or donkeys—in short, having lived a life in direct antagonism to the precepts and examples of the Old and New Testaments, and having thereby lived a decent and honest one, we shall certainly go to a better state when we die, always providing there is one.

And now, Mr. Scholes, we leave you for the present, hoping that four months' perusal of THE TRUTH SEEKER will giv you knowledge enough to withstand the great temptation to piety (and pious rascality?) of women and music. We know it is hard to resist the ladies, but we trust THE TRUTH SEEKER will enable you to at least withstand the music. But don't come back to Freethought on your emotions alone. Come on fact, not fancy. Come because you see the absurdity of the Christian superstition, and because you see the harm it has done and is doing, and would help rescue your fellow-men from a mental bondage and fear as galling as it is ignoble. When you see a child tortured with visions of the devil, tell it there is no devil. When you see a poor man being robbed by the church, through his fears of hell, tell him there is no hell but his own mind. When you see a man who "fears his God" so much that he is an abject slave, tell him that no decent God would make a man knowing he would sin, and then punish him for that sin. When you see a man unwilling to learn anything that contradicts the Bible, tell him the Bible is the imperfect record of a very imperfect people; a work of man entirely; that its context is vague, and its contents often meaningless, and that the inspiration of whole chapters hung upon the caprice of a drunken bishop and degraded churchman. Come back to Freethought because you love liberty of mind as well as body; because going from Freethought to Christianity is like emigrating from a republic to a despotism. Come back because you are a man, not the puppet of a preacher; but until you can giv some reason for your thought beyond a belief founded upon the ipse dixit of a paid advocate, don't come back! Freethought has no use for fools.

Christ's Courtesy.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Bennett, under the heading of "What I Don't Believe," No. 824, states that Jesus practically said that the woman of Samaria was a dog, or belonged to the dogs—an assertion a Christian friend says cannot be found in the Bible. Please giv chapter and verse, and oblige

A SUBSCRIBER.

The word Samaria should hav been Canaan. The words used are in Matthew xv, 22–27: "And behold a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto him saying, Hav mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil. But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him saying, Send her away, for she crieth after us. But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Then came she and worshiped him saying, Lord help me! But he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread and to cast it to the dogs. And she said, Truth, Lord; yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table."

The Samarians were also regarded as dogs by the Jews.

Comstock vs. Soap.

An esteemed correspondent writes us that he supposes we hav observed that Anthony Comstock, haveffected a corner in smut, is now helping his employer, Colgate, to make another linear convergence in soap. We had observed the fact alluded to, the circumstances of which are as follows: This apostle of smut and enemy of cleanliness unless attained by the use of the Colgate article of soap, last Saturday caused the arrest of William B. Higgins, the soap manufacturer of Nos. 234, 236, and 238 Cherry street, upon a charge of violating the lottery law in offering prizes to be drawn for by those purchasing soap. In addition to Mr. Higgins, his bookkeeper and the assistant bookkeeper were arrested. Comstock also made a raid upon the soap manufacturer's office and carried off a truck-load of advertising circulars. Those who attend the next annual meeting of the Society for the Suppression of Vice will hear these circulars alluded to in the secretary's report as four tons of obscene literature, with which wretches totally lost to all considerations save their own gain are corrupting the minds of our youth of both sexes; carrying moral devastation into female seminaries and leaving it there; opening the flood-gates of vice; reviving in the hind quarter of the nineteenth century the salacious days of Pompeii and Herculaneum.

That Soapman Higgins ever contemplated such havoc as this cannot for a moment be believed. When in an evil moment he offered a chromo of the Washington Family or the Signers of the Declaration of Independence to the fortunate purchaser of his soap who should get a ticket entitling him to one of these works of art, he never realized the number of homes he was about to wreck, the number of married men he was to drive outside the home circle to the haunts of crime, the number of customers he was seducing away from the moral and religious soap factory of Samuel Colgate. His only thought was to sell soap—that base compound of fat, margarates, and potassa. He never knew, and perhaps never will know, how many youths (of both sexes) with adolescent passions inflamed by solitary perusal of his fiendish offer to giv a 14x20 chromo of the Last Supper to the person holding the ticket for it, hav sought premature cessation of their vital functions in a thousand or more forms, preferring death to an existence forever tortured and tempted by sinful allurements to which the art of the chromo printer has added its diabolical glamour. Let him thank God that we hav a man (so-called) in the midst of us who takes interest enough in the welfare of our youth of both sexes, and in the soap business of the Cheeseborough Manufacturing Company, to remind him of the outgrowth of his hideous scheme. Let Mr. Higgins be prosecuted according to law. Samuel Colgate is the only man that has a legal right to sell soap in New York, or who will be allowed to giv instructions as to regulating the size of families. It is time soap men knew the former of these two facts; druggists and others hav already cultivated the acquaintance of the latter. Now, in addition to prosecuting the seller of prize soap, let Comstock confiscate the prizes for the benefit of his society, and the stock in trade for the use of its president, and the corner in filth and soap will be unassailable.

Not a Fabrication.

WASHINGTON CREEK, KAN., March 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please tell me through your paper where in the Bible it says that if your wife disagrees with you on religion, kill her, or words to that effect, and settle a dispute between me and one of my friends. I contend it is in the Bible. He says it is one of Bob Ingersoll's fabrications.

J. W. WATKINS.

If our friend's Christian friend will take down his dusty Bible (he must hav let it get dusty or he never would hav disputed the fact in question), and turn to the thirteenth chapter of Numbers he will read (verse 6): "If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods which thou hast not known, . . . thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him, neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him; but thou shalt surely kill him; thy hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hand of all the people. And thou shalt stone him with stones, that he die, because he hath sought to thrust thee away from the Lord thy God."

And this is God's command! Charitable, is it not? Because a man's wife, daughter, son, or friend differs with him as to which is the true god (a problem the wisdom of the world cannot solve) he shall "kill him." A man who worships such a God must be a brute indeed.

Ask the Minister.

DAVIS, ILL., March 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The Methodist minister of this place said in his sermon last Sunday evening that the brass serpent that Moses raised in the wilderness for the restoration of the Jews that were bitten by the fiery serpents was a fact in profane history as well as sacred. You will find the account in Numbers xxi. What I want to know is this: Is there any history of this transaction outside of the Bible? If so, I would like to know it? We hav no libraries here to consult. THOMAS HAYS.

Friend Hays should ask the minister for proof of his assertion. We know of no "profane" historian who mentions it, and never heard the claim made before. If the minister knows that it is in history he should be able to name the writer who was ignorant enough to quote it. The story has no foundation or existence outside the Bible, and all the preachers in the country cannot find it in the works of any reputable historian who received his facts from sources distinct from the Bible account.

Ingersoll Did Not Visit Slade.

PAXTON, ILL., March 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Why will men lie so? I clipped from THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 4th the account of an interview between Mr. Slade, the "test medium" of New York, and R. G Ingersoll, and forwarded the same to the latter gentleman, requesting him to affirm or deny the statements therein made, in an inclosed envelope, and return it to me. To-day I received the following indorsement on my note to him:

"The story is not true.

"R. G. INGERSOLL."

Will it not pay you to find who has imposed upon you and your readers? If I cannot rely upon such simple statements as the one alluded to, what hope is there of learning the truth by reading alleged facts? Let us purify the fountain, or quit drinking at it. Yours for the truth, L. H. IDE.

The story was probably started in the Jeffersonian by some Christian Spiritualist—that is, some Spiritualist in belief, but Christian in his methods. It is hard for church people to forget to lie.

Result of Joe Cook's Visit to India.

We are pleased to see another Infidel paper in the English language has been started away over in India. The Antichristian is the name of a new monthly published in Calcutta by Joggeshur Roy & Co., and edited by Kaliprasanna Kavyabisharad, fellow of the Antichristian Society. It is in pamphlet form and consists of twenty-four pages, devoted to exposing the absurdities of the Christian faith. Price, eight annas (twenty-five cents) per annum.

Plain Warnings.

The Rev. A. K. Strong, of Hoboken, N. J., had a stroke of apoplexy while preaching last Sunday. If he had been an Infidel, struck dead by lightning while expressing a doubt that Jehovah could send rain from a clear sky, this visitation might be considered an outbreak of the kind of wrath that effected the decease of Uzzah and the young man out West. Explanation in that case would be easy. As the matter stands, however, any one who can put forward a reasonable solution will be entitled to a chromo from the society to which Mr. Strong belongs, and the gratitude of a dumbfounded community. We are also called upon to chronicle the sudden demise of Eliza Squires, of Brooklyn, while on her way to church last Sunday. If Christians will ignore these palpable warnings, and continue to occupy pulpit and pew, it is not our funeral if they reap the consequences remarked in the foregoing. Our duty is accomplished when as a watchman on the walls we hav pointed out the danger.

MANY of the subscribers to the Round-the-World fund hav written us to know how much it will increase the cost to hav the books bound in extra binding, and saying they wished them in better than ordinary style. We can furnish the volumes bound in leather, with red edges, for 75 cents per volume extra, or $2.25 for the three; in morocco, with gilt edges, for $1 extra per volume, or $3 for the three volumes. All wanting them that way will please notify us, remitting the amount, and the books will be bound as desired. We will feel obliged if they will order early, so we can tell how many to bind in leather and morocco.

"CEPHAS," in the Banner of Light, puts this question to the ministers: "How much can we expect from the clerical profession, when, according to their own record, it has taken the learned gentlemen over eighteen hundred years to find out how to interpret Christianity?" and adds, "The general impression is that Prof. Fisher, the Yale theologian, who was expected to annihilate Ingersoll, has begged the question. Theology is practically a dead letter with many of the leading men of the Protestan Christian church of this country. This item of news should be telegraphed to the rural clergy."

WE hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three leading Liberals of this country—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will be sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine, $1.

BY special invitation, on the afternoon of the 9th of this month, Dr. Juliet H. Severance addressed the Assembly at the State House in Madison, Wis., on the right of woman to the electiv franchise. Her address was listened to with marked attention by the members and visitors, who frequently and loudly applauded.

DR. J. H. HILL and Eneas Scott, of Franklin, Ill., hav joined the National Liberal League as life members. Mr. Underwood will please take notice that life members don't usually go into an organization that is "dead."

MOSES HULL has removed from Linesville to Erie, Pa. He can be addressed at 225 Sassafras street.

Obituary.

DIED—In Paterson, N. J., on March 10th, after a brief illness, Campbell Wilson, in the sixty-second year of his age.

Liberalism has lost no truer friend or warmer advocate than in the death of Mr. Wilson. As one of our local papers well said, "he was one of nature's noblemen." Kind and generous to a fault, never vindictiv, even towards those who tried to injure him, he had no feeling of revenge. His faults were few, his virtues many. None knew him but to honor and respect him, and they that knew him best loved and respected him most. In him the Paterson Liberal League has lost one of its best and most devoted workers, its most liberal supporter.

Mr. Wilson was born in Paisley, Scotland, in 1820, and when quite young learned to weave the celebrated "Paisley shawls," making a first-class workman. Coming to this country some fourteen or sixteen years ago, he learned the silk-weaving trade, in which he was equally successful. And some four or five years ago he invented a superior kind of army belt for soldiers, and I am informed that it is now largely used by our armies. But avarice and dishonesty robbed him of his just reward. It is fitting that I should state that he was a life-long Liberal, having been raised in the congenial ways of Owenism, his father and mother both being great admirers of Robert Owen; a warm admirer of the Boston Investigator, and honored it for its forty years' devotion to liberty, equality, and fraternity. He also helped to spread the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, being a great admirer of Mr. Bennett. The members of the League attended his funeral, and from the "Truth Seeker Collection" the writer read over him Austin Holyoake's beautiful service for the dead.

JOHN WARR,
Sec. Paterson Liberal League.

[From Monday's Sun.]

Beecher preached yesterday in Plymouth church, after an absence of three weeks on a lecturing tour through the West. At the close of the services the deacons and others crowded to the foot of the pulpit stairs to learn whether he had fully recovered from his sudden sickness in Chicago. His face was not quite so ruddy as usual.

"Oh, I got over that in the skip of a grasshopper," said Beecher, in answer to an anxious inquiry.

H. B. Claflin reached over the Rev. Edward Beecher's shoulder to seize Beecher's hand, and said, with a laugh:

"I heard you drank too much bad whisky out there."

"Some people," replied Beecher, "always judge other folks from their own standpoint."

Orthodoxy Run Mad.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: A. I. Root, of Medina, Ohio, publishes a monthly entitled Gleanings in Bee Culture, now in its ninth volume Three or four years ago he was "converted," and opened a theological department in his monthly, thus thrusting his idiosyncrasies before his subscribers. much to the disgust of some, to the amusement of others, while still another class imbibed his eccentriciti s with avidity.

Prayer seems to be his forte, and although his form may differ, his thought is probably similar to that of the honest old deacon who opened with, "O Lord, we would not presume to dictate. but beg leave to offer a few suggestions."

Friend Root employs seventy or eighty operativs in the manufacture of bee-hives and their appendages. His establishment is a pocket edition of church and state. He not only prays for salvation in the next life, but for pecuniary success in this. When anything goes wrong in the factory he goes down on his knees and asks his savior to set the matter right. He has published a book entitled "The A B C of Bee Culture." I hav a copy before me, and quote from the Introduction:

"If you should happen along here about noon, you would find that the engineer always stops the engin promptly at ten minutes to noon, and that the hands then gather in the largest room in the building around an organ that they hav purchased with their own money. After all join in singing a hymn your humble servant is expected to read a verse or two from the Bible, and close the ten minute's devotional exercise with a few remarks and prayer. . . . Right over the open window at which I sit writing is a stone bee-hive, which you can see in the picture. Over the hive is this inscription, 'In God we trust.' So long as we continue to trust in him, and look to him daily for help, the business will continue to prosper, and we shall be of use to ourselvs and to all those about us, but just so soon as we cease to trust in him the business will go down; saloons will spring up about us, and ruin and devastation will be the end."

Mr. Root believes in a personal God and a personal devil, and as I will show further along, by his own words, his God does not observe fixed and uniform laws as his method of action, but acts in each specific case as its merits or his caprice dictates. His devil is also above all law, and all who think or act in opposition to the Bible are seduced by Satan.

But after all his trusting in God, our friend is as vigilant to "keep his powder dry," figurativly speaking, as the veriest Atheist. For, although he appears to be perfectly honest in pecuniary matters, though no more so since than before his "conversion," he inculcates the most rigid industry and economy through Gleanings, and as we hav seen, trusts his God but ten minutes a day.

Having patronized Gleanings from its birth, and dealt with its proprietor to some extent for several years. I took the liberty of replying to some of his views, hoping, if not able to convince him of his absurdities, at least to checkmate some of them in the estimation of some of his readers.

I hav written many brief articles for his theological department, and find that if he thinks he can refute one he admits it with comments; but as he has refused several, I consider that he must hav regarded them as rather difficult to answer.

For illustration I giv the following:

Friend Root: I see your method of prayer is similar to that of Fred Douglass, as he used to giv it in his lectures. He said that when a slave he prayed for freedom with his lips a great deal, but that his prayers were never answered until he began to pray with his legs. So I suppose your prayers with your lips in secret hav to be supplemented by your "Home Papers," to be "read of all men," in order to insure fruition. Stephen Young.
Memphis, Mo., May 5 1880.

To this he replied thus:

To the first part of your proposition I should most certainly assent, friend Young. Hav I not urged, over and over again, with all the energy I possess, that God cannot, from the very nature of things, answer the prayers of a lazy man? etc.

To this I returned the following:

Thanks for the insertion of my communication in June number, and kind comment thereon. I send a word of rejoinder in the same spirit. You say, "God cannot, from the very nature of things, answer the prayer of a lazy man." But you will, of course, defer to the following from Jesus, "With God all things are possible" (Matt. xix, 26).

Therefore, when God sees fit, he can not only answer the lazy man's prayer, but cause him to be lazy no longer. In like manner all mankind can be transformed into saints, and the millennium at once ushered in.

Now, friend Root, if your theory of the efficacy of prayer is well founded, this consummation so devoutly to be wished lacks only a suitable invocation. Stephen Young.
Memphis, Mo., June 15, 1880.

Even the Bible, friend Young, must be taken with reason, and is to be interpreted by the sound common sense God has given us for the purpose, etc.

My reply to this has never appeared in Gleanings. I kept no copy, but I pointed out many absurdities and contradictions found in the Bible that cannot be reconciled with reason, philosophy, or common sense.

I finally wrote, mildly censuring him for not giving the brief article, which called out a note in which he said, "I cannot remember what your letter was. I presume I clipped from it whatever I thought valuable, or that needed an answer." This I consider disingenuous.

A month or two ago I sent him the following:

THOUGHTS ON PRAYER.

Friend Root: Although truth may be the object of both, difference in organization, education, and experience has led us to different conclusions on this question. But this difference should no more engender intolerance or uncharitableness than should the difference in the color of our eyes or hair.

While I consider the entire universe, both visible and invisible, as governed by perfect and immutable law, you, with equal sincerity, believe there are no fixed and uniform laws on the subject named, above, but that the infinit mind is swayed or not, according to the merits of each particular supplication. This I learn from a letter now before me, in which you say, "But I cannot just see where mercy comes in where there are only inexorable laws"

But, friend Root, you must believe that external nature is under the control of inexorable law, and yet we see the manifestations of mercy on every hand: in the productions of the earth, its grains, fruits, and flowers, the noble horse, and the busy honey-bee; in the glorious king of day, and the placid queen of night; in the magnificent panorama of the sidereal heavens, and in the existence and society of mankind, and our own dear friends and loved ones.

Instead of inexorable law being incompatible with mercy, I can but regard it as necessary thereto. Were I to believe that God could be turned from his purpose one iota by the combined prayers of all mankind, I could but tremble for the destiny of our race.

But the idea appears so utterly absurd that my trust in the power, wisdom, and goodness by which the universe is governed, is positiv to the last degree. And this perfect confidence, that nothing is left to chance or finite wisdom, but that the infinit mind controls all "without variableness or shadow of turning, I regard as the greatest mercy that can be vouchsafed to man while here below: it softens every hardship and soothes every pain.

The great error of the past has been the doctrin that evil exists contrary to the scheme and will of the Infinit. But whoever can divest himself of preconceived opinions, and bestow a moment's thought on the subject, must see that evil is not only unavoidable in an undeveloped age, but absolutely necessary to human progress.

Hunger, abstractly considered, is felt as an evil, but without it primitiv man would hav starved to death. But the pangs of hunger compelled him to exert both mind and body in obtaining food, and thus was the initial step in the path of endless human progress taken.

A totally ignorant race, or individual, can be moved to thought or action only by physical necessity; but when sufficiently unfolded, knowledge is sought for its own sake. And is it not evident that crime and cruelty were required to call forth the sympathies of the heart?

But for necessity, pain, toils, and tribulations mankind to-day, had it been possible for them to survive to the present time, would be about as activ, intelligent, and sympathetic as oysters.

And thus are vindicated the ways of God to man. As evil performs its mission it will disappear.

Here is Bible for those who need it:

"I form the light and create darkness. I make peace and create evil. I, the Lord, do all these things" (Is. xlv, 7).

"Shall there be evil in the city and the Lord hath not done it?" (Amos iii, 6).

Scarcely a decade has rolled away since prayers were offered up in Illinois for rain during a dry time! But meteorologists assure us that however fickle winds and storms may appear, they are controled by exact law, and petitions for changes in the weather hav ceased.

And but a few years ago the governor of this great state of Missouri appointed a day for the good people of the commonwealth to meet at their usual places of worship, and unitedly implore the Almighty to drive the grasshoppers out of the state! But it will probably never be repeated.

In all soberness let me ask, Does an all-wise God need or heed promptings from us in running the universe? Instead of importuning him to do thus and so, let us rather study to learn his will from the great volume of nature which he has spread out before us. We see that evolution is a universal law of both matter and mind: let us then consider him as praying to us, through that law, to "come up higher." Let us co-operate with the infinit in lifting our common humanity from the darkness of ignorance, superstition, and bigotry into the glorious light of reason and toleration.
Memphis, Mo., April, 1881. Stephen Young.

Such was substantially the article sent, but which is refused.

"'Tis education forms the common mind,
Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."

I once heard Dr. K., of Mechanicsville, Iowa, boast to an audience that he had never allowed himself to entertain the shadow of a doubt of the truth of anything taught him at Sunday-school when a child. In other words, he had never exercised his manhood's reason on the absurdities of "orthodoxy." And Mr. Root, having spoken of attending Sunday-school when a child, I asked him if his new-born zeal, as he seemed to consider it, was not simply his juvenil impressions asserting themselvs. He substantially admitted it by saying that, all through his Infidel life, they often rose up against him. So it seems that, although common sense labored to take the twist and distortions out of the twig, it was found to be a hopeless task.

Had Dr. K., A. I. Root, and millions of other Christians been born in Mohammedan countries, they would now swear by the Koran. It is only the plastic and unreasoning mind of childhood that is fitted to receive and retain the absurd, incongruous, and blasphemous doctrins of Christianity.

A. I. Root desires to do all the good he can, I fully believe; but how can an intelligent person hav much respect for his wisdom who reads the following passage in "Our Homes," in the April number of Gleanings, page 197? "Some may say, 'I am ready to accept the New Testament; but how about the Old?' My friend, your house is on fire, and the first thing to do now is to go for water, wherever you can find it. After we hav put the fire out, and the smoke has cleared away, we will hav time and a clear vision; but for the present trust Jesus. He says over and over that the Old Testament is all right, and we are just going to put it all on his shoulders. If any trouble comes in here, at the bar of judgment we will throw all the blame on him, God's only son."

Is this the language of a fanatic, or a monomaniac? It must come from one or the other.

Whoever will read the twenty-first and twenty-second chapters of 2 Chronicles will see, if the "Old Testament is all right," that Ahaziah, one of the kings of Jerusalem, was two years older than his father, Jehoram.

"And the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh to his friend" (Ex. xxxiii, 11). "And the Lord called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou? And he said, I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid" (Gen. iii, 9, 10). "Then went up Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel. And they saw the God of Israel. They saw God, and did eat and drink" (Ex. xxiv, 9, 10, 11).

"No man hath seen God at any time" (John i, 18). "Ye hav neither heard his voice, at any time, nor seen his shape" (John v, 37). "And he said, Thou canst not see my face; for there shall no man see me and liv" (Ex. xxxiii, 20). "Whom no man hath seen nor can see" (Tim. vi, 16).

How can a man so stultify every spark of reason and common sense as to pretend to believe all this? And there are scores upon scores of passages, equally as contradictory and false, contained in both the Old and New Testaments.

Mr. Root deals in Italian queens. A customer to whom he sent one, and who had imbibed the Root religion, in acknowledging her receipt, said that when he released her from the cage among his black bees, she started off on the wing—which was very natural—and he thought he had lost her, but the Lord returned her, and she entered the hive all right. I suppose he would hav ascribed his loss to the devil had she not returned. Stephen Young.

"God Reigns!"

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: A morning paper states that Miss Rosa Stark, of Raleigh, N. C., gave birth to twins; murdered them to hide her shame; then died herself. "God reigns!" shouts the church. "All power is from God," says the "holy" book.

"Thou shalt not commit adultery," thundered Jehovah from Mount Sinai; yet this same God creates millions of babes in that unhallowed state. Their throats are cut from ear to ear, their brains dashed out upon the nearest rock, while Jehovah stands looking on. "God reigns!" If such is the "reign" of God, who would not giv three cheers for the devil?

Is not his record the whiter of the two?

Has not every state in this Union been compelled to come to the rescue of this God concerning infanticide?

Is there one state whose people dare trust Jehovah to protect his helpless babes any sooner than they would the cobblestones in in the street? Even after giving him every help, does he not allow the butchery of his babes the wide world over? Can any brain enumerate the millions whose lives went out in blood in the six thousand years of Jehovah's "reign?" Has this all-wise, all-powerful, all-merciful God ever rescued one innocent mortal? Are not thousands upon thousands of sweet girls lured to ruin, while Jehovah lifts not a finger to interfere, yet bragging throughout his entire book of his unlimited power? Can any man of heart and brain respect such a being? For one, with scorn I reject the Bible God.

Does not his record put to shame the naked savages of the South Sea Islands? Within their bosom beats a heart; never hav I found one in Jehovah's breast. Wm. W. Foster.

One World at a Time.

Even if there is a really a future world, what can any one do about it here? As they did nothing to get here, what can they do here so as to get to any other world? Is not one world about as much as one ought to attend to, and do his work well? What time they spend for any other world is a loss to this world, exchanging a real world for an imaginary one; doing here what they ought not to hav done, and leaving undone what they ought to hav done. What a happy time it will be when every one givs all their time and attention for the benefits of this world, and lets all the other worlds take care of themselvs.

Can there be anything on the face of the globe that has no opposit. That which has no opposit, is just nothing. It takes two opposits to make one. If there is nothing short, there can be nothing long; nothing wide, nothing narrow; no light, no heavy; no bad, no good; no hot, no cold; no dark, no light; no beginning, no end; no life, no death. Everything that has a beginning, has an end. That which has no beginning, has no ending. Everything that has one end has two ends. So I conclude that time, space, and nature and materials had no beginning, and will hav no ending. But all forms hav a beginning, and must hav an end. Every living thing that has life, has death. It takes life to make death; and death to make life; so all life has two ends; all knowledge has two ends; all feeling has two ends; all memory has two ends; so everythigg that has a beginning has two ends.

But the materials must return to their original, so as to keep the original in good working order. To keep taking from and not returning to the original would be annihilation to nature. If everything that grows and has life was not decomposed, vegetation would be extinct, and there would become no life on the earth. If water should always evaporate, and never condense or return, it would not be very long before there would be no water. The same rule applies to human being, mind, or spirit. If there is any special substance that makes mind or spirit, a continual taking from and not returning will in time use that substance up, and will be deficient in that article, and the results might not be very desirable to the human family, if they should continue to make their appearance.

It is very plain that the mind is the result of organization; there are no two exactly alike. Minds differ, as their organizations differ. If the mind is separate from the body, how could any one get crazy, or hav delirium tremens, or hydrophobia, or ony disease of the mind. It is very plain that the mind can't outliv the body. They had their beginning together, and they hav their ending together. I think that I hav shown it to be one of the most ridiculous notions that was ever invented that any one can liv in or hav anything to do with any other world but this present one.

As Solomon of old has said, I see it in all vanity. When the body dies, so mind or spirit is about played out. Take good care of the body, and the soul will take care of itself. But priests and ministers seem to be doing their level best to rob the body to save the imaginary soul. Cash down for real estate in the other world.

One of the greatest misfortunes is that women that are born with good common sense, do exchange it with priests and ministers for nonsense and superstition, and make their husbands sustain it, and force it on their children, which takes them a long time to outgrow and get rid of. Mothers should be very cautious about telling wrong stories to their children; it is a very bad way to teach children to tell the truth.

Comstock Rebuked.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: You hav doubtless heard that Anthony Comstock, through his Western "bully," R. W. McAfee, was trying to get his "obscene bill," passed by the legislature of Wisconsin. You will be doubtless gratified to learn that he has met with a prompt and signal defeat in the free West, which wants no Comstock in its pie. A sneaking attempt was made to get the bill rushed through during the haste and confusion of the closing days of the session. It was quietly introduced through a Mr. Shepard, of Fond du Lac, and referred to the judiciary committee. There it was allowed to quietly repose for some time, and very few people in the state had the slightest knowledge that such a disinterested and pious Christian gentleman as Mr. Comstock was weeping over their depravity in his sanctum away off in New York, and devising ways and means for their salvation. Just before the close of the session his two equally meritorious lieutenants, McAfee, of St. Louis, and Penfield, of Chicago, who, having presumably purified and sanctified those whilom sink-holes of iniquity, came up to Wisconsin to warn us of the wrath to come, and incidentally to do a little lobbying for the "obscene bill," working through the Young Men's Christian Association, one of whose shining lights has for years been engaged in selling rubber goods, such as these saintly moralists condemn as immoral; they induced a number of the prominent citizens of Milwaukee to call a meeting, ostensibly for the "suppression of vice," at Plankinton House, to which a number of very respectable citizens were invited specially by card. This was something new to most Milwaukeans, and thirty or forty respectable and intelligent gentlemen met at the time and place designated, in the ladies' parlors of the hotel. Mr. Penfield sat down with his back against the closed door, and all the other doors were carefully locked. Penfield, who, it is said, having failed to make a respectable living in the insurance business, has gone into the obscenity business on a salary, got up and depicted in glowing terms how the "filthy and turbid stream of vice was flowing over the country, and to a large extent in our very midst," and the noble work that pure philanthropist, Anthony Comstock, had done in the East toward cleansing and purifying its fountain-head. He referred modestly to his own work in Chicago, but failed to recite some of his own experiences, both before and since becoming an "obscenist," which might hav been quite interesting. He did not even allude to any little affairs connected with theatricals, that got a well-meaning Methodist preacher into trouble, or various little rencounters somewhat known to fame and a reporter of the Chicago Times.

He was followed by the indefatigable McAfee, whose blushes of modesty could be detected even behind his Hibernian-hued beard, as he opened a smut-bag and carefully spread out and dilated upon various silly, smutty circulars and pictures, which he had in his possession, but failed to explain just where or how he got them. The inference drawn was that, with a prurient and morbid love of such things, he had for some years been engaged in the laudable work of making a collection of the vilest and smuttiest articles procurable. Old gray-bearded and bald-headed men gazed upon voluptuous pictures with suppressed admiration, and confessed they had never seen anything like them. Much of the stock in trade exhibited must hav been collected fifteen or twenty years ago, before their importation into this country was prohibited; for a gentleman who was present, and who was much better posted upon these matters than McAfee himself, is reported to hav said that he had not seen anything of the kind in circulation for the past fifteen years. Many of the circulars were cheap, flimsy, and perfectly transparent frauds, got up by impecunious dead-beats in some of the eastern cities, and I will venture to say not a single one of the specimens was ever circulated in our state, or, if they were, would excite only the contempt of any wide-awake boy or girl of the period, however terribly they might work upon the sensitiv nerves of our red-faced, red-whiskered St. Louis virtuoso. And just here it may be pertinent to inquire whether this McAfee is not doing more real injury to the cause of virtue and morality in engaging in this dirty, disreputable business of carrying around and exhibiting these obscene and filthy things for a livelihood, than the parties who originally produced them. Is he not corrupting the morals of a quiet, virtuous community, like that of Milwaukee, by such acts, and putting ideas into those respectable old gray heads of which they would never hav dreamed except for such indecent exhibitions? The best joke of the smutty exhibition, however, was a little paper box, about one and one-half by three inches, which McAfee laid on the table, and declared contained an immoral rubber fac simile of what the Egyptians worshiped as the emblem of life, and which, he unblushingly announced to the horrified audience, were being distributed promiscuously through female academies to such an extent that many of these institutions would not publish a catalog for fear that the inmates would receive by next mail one of these instruments of slow torture and lingering death! He was careful not to expose the contents of this box, although the eyes of more than one gray-head were directed toward it curiously. The knowing ones present, however, who had seen such things many years ago, knew that the box could not possibly contain what it was represented to inclose, and failed to tear their hair in disconsolate frenzy when Mr. McAfee, with tears streaming down his red face, detailed the case of a poor girl who ended her existence in an insane asylum through this devilish contrivance; and one was even so irreverent as to whisper to a friend at his elbow, "Served her right—couldn't fool our western girls with such frauds!"

At the conclusion of this highly-indecent and immoral exhibition, for which McAfee, however, failed to pay the municipal authorities the usual showman's license, feeling that he had sufficiently worked up his audience, he pulled a bill out of his pocket, and stated that it had been introduced into the legislature, and was a sovereign panacea for all these ills. He read it, but when it was found to embrace a variety of subjects not covered by the title, such as patent medicins of a certain class, and various other things not usually considered immoral or obscene, and would giv the vice-manufacturing society the right to search, and seize, and annoy various classes of respectable people, including druggists, newspapers, photographers, art-dealers, and book-sellers, one gentleman present had the bravery to get up and object to the bill as too sweeping. He was browbeaten and coaxed in, however, and induced to let his name go on the committee, McAfee assuring him that the business of specialists (and, inferentially, those above named) was only a cover for sending vile literature and immoral articles into schools and families. Had St. Paul or St. Peter been present, the fate of Ananias and Sapphira would hav overtaken McAfee then and there; but they were not, and a mysterious providence still spares him for some good purpose. Not a third of those present signed the petition for the passage of the bill, and the next meeting of the society was attended by only two or three persons. It was evident that the devious ways of A. C. and his agents were already pretty well known in Milwaukee. However, just before the close of the session, McAfee and a few gentlemen who had been entrapped into favoring his schemes, appeared before the judiciary committee of the assembly, armed with the well-worn smut-bag, and began his story of falsehood and filth. Some of the members left the room in disgust, but McAfee read a letter from A. C., and continued to pour out his "turbid stream" of obscenity, and to dilate on "villains in human shape," even after the expiration of the time to which he had been limited. When the disgusted committee met again, annoyed that any one should think them such consummate asses as to be imposed upon by such shallow tricks, they recommended that the obscenity bill be "indefinitly postponed," and it was so ordered by a vote of the house. McAfee, who felt confident of success, suddenly found all the wind taken out of him, and did not know what struck him.

Lot's Wife.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Having had great expectations of entertainment in reading Mr. Bennett's interview with Lot's wife, I am greatly disappointed in reading his twenty-fourth chapter of his voyage by his not finding Mrs. Lot within the scope of his travels. Thus we hav failed to receive what might hav been related by this fine old Hebrew lady, all of the olden time. He was within a very short distance of her, and yet he sets her down as a myth. Mrs. Lot, he says, is entirely gone. Not so, unless she has dematerialized within the later years. She was standing at the time of Josephus, who givs an account of her as continually turning back to view the city as she went from it when fire and brimstone were about to be rained from heaven. "She, being too nicely inquisitiv what would become of the city, although God had forbidden so to do, was changed into a pillar of salt, for I hav seen it, and it remains at this day." Such is the testimony of Josephus for the "grand old history." In the "Narrativ of the United States Expedition to the River Jordan and the Dead Sea," by W. F. Lynch, Commander of the Expedition, he is no less faithful to the venerable mother in Israel. He visited her at Usdum, and says, "We found the pillar to be of solid salt, capped with carbonate of lime." She "is about forty feet high," and certainly ought to hav been within the vision of Mr. Bennett, and yet he says that she is a myth. It won't do. There she is, "one entire mass of crystallization," says Captain Lynch. Had Mr. Bennett followed on to know this salted mother in Israel he would doubtless hav found the salt had not yet lost its savor, but as described by the brave commodore, so is she now. Will not Mr. Bennett's readers be sadly disappointed, and refuse to be comforted because she is not in his letter otherwise than as a myth, and not as a verity of salt from flesh and blood? Had she been permitted to come to the front and spoken for herself in her esthetical cap, what a narrativ of the ages she could hav given us. A company might hav been formed for transporting her to the Central Park as companion of the Egyptian obelisk, or Mr. Barnum alone might hav bargained for her as a most desirable addition to his museum. What a magnificent speculation she would hav proved! How kindly she would hav trained the baby elephant in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and even old Jumbo himself on his arrival would hav rejoiced with an exceeding great joy to make the acquaintance with the giantess forty feet high.

There would hav been millions in her. The people would hav come from the east and the west, from the north and the south, to sit down in the kingdom of the museum, nor would there hav been any lack of shekels for payment at sight of the greatest wonder of the world. As a giantess, her hight of forty feet need not be a stone of stumbling and rock of offense when we consider the giants of those days, men of renown and sons of God. How much she would hav confirmed our Christian Spiritualists in their "grand old history!" Pharaoh's daughter would hav given a test of old acquaintance. The Virgin Mary may hav appeared psychometrically with her son of man from the East to testify of old things passed away. The esthetics might hav sung her somewhat on this wise:

> Rich and rare was the cap she wore
> In carbonate by the Dead Sea shore;
> Not much she melted in the rain,
> That fell from heaven upon the plain;
> But there she stands, the salted wife,
> And stole a savor unto life;
> In goodly shape and poise sublime,
> A monument of olden time.

SELAH.

The Day and Its Work.

The complete extirpation of the errors of the church is essential to the end that humanity may be free to grow and ascend to higher planes of thought and action. So long as the incubus of the old teleological conception of the infinit and of man and his destiny rests upon the weary shoulders of the children of earth we can never hope to successfully cope with the giant wrongs which afflict us. This is why we rejoice when the heavy sledge of the iconoclast smashes to dust the hideous idols which men and women hav so long ignorantly worshiped. This is why we can consent to no compromise with supernaturalism, and shout ever the old cry of delenda est Carthago against every creed and dogma that claims authority outside of the common life and experience of mankind.

But we must not imagin that this is all that we hav to do. A Liberalism which fears to grapple with a popular wrong is not the Liberalism for us. We cannot stand still. Unless we take hold and do our level best to make the race better and happier, here and now, we shall find ourselvs in the rear ranks of the army of progress. An Atheism, however earnest it may be, which does not concern itself with the real ills brought upon us by bad laws, ignorance, intemperance, etc., cannot long endure. Freethought is essential to progress, but it is not all that is needed. A great majority of the Freethinkers whom I meet are averse to organization, care nothing for the social side of our work, and seem to utterly fail to realize the necessity that rests upon us to do something toward the education of the rising generation. They are content that the church should remain the teacher of our children. Many and many a man hav I met during the last two years who objected to music in our meetings and conventions, objected to Liberal Sunday-schools and Liberal camp-meetings, who can see no use or beauty in fiction and no need of a literature for the young. I hav conversed with hundreds of men who once took Freethought papers who hav ceased to read them, saying, "I know all that; I do not need to read; I got through with all those old notions long ago," and so on ad nauseam. Against such stupidity the bravest apostles of the gospel of humanity battle in vain.

Now, these remarks are merely preliminary to a few practical suggestions upon the subject of temperance. Considerable has been said upon this matter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of late, and Mrs. H. S. Lake has clearly pointed out to us the necessity of doing something. What shall it be? Suppose that in every town there was fitted up a large, well-ventilated, well-lighted room, provided with billiard-tables, card tables, games of chess, checkers, etc. Hav lemonade, ice cream, oysters, fruit, and other delicacies of the season. Supply the tables with an abundance of good reading matter, books, papers, magazines, etc. Adorn the walls with pictures, mottoes, and busts. Don't fail to make provision for music. Hav a geological cabinet, aquariums, and herbariums. Sell tea and coffee. Hav for sale books and papers. Hav your reading-room provided with stationery and conveniences for writing, make a small charge, say five cents per hour, for the privilege of reading or writing in this room. Charge actual cost for materials used. Endeavor to make the institution self-sustaining, paying just wages to the attendants, but do not try to amass gold by this means. Refuse to admit no one who behaves himself or herself while there. Invite contributions of books and papers from all. Hav a great variety of reading matter, and make woman's presence a power in this place.

Thus shall you keep thousands from the dangerous allurements of the saloon. The stranger stopping in your town shall hav a cosy, home-like place in which he can pass a spare hour or two. Do not be afraid of making the place too attractiv.

It is impossible to estimate the good which might be accomplished by the establishment of these inns throughout the country. Their internal arrrangements could be varied to suit the requirements of the different cities and towns. What League shall be first to act in this matter? Is Freethought indeed a logic of life to us? E. C. WALKER.

Commendation and Suggestion.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I notice of all the Liberal papers yours takes precedence of combining the two wings of Freethinkers—the one Materialism, the other Spiritualism—both working in their different channels of thought regarding another world, yet in accord relativ to the political, religious, and social systems in this. The total separation of church and state, abolishing the order of chaplains paid out of Freethinkers' pockets, and discontinuing fasts and feast days which are obnoxious to rationalistic minds, is enough for such to co-operate to check the aggressiv movements of the Christian army. When the Liberal papers discountenance, as your paper does, sectarianism and labor for humanity, this emancipated world of legislativ bigotry will be a true foundation for a progressed life, or living as may be determined. So it is a safe and sure thing to organize, to first make our laws laws of justice to all, neither sectional nor sectarian. Our free press must take the lead to gather in the demoralized, disorganized forces to work for their liberties. All in favor of this work send for the February Man, the organ of the National Liberal League, and other particulars at 744 Broadway, New York, and know how to go to work and meet the Young Men's Christian Association. Then they will make about as much as they did in the imprisonment of the publisher of THE TRUTH SEEKER. For the grand army of Liberalists will be a power.

Jesus Christ and Others.

Marcus Aurelius said that to seek for figs in winter was the act of a madman. Jesus sought for figs in winter, and cursed the tree for not bearing them. Which do you think was the wiser?

Caligula said those who disbelieved in his divinity—a part of the notional religion—were more to be pitied than alarmed. Jesus said those who disbelieved in his divinity—an entirely new doctrin—should be damned. Which do you think was the more moderate?

Mohammed said that God had given him no authority to punish men with fire. Jesus said that he would punish his enemies with fire. Which do you think was the more merciful?

Lord Byron said (in Don Juan):

> "The drying up a single tear hath more
> Of honest fame than shedding seas of gore."

Jesus said, "I come not to send peace on earth, but a sword." Which do you think uttered the more imposing sentiments?

Epicurus said that he must be foolish who believed that the gods would change their purposes to accommodate men. Jesus said that if any two of his followers should agree to ask God anything, he would do it. Which do you think showed most common sense?

Dr. Johnson said that men were seldom so innocently employed as in making money. Jesus sent all money-makers to hell. Which do you think had the better idea of promoting civilization?

Mohammed also said that inadvertent expressions, even in an oath, ought not to be regarded. Jesus said that men should giv an account (to their creator) of every idle word. Which do you think had the more rational idea of justice?

Plato taught the immortality of the soul, Jesus the resurrection of the body Which had the most agreeable, probable, and philosophical idea of a future state?

Herbert Spencer thinks that those who do not agree with him hav, nevertheless, the exact degree of wisdom which their vocation in the universe requires. Jesus was in the habit of calling those who disagreed with him snakes, foxes, children of the devil; and, in his more amiable moods, of blubbering over their blindness. Which view of existence do you think the more satisfactory?

Thomas Paine said shortly before his death, "I hav lived an honest and useful life; and I commend my soul, without fear, into the hands of my creator, God." Jesus said, shortly before his death, "My God, my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" Which do you think made the best finish? An answer will oblige

C. L. JAMES.

M. RENAN, the French historian, has written an essay on the book of Ecclesiastes, "or the preacher," as it is called in the Bible. He finds that the Hebrew name of Ecclesiastes is "Cohelet," which does not mean "preacher" at all, but is merely the nom de plume adopted by the writer. Ecclesiastes, he says, was by no means intended for a religious work, but is made up of the skeptical complainings of a pessimistic Jew, in which the government of the world by God and his interference in the affairs of men are denied. In saying "All is vanity," "the preacher" referred to religion as much as to anything else. He denounces fanaticism as well as aggressiv skepticism. The last two verses of the twelfth chapter, M. Renan concludes, were not written by the author of the rest of the book; and any one who will take the trouble to read them in connection with the verses before them, will recognize the hand of the interpolater in the sudden change in the style of composition. To the skeptic Ecclesiastes, read by the new light which Renan throws upon it, is more coherent than before, and that is all; while the believer in the inspiration of "the preacher" will regard the book as robbed of all that could make it of value to any one.

THE Spiritualists of Buffalo and vicinity will celebrate the thirty-fourth anniversary of Spiritualism in St. James Hall, Friday, March 31, 1882. Respectfully, MRS. EMMA A. SABINE.

COVINGTON, IND., March 10, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclose find $8—$3 to apply on my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $5 for the books of Mr. Bennett's travel. I did not encourage the trip, though I am willing to help him return to our own country. I had great fear he was not able to withstand the trip, but now I hav good hopes of his ability to make it, providing he keeps out of that holy stream Jordan. I highly approve of Mr. Macdonald's management of the paper during Mr. Bennett's absence, and think perhaps a better could not hav been found. My best wishes to all the office.
Yours truly, SCHUYLER LA TOURETTE.

FOREST GROVE, OR., Feb. 25, 1882.
FRIEND MACDONALD: I didn't subscribe $5 to send our old friend Bennett around the world. But I see in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER the list is still open, and times are a little better now than a few months back. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from its first publication and purchased a number of books from your office, and still wish to promulgate Freethought and aid in the circulation of Freethought literature, so please find inclosed $10 to assist in bringing our old tried and esteemed friend Bennett home to the bosom of his family and friends—$5 for W. D. Hoxter and $5 for your friend and well-wisher, P. G. BUFORD.

NORTHFIELD, MINN., March 6, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Please send by return mail "Anthony Comstock, His Career of Cruelty and Crime;" T. B. Wakeman's "Liberty and Purity," and the first number of League Man. In the St. Paul Pioneer Press of Saturday, March 4th, is the following: "In his lecture on the corruption of youth in New York last evening Mr. Comstock gave a good account of his work. Since he left the position of clerk in a dry-goods store to endeavor to suppress vice, he has secured the arrest of 582 persons, 251 of whom were sentenced to pay fines aggregating $63,931; he has seized and destroyed 27,584 pounds of immoral books, and 203,238 pounds of obscene pictures. Such achievements are sufficient to win for Mr. Comstock the gratitude of respectable people everywhere, and the indorsement he receives from men of the highest character is an ample guarantee that the methods he employs are honorable. A great work is yet before him, and he should hav hearty support in its prosecution." The Pioneer Press has a large circulation, is read by hundreds of men and women, and the above article is accepted by two-thirds of them as truth, and they believe that Comstock is a good and honorable man. The true character of this wolf in sheep's clothing is too well known to some of us to have any toleration for the above article.
Yours truly, MRS. S. J. LENONT.

SALEVILLE, MONTANA, Feb. 20, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Saleville is twelve miles southwest of Bozeman, the county seat of Gallatin county. South of Salevile a few miles is the Bear Creek school district, near the home of Thomas Burk, an occasional correspondent of your paper, and most noted Liberal of this region. Friends Burk, Tidball, and others concluded to try to organize a League, so on the evening of the 24th of January notice was given of a meeting. The school board of that district, who are all good Christians, refused Mr. Tidball, the teacher, the key of the house. That evening, as soon as school closed, they came to the school-house with key, hammer, and nails, to securely close the house; but lo, two good Liberals were in possession and "held the fort!" After hearing some good advice from Mr. Holloway, the foremost citizen of that district, who had contributed more to build that house than all the good Christians of the school board, they left. At the hour appointed the house was full, though the night was cold. After short speeches by Burk, Tidball, and myself we called for joiners—not mourners—and promptly enrolled forty names—not infants and children—including the very best citizens of the valley. The ladies brought a plentiful supply of "grub," on which everybody feasted. We had on hand Evans's string band, one of the best in this part of the country, and then—well, we danced, both old and young, till morn,

"When youth and beauty meet
To chase the glowing hours with flying feet."

At our next meeting we organized by electing Thomas Burk president, W. J. Stover vice-president, L. F. Tidball secretary, O. Holloway treasurer, and increased our membership to sixty, which takes in more than half the people for miles around, and at least five times as many as all the churches combined, and some of the most outspoken Liberals near here hav not yet joined; these we cordially invite to join. Our good Christian board of directors went to Bozeman next day to enforce the law, but they came back as they went; so we meet every Sunday, and hav crowded houses all the time. We are going to build a hall. We ran counter to the church once, but gracefully adjourned through courtesy to the church, and the preacher got an audience of thirty-four on our credit, twenty of whom belonged to the League—the largest audience that a preacher ever had in that house. But we hav stirred up a hornets' nest, and these good Christian hornets sting and lie both. The first lie is that we propose to burn all the Bibles in the neighborhood, and mob the preachers. We don't want to burn that old nasty book at all; we hav it all the time on the stand; it is the Guiteau of the trial, and we want to put it through a cross-examination, and we hav publicly invited our good Christians to conduct the case. No, we want to read it, and hav others read it. The preachers will be perfectly safe, and we ask them to come out and defend their cause. We will giv them a fair division of time, a good audience, and patient hearing. Our good Christians immediately sent for their big guns, who came on in force, and commenced work in the next school-house north. There were five of them, which was, I am told, about one-half the number of their auditors; but nothing daunted—knowing God was on their side—they opened fire, and kept it up night and day, till grub got scarce, and when the smoke of battle cleared away "nary a one" had they converted. So the League livs, and has no fears of annihilation.

We hope Liberals who think of coming west will thing of the claims of Montana. Our population is, by a large majority, Liberal. Montana's school law says the board of directors "shall exclude all books, tracts, papers, or catechisms of a sectarian or political character." That, of course, takes the Bible out. We hav no statute making it a penal offense to work on Sunday, but our last legislature came within one vote of passing such a law. We hav a delightful climate, except that the winters are long and cold; but not so cold as the states in the same latitude east. During summer and fall it is simply superb. The air is dry and pure, making it the healthiest country on this continent. I hav practiced my profession for twenty years, and I know whereof I speak. We hav no malarial fevers, and rarely any pneumonia. Doctors hav to work or starve. I hav been trying my hand at farming. W. J. STOVER, M.D.

EAST WESTMORELAND, N. H., March 10, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Through the courtesy of some one (I supposed it to be George E. Macdonald, a former neighborly and friendly acquaintance, a very much respected and intellectual young man, while living here, and who is author of "New England and the People Up There"), I received a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and since reading it am very much pleased with it, discarding, as it does, the old, stale, superstitions and dogmas, and taking reason and common sense as its basis of argument to prove the absurdity of the doctrins taught in that book called "Divine Revelation," which no one, while in exercise of reason, can believe to be the "word of God," or to be dictated by a God of love as well as of reason. How averse to reason to think that an all-wise and merciful being should inspire man to write such a book! "Original sin," "Adam's fall," the "snake" story, the "fish" story, and "flood," and thousands of other foolish, silly, childish stories! No! The average of little children would not be so unwise as to invent such absurdities as those attributed to the God of the Bible. That any man can believe such stuff to hav a divine origin, it is a wonder. The atonement and great plan of salvation, which took God and his councils so many centuries to plan and mature—what a plan! If little children could not get up a more wise, reasonable, and just plan than that we would conclude they would be hardly worth trying to educate, and yet the clergy get their bread and butter by preaching such foolish absurdities; and we are told that those that do not believe such absurd doctrins shall be damned. And what is to enhance the happiness of those that are saved by belief is that they will look down from heaven into hell and see their unbelieving relations, their family connections, and others who were near and dear friends while on earth suffering tortures in hell fire. The sight causes extra happiness to those fortunate believers, not of works. These hypocritical, designing, lazy priests who, while on earth, get their living by donations, church fairs, and other dishonorable ways, without work, are thus to be continually happy, and to hav this happiness enhanced by seeing their unbelieving relations in hell, but common sense and consistency decide this dogmatic theory to be absurd and having no foundation in truth, reason, or justice. And it is not only the right, but the duty also, of Freethinkers to speak out boldly in favor of right and justice, and against such unreasonable absurdities.

Please find inclosed pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER as a trial subscriber for three months.
Yours truly, ELLIOT WYMAN.

CARSON, NEV., Feb. 20, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: I was arguing, by letter, with an old Christian friend of mine, on the grounds of my apostasy from Christianity. He took the regular Christian course, and railed against the characters of some of the leading Infidels, but he called "the lying Tom Paine" another "Bob Ingersoll," who was by blasphemy and a smooth tongue preparing himself and others for perdition; that I was an apt scholar or dupe of the same school. Amongst a few arguments he adduced in favor of Christianity, which he could not prove, was what he called "Christian phenomenon," i. e., its moral influence upon the world. He said: "You are ready to deny everything that you are not able to understand. I may not fully understand the workings of electricity, but I see its phenomena, and cannot deny that there is a cause. Now with the same impropriety you deny the cause of this Christian phenomenon."

I told him in answer that Infidelity was and always had been the "cause" of this so-called "Christian phenomenon;" that he believed Christianity was the cause because he was taught so. In answer to which he said: "I accept teachings as far as I find they will stand practical demonstration. I was taught that five times five is twenty-five. I found from a practical demonstration it was a fact." To which I said: "It was on that ground I rejected Christianity. I was taught that three times one is three," and he answered that that was the unfair way Infidels had of disproving the Bible. He says: "I had an illustration of that before me to-day. I was plowing with three horses abreast. Now these three horses gave one power, and the three attributes in God was one in power."

I am a young thinker, and I must confess I could not giv a satisfactory answer to this argument; but while lying awake, after going to bed one night, the idea or answer which exposes and refutes the seeming good argument spontaneously came to my mind. It may not be new to many. It is this: If I hitch up a horse, an ox, and an ass to a plow, I cannot say that plow is drawn by horse-power, ox power, or ass power; so also we cannot say that the "Father God or the nothing God," "the son, or anthropomorphic God," and the "Holy Ghost or spirit God" cannot be combined and called a "spirit God," and according to the Bible the son of God must still be incarnate, as he was "resurrected" in his natural body, for Thomas put his finger in the wound in his side, and we hav no account of the transformation of this body to a spiritual body after the resurrection. He may as well hav said one potato, one jacknife, and one sack of wool make one jackknife.

Inclosed please find $1, which add to Bro. Wm. Black's $10, to go on the subscription for the aged and worn-out philanthropist and Freethinker, Jeremiah Hacker, of New Jersey. It looks small, but I am a laborer for wages, and "giv according to what I hav." I would remind you that the one dollar a year I promised toward building a Freethinkers' orphan asylum is still good when the prospect can be determined upon. We need it. I think these charitable objects should be liberally attended to by the Liberals. They are more worthy than the Christian Foreign Missionary Societies. Statistics show that it costs thousands of dollars to convert one heathen in foreign lands to Christianity, or to save their souls, while it will take but a few hundred to keep Brother and Sister Hacker the rest of their life from want, and thus save them through humanity. And a few thousand dollars spent in erecting and maintaining an orphan asylum, will educate and save many poor little children through the same savior.

I am yours, A. J. STOUGH.

SALEM, NEB., March 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: As it is the custom among Christians to giv donation parties to preachers, so it was here on the 14th ult. at the Free Will Baptist church. Notice was given in the different churches, and preparations were made to make it a great and grand success. The friends of liberty took it into their heads that this was a good opportunity of showing that there is as much sympathy and charity outside the church as there is in it. For this purpose a collection was made among the Liberals, and each one gave something. When the collection was finished it stood churches, $20; Liberals, $21. Although there was no invitation extended to Liberals to attend, yet we were represented by two of our number, Mr. Webster and Mr. Gist. At the proper time Mr. Webster asked permission to make a few remarks, which was granted. He said: "After hearing of the affliction and suffering of this brother, a few of us met at my office, and after exchanging views with each other, Mr. H. B. Gist volunteered to go among our friends and ask for aid, in the name of liberty and humanity. To our great surprise, within two hours twenty-one dollars was raised. This gift is not from the churches; it is from those great souls and noble minds that are outside in the world. Mr. Gist has the money, and if the chairman will call him, he will respond and donate the said amount." Mr. Gist stepped forward and said: "My brothers and sisters—I say that because I hav brothers and sisters in the church and out of the church—wherever you will find a man, he is my brother; or a woman, she is my sister; and I am pleased to say that I represent a party that are like myself. Show me suffering humanity, and we hav hearts to feel for it. With us the greater the affliction, the greater the comfort. Great souls, generally speaking, hav great sympathies, and in proportion to this principle will be the act. If a person is destitute of charitable feeling his giving will be in proportion. I am happy to say this is not a gift from the Christians, but generous and whole-souled friends and brothers and sisters of the Liberal cause hav come forward and shown a feeling and a spirit worthy of imitation. Take this, Mr. Vandorn; you need not giv it to the Lord; keep it yourself; use it, that it may do you good. I hav composed a few lines of poetry which I will read:

This tribute we giv, although very small,
To show our sympathies, our hearts, and our all—
That acts may speak louder than words; though sublime,
The acts of the Christian are the acts of the time.
Promis and promises will never sustain
The teacher, the preacher, whoever hath brain;
But truth and its fruit, with action, will tell
These are the bases for nations to dwell.
And now, dear brother—yea, Brother Vandorn—
We giv you this tribute from hearts that are born
To help the afflicted and comfort the poor—
We always are happy when they come to our door."

The money was handed over amid great applause.

Yours truly, D. O. JONES.

SUGGESTED THOUGHTS.

FABIUS, N. Y., Feb. 13, 1882.

Inclosed I send five dollars, saith my pen,
For THE TRUTH SEEKER, ere my time expires;
Were I but able I would make it ten
Instead of five. I find that it requires,
With my poor health, much harder work than when
My health was good, to gratify desires.
Could I spare cash, my flag would be unfurled
With others for that journey round the world.

Please send to me the "Infidel Abroad,"
Escorted by the "Godly Women" pure;
His virtue needs protection on the road,
And they can furnish that, I'm nearly sure;
I'll kindly greet them at my own abode,
Though oft examined, they shall be secure.
In purity and freedom they may dwell,
And I will list to what they hav to tell.

Could I, like friend Monroe, write verse Byronic,
Delineate about "A Tale of Tails,"
Or pen my thoughts in burning lines harmonic
To giv effect like those of Robert Swail's,
I would be glad. Friend Bennett is ironic;
He makes me think of Lincoln splitting rails!
His ponderous blows deal death to our theologies,
All borrowed from traditions and mythologies.

Wakeman's a host, and so's Elizur Wright;
Elmina's not so slow, else I'm mistaken;
Leland and Underwood are in the fight;
York, Green, and Denton, too, remain unshaken;
Post, Wixon, Briggs, and Gibson all unite
With host of others, for we're not forsaken,
For Col. Ingersoll is full of sense and fun,
In the arena, too, we find one Jamieson.

Those Michiganders, Burnham and Babcock,
And Giles B. Stebbins, too—all speakers rare—
Babcock? Oh dear, how you our feelings shock
To hear you talk so in regard to prayer!
Perhaps the door may open at your knock.
What if you find old St. John's devil there?
I rather like you, Babcock, after all,
But I'm nae friend o' spooks at all at all.

If Paine was Junius, as is held by Burr,
Why should we wrangle o'er his fame or station?
For Paine and Jefferson did both aver
The language set forth in our Declaration.
I hardly know which one I would prefer;
They both did much in forming our great nation;
Both Infidels, yet lovers of humanity,
But foes to shams of modern Christianity.

The world grows old and wiser, or at least
The people strive to think more for themselvs;
The more we think the less we care for priest,
Whose musty sermons rest upon their shelves.
He's useless, just like any lazy beast;
But we respect the man who digs and delves
In search of truth, avoiding all profanity,
Who finds all duties center in humanity.

Freethought is epidemic; it will spread
And scatter just like wildfire through creation.
The child's too large; it can't "be put to bed"
By Comstock and his vice association.
Somehow when reason gets into one's head
Church dogmas undergo investigation;
The church must own her errors and repent,
For fire and brimstone don't scare worth a cent.

Our Bennett writes, but not in style pedantic,
His arguments, convincing all the while;
He's gaining friends. Both sides of the Atlantic
Folks read his letters, for they like his style.
Sometimes he's grave, at others quite romantic;
His wit and humor often make us smile—
For instance, what he said of Castle Blarney
To fairies of the glen near lakes Killarney.

At Bennett's age to circumnavigate
Our ponderous globe is a vast undertaking.
He's not the man to flinch or hesitate
Though death shall stare him in the face; forsaking
Friends and home, he trusts himself to fate,
To expose humbug gods of human making.
When he shall travel this wide world around
May he return to us all safe and sound.

Of late I write but little for the press—
Some think, no doubt, my thoughts not worth perusing;
"Too radical," say others. I confess
And own up my incompetency, choosing
To say but little on that score, unless
My critics shall resort to much abusing,
In which case I'm compelled to put to shame
These would-be saints to vindicate my name.

I'd write for THE TRUTH SEEKER now and then,
Could I but pen thoughts of reflection.
Among its writers, I'm aware, are men
And women skilled in lore. 'Tis their inspection
I fear (I stand to them as one to ten).
'Cause small minds think, do they deserve rejection?
Perhaps I'd better wait till asked to write—
Not crowd unwelcome thoughts upon your sight.

HOMER A. BILLINGS.

EQUALITY, S. C., March 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hope that I will commit no offense in introducing myself to you. I hav been reading your very excellent paper for quite a short time, and am more pleased with it than anything I hav ever read, and being circumstanced as I am at this time, I would be very glad, if it will not be trespassing on the space of your very admirable and excellent paper, to write for it. The circumstances with which I am surrounded at this time are such as will inevitably ensue when a minister of the precious gospel of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ, of our most sacred orthodox church, the Baptist, comes out and plainly declares that he does not believe in the inspiration of the Bible nor in the great and most efficacious plan of redemption, nor in any such thing as the existence of Jesus Christ as the son of God and mediator of the world. You may very well imagin the extreme horror that filled the mind of these holy devotees of Christianity upon this announcement. Just think for one moment what a collapse of brotherly love, and how soon the strong fraternal tie could be severed! See them at once lay firm hold upon the erring and relentlessly throw overboard the one once loved and honored; but this is simply the nature of all Christians from the beginning. I feel that I hav been treated unjustly and mercilessly, simply because I was in the power of those that knew neither love nor mercy, arraigned upon a general charge of unchristian conduct, and without witness or specification of charges, excluded for unchristian conduct. Two months previous to this the church, in a pretentious manner, sent a committee of three to wait on me and see if certain rumors in regard to my Christian character were so, one of the rumors, intemperance, and the other rumor allowing the young gentlemen and ladies of my neighborhood to meet in my house and trip the fantastic toe to sweet music for a few hours. Great crimes! Destructiv ripples upon the moral current! Failing in their search in this particular field, they were gratified, upon my own confession, in being able to get something more startling, yea, indeed, more shocking—something that brought the fraternal tear to eyes that were unaccustomed to such visitors. Infidelity, O horrid thing! Straightway to their church they went and, without any specification or qualification, unceremoniously excluded me upon a charge of unchristian conduct.

I asked them previous to my exclusion if they would grant me the privilege, uninterrupted, of coming to the church and stating my reasons for doubting the inspiration of the Bible and the truth of redemption, which last refuge failed me. I wish to inform you that I am almost alone as a Freethinker here; consequently it is a great shock on the nerves of the people. My friend O. W. Casey and myself are almost alone, and I will certainly speak my sentiments freely and without fear of contradiction.

Yours in Infidel bonds, EX-REV. J. S. SIMMONS.

STANMORE, SYDNEY, N. S. WALES.

MR. EDITOR: When, on behalf of the Liberal Association of New South Wales, I appealed to you for a free copy of your excellent paper for a year I omitted, on your good compliance with my request, to send to you a letter of thanks, press of work being my only excuse. As the paper has ceased to arrive for about three months, I concluded, somewhat hastily, that this was in consequence of my omission. But I find from the arrival of a stray number last mail that therein I wronged you. I gather from the direction on the wrapper that the cause of non-receipt has been insufficient and incorrect address. If addressed as this letter is headed delivery will be insured.

The association is established on a sound basis, and already numbers two hundred and sixty members and has a capital reading-room, besides holding weekly debates and quarterly meetings for Liberal addresses from prominent Freethinkers. Sydney has now three Sunday Freethought platforms, the two largest theaters being weekly occupied, besides another hall. If you would care about it, I would make arrangements for you to receive periodical letters from this part of the world. With best wishes,

Sincerely yours, G. LACY, Sec.

[Any communication from Australia of interest to our readers and the cause will be thankfully received.—ED. T. S.]

CLIFTON, KAN., Feb. 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $3 for the renewal of my subscription. Of the eight papers I take I consider it the best in the lot. I like it for its Liberal views and free discussion on all subjects pertaining to the enlightenment and elevation of mankind to a higher stand of truth and justice. The letters of Mr. Bennett are read with much interest. I find a goodly number of Liberals in the West of different grades scattered about sowing the seeds of progression which must necessarily take root, for mankind are beginning to think and reason for themselvs.

Yours truly, JOHN C. HANAN.

The Frost on the Pane.

BY BURTON C. INGERSOLL.

I.

Christmas eve! The cold is bitter,
Snow lies deep o'er lawn and lane,
And the frost gems flash and glitter
On the palace window pane:
Gleam and sparkle coldly, brightly,
In the firelight's rosy glow,
As its fitful waves so lightly
O'er the window ebb and flow.
Diamonds, pearls, and gold are gleaming,
Ruddy goblets glance and shine,
Lovely eyes are softly beaming
With the firelight and the wine;
But not bright eves, soft and tender,
Nor the cups the feasters drain,
Nor the jewels show more splendor
Than the frost upon the pane.
How the brain is set to thinking
Happy thoughts as pleased eyes gaze
At the dazzling frost-gems, winking
In the red glare of the blaze!
When the fire is brightly glowing
On the eve of Christmas day,
When the ruby wine is flowing,
And the heart is light and gay,
Nothing gives the fire more brightness
And the wine a redder stain;
Nothing gives the heart more lightness
Than the frost upon the pane.

II.

Christmas eve! The cold is bitter,
Snow lies deep in yard and lane,
And the frost-gems flash and glitter
On the hovel window pane;
Gleam and sparkle coldly, brightly,
In the moon's white, silver rays,
For no firelight, dancing lightly,
O'er the hovel window plays.
Two small hungry boys are lying
In their cot, with chilly feet;
O'er them bends their mother crying,
For there's nothing left to eat—
Naught to feed them in the morning,
And to-morrow's Christmas day!
Oh, that those bright gems adorning
The cold pane could only pay
For some bread and meat and fuel,
For some little Christmas toys;
Oh for but one sparkling jewel
For the stockings of her boys!
When the little ones are freezing
And the fire is cold and dead;
When for food their vainly teasing,
And the shelves are bare of bread;
When the mother's heart is breaking,
Hearing her poor babes complain,
Nothing such dread thoughts is waking
As the frost upon the pane.

Not Dead, but Living.

In memory of Campbell Wilson, who died at Paterson, N. J., March 9, 1882.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

I see thee in the silence of great death,
Calm as the eternal hills upon whose front
Shines the soft radiance of the pure white day;
I see the crystal beauty of thy soul
Unclouded in the marble of thy face;
The glowing ardor of thy life full set
In diamond stillness, with no flaw to dim;
And to my heart I say, He is not dead,
But living in the glory of his work,
In things accomplished that no fate can kill,
Linked with the endless process of the world;
For he has lived for truth with manly deed,
And grown to hights of virtue through long years,
Touched with the spirit of our common weal;
And so he passes, not like petal blown
Or like the floating mist on summer's sky,
But is immortal in the glorious life
That beats from age to age in deathless man.

Ah, memory's halls are beautiful for aye,
Crowded with treasures ever sweet and new,
Bright as the morning's freshness of heaped gold,
In earth and sky, in flower and sailing clouds—
In this fair memory he is blazoned now,
And cannot fall or fade to nothingness;
He is a part of the illustrious past
Which naught can change and naught annihilate.

With what a solemn glory over life
Death draws its mystic and unfathomed grace!
We know it not, nor ever hath the veil
From its unsounded deep been put aside;
No music from its endless ocean drops
In harsh or mellow accents on our way—
But 'gainst that awful silence life bursts bright
And wonderful, and seems more excellent,
More fruitful for the dark unknown wherein
Its wealth appears to perish, but, transformed,
Becomes a grander luster, purer stream.

Humanity dies not, and in its soul,
O noble friend, thou hast thy royal grave;
The labor thou hast done is ours, is man's,
The dear possession of the race to come;
Within our thoughts and zeal thou art alive;
Thou hast struck hands with generations far
In the ennobling purpose of thy work.
The stream dries not; invisible it flows,
And makes more swift the upward steps of men.
Thou art at rest; no storm can shake thy frame:
But the unresting motions of thy soul,
Like pulses of the summer air, still touch
The world to beauty and our hearts to hope.

The Bennett-Mair Discussion.

Never since the oral discussion between Rev. J. F. Berg, D.D., of Philadelphia, and Joseph Barker, of Ohio, in 1854, has it been my lot to come across such a masterly refutation of Bible Christianity as in the "Bennett-Mair Discussion." It was my good fortune to peruse it while in process of publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and having recently re-perused it in book form, I feel constrained to recommend it anew to all who read the same in the paper and to those who did not enjoy that privilege. It is a book that every Freethinker should own, as it contains much valuable matter for reference. Let me here make a suggestion. Cannot we Liberals afford to purchase our own literature for missionary purposes, and compel it to do its silent work? Cannot we scatter around upon our shelves and tables within our homes our "blasphemous papers and books," and thus reveal to our callers and guests not only out favorit authors, but also show them that we are not ashamed to hav it known that we harbor Thomas Paine, Voltaire, Ingersoll, "The Bennett-Mair Discussion," Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, etc., etc., within our domicils. Men of business, who are progressiv, why not hav these works lying around in your offices and manufactories? Christians place their literature on their tables for their irreligious neighbors and friends to see and peruse, and never think to insult them thereby; and why should not we do the same? I hav known Spiritualists and Freethinkers to secrete their literature when Christians were to be their guests, so as not to hurt their feelings. Are they as careful of our feelings? Indeed not. They will attack us (sometimes, it is true, behind our backs) every opportunity. Will a Christian take his Bible off from the parlor table out of respect for me when I am about to call, knowing I do not believe it inspired? Of course not; do you suppose he is such a fool? but he will expect me to hide my "Bible Abridged," "The Godly Women," "The Bennett-Mair Discussion," and all my Freethought tracts and papers, though the first-named book contains not a word but what is found in his Bible, and the second treats truthfully of his alleged holy women, and the third includes the attempted annihilation of the Infidel Bennett by the very able Mr. Mair in refutation.

Some men will reply, Our wives are Christians, and would be shocked at our proposal to mingle our heretical literature with theirs, half and half. Very well, then do your missionary work in your offices, shops, in the field, by the roadside, in the hotel, or private house where you may be a temporary guest.

I may be answered, it would injure our business to hav it known we were Ingersollites! No, it would not; you are cowards if you say so. With all the slang against Ingersoll by the priests, he is more respected, even by believers, where he is known, than are they. He is popular—a rising young (?) man! But, you answer, you are not going to interpolate your business with Freethought ideas, as the canting priests and hypocrits are doing. Nobody wants you to; but if you hav good, sound sense, you will find opportunities "in season" when you can speak and introduce your book or paper, and hold your peace "out of season."

I half suspect that many professed Liberals are ashamed of their opinions, because of their unpopularity, and are silent through fear. Never mind, friends; remember that what is unpopular to-day will be popular to-morrow, and then we shall be on the winning side, or the won side, like the antislavery agitators.

But I hav wandered from my subject, "The Bennett-Mair Discussion," to which I wished merely to draw attention, as there is a standing notice of the book in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and any ane can there become acquainted with a synopsis of its contents without any detail of mine. Permit me, therefore, to close with a few extracts from Mr. Bennett's replies to Mr. Mair:

"In your efforts to show that matter and the universe are not eternal, but transitory, you ask exultingly for 'proofs' of its eternality. We hav the best proofs in the world—not an atom can be created, not an atom can be destroyed. . . When I ask you to giv me a little proof that your God has a real existence you utterly fail to comply with my request, but in relation to the eternal existence of matter you cry yourself hoarse shouting 'proofs, proofs, proofs!'

"You insist that Christianity alone has elevated woman to her proper position. This I pointedly deny. . . If Christianity is an elevating element to woman, it acts extremely slow. I hav shown that woman enjoyed more liberty, more equality, more rights in the pagan world than she enjoys to-day. Christianity has been the influence that has kept her from rising more rapidly in the scale of liberty and justice. . . . Instead of Christianity doing great things for woman, the truth is in directly the opposit direction—woman is doing great things for Christianity. But for woman the churches would not be attended, the religious fervor would not be kept up. . . . This is woman's great and only hope, to become free from the trammels of priests and priestly dogmas, from the musty myths of past dark ages, to free herself from the errors of ecclesiasticism and supernaturalism, to hav something besides priestly inanities and absurdities to engage her attention, and to occupy the field of mental, social, and political freedom in common with the sterner sex. . . . It is just as false to claim that Christianity has elevated woman as it is to claim that Christianity has invented the printing-press, the steam-engin, the telegraph. . . . All these hav increased within the last three centuries, not because of Christianity, but despite it." ELLA E. GIBSON.

The Brain and the Bible.

[From Truth.]

"All forms of argument employed to defend the dogmas of the Bible must of necessity be within a circle. Hitherto, when closely pressed, theologians hav exhibited remarkable dexterity in shifting from one side of the circle to the other; and one of the chief reasons why the warfare between science and supernaturalism has continued so long is because Infidelity has seldom attacked both sides of the circle at once. Forced by the revelations of modern physics to withdraw her lines of defense beyond the material world, the church now seeks refuge in the supposed unfathomable mysteries of mind."

The above quotation is from the author's preface of "The Brain and the Bible," a notable book by Edgar C. Beall, recently published. It sufficiently indicates the author's purpose. He directs his attack upon revealed religion at the fortress into which of late years its defenders hav retired.

When it was discovered that the phenomena of day and night were caused by the revolution of the earth upon its axis, the discovery was denounced as blasphemy, and the discoverer as an Infidel. It reflected upon the divine origin of the Joshua story and the account of creation. But as the discovery gradually won its way to a recognized place in physical science, and formed the basis of new revelations, theologians explained away apparent inconsistencies by teaching that God wrote according to the understanding of the people to whom his word was delivered.

One discovery after another followed that of the rotundity and diurnal revolutions of the earth, each in turn passing through the same theological hopper, going in as Infidelity and coming out as a verification of those portions of the Bible which were inconsistent with it.

The discovery of great importance, however, next after that of Galileo's was the extreme age of the earth. Like all its predecessors, it went into the hopper as the basest Infidelity, and geologists who proclaimed it were put into the theological stocks as targets for the rotten eggs and decayed vegetables of defenders of the faith. But it came out with the stereotyped explanation, and the geological Infidels of one generation were saints of the next. That discovery upset biblical chronology, slaughtered the story of the creation as told in Genesis, and literally knocked the devil out of Eden. But the Hebrew narrativ was patched up by teaching that the days mentioned in Genesis were not days of twenty-four hours, but indefinit periods. And thus souls were saved in spite of geology.

Then came the scientific doctrin of evolution. It was put through the same process, and has only recently emerged a full-fledged theological as well as scientific truth. It is but a few years since the presence of a copy of Darwin in the library of a Christian household would hav horrified the pastor of the flock quite as much as a copy of the "Age of Reason." The idea that man is an improved monkey was apparently hostil to the story that God made man out of mortar and breathed into him the breath of life, and its inevitable tendency was to upset the whole scheme of redemption by destroying the dogma of the fall of man, which resulted from the mastication of forbidden fruit; but an ingenious theologian overcame the difficulty by conceding the scientific hypothesis as to man's material nature and explaining that it was only when God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life—the soul—that he was invested with immortality.

Driven from point to point, theologians hav been compelled at last to abandon even their idiotic attempts to reconcile the fables of the Bible with the discoveries of science, and we now find them casting aside all the historical accounts and scientific allusions of the Bible as of human authorship, and taking refuge, as our author says, in "the unfathomable mysteries of mind." The day is rapidly approaching when the church will regard the story of the creation and the deluge, the Hebrew chronology, the accounts of the Jewish wars, the immaculate conception, and even the life of Jesus of Nazareth, as a mere frame of human construction bearing all the blemishes of the imperfect civilization in which it was put together, but into which the supreme being has placed the divine and perfect picture of the Christian religion. The frame may lose its luster, but the picture will change from age to age to meet the demands of an advancing civilization. Science may disprove the biblical account of creation, it may demonstrate that the deluge was not much of a shower, it may relegate the story of Joshua to the realm of the fabulous, and it may convince the world that Mary, the mother of Jesus, was no exception to the general rule; but confronted by the phenomena of the human mind it is silent.

Not so theology. Mind is a mystery, and mystery is the chosen field of theology. When the creation was a mystery, theology explained it; when the diversity of languages was a mystery, theology explained that; when man in his materiality was a mystery, theology explained that also. And upon its explanation of these mysteries theology built its spiritual superstructure But science has blown away the vapory shroud, and the explanations of theology hav disappeared—they were nothing but the fanciful forms of the vapor. The foundation of the Christian religion is gone, but the superstructure is still suspended in the air.

Theologians hav shifted to the other side of the circle. And the author of "The Bible and the Brain" pursues them. He calls science to his aid to explore the mystery of the human mind.

The book is a cogent, logical, and eloquent exposition of the fallacies of modern theology by a man whose preparation was evidently careful and profound. It contains a preface by Col. Ingersoll, and is so well done throughout that it might be supposed to be wholly from Ingersoll's pen. Its inevitable result will be, if nothing more, to enroll the name of Edgar C. Beall among those great Infidels who teach that "the mission of Infidelity is not to destroy anything that is good, but simply by the light of science to discover the one sublime temple of truth, in search of which, groping and guessing, bruised and bleeding, humanity has wandered through all the long unhappy night of the past."

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, in Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Reusseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

EXTERNAL APPLICATION,

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Gems of Thought.

WE must be frank and fearless in speaking the truths we love. Not officiously thrust them into notice at improper times and places, but be very ready to voice our sentiments, simply, kindly, and frankly, as occasion offers. Drop a thought here and a hint there. Stand up not for Jesus, but for truth; not for gods, but for men. Demand equal rights for all, for men, women, and children. But in our eagerness for our rights we must hav a care lest we infringe upon others' rights. In endeavoring to win the battle for freedom we must hav charity for the tyrant and the oppressor. Old theology has so long held her subjects in her grip that they do not realize their bonds, or the fact that they are acting the tyrant's part when trying to force their dogmas and fables upon those who hav outgrown them. So let us try and gain the day by kindly persuasion, by strong arguments, and pure and loving lives.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

WHO can pretend to say why the Spanish nation, so dominant at one time, has been distanced in the race? The awakening of the nations of Europe from the dark ages is a still more perplexing problem. At this period, as Mr. Galton has remarked, almost all the men of gentle nature, those given to meditation or culture of the mind, had no refuge except in the bosom of the church, which demanded celibacy, and this could hardly hav failed to hav a deteriorating influence on each successiv generation. During this same period the holy Inquisition selected, with extreme care, the freest and boldest men in order to burn and imprison them. In Spain alone some of the best men, those who doubted and questioned, and without doubting and questioning there can be no progress, were eliminated during three centuries at the rate of a thousand a year.—Darwin's Descent of Man.

AMONG the works of man, which human life is rightly employed in perfecting and beautifying, the first in importance surely is man himself. Supposing it were possible to get houses built, corn grown, battles fought, causes tried, and even churches erected, and prayers said by machinery—by automatons in human form—it would be a considerable loss to exchange for these automatons even the men and women who at present inhabit the more civilized parts of the world, and who assuredly are but starved specimens of what nature can and will produce. Human nature is not a machine to be built after a model, and set to do exactly the work prescribed for it; but a tree, which requires to grow and develop itself on all sides, according to the tendency of the inward forces which make it a living thing.—Mill's Liberty.

DURING the reign of Christianity, no doubt, admirable institutions for the poor were founded, and monkish corporations were formed and devoted to deeds of love. To a great extent this was due to the same pure benevolence which had its source in the human soul wherever man is found, and which had prompted men to similar efforts, on a less extensiv scale, perhaps, in Egypt, India, Judea, Greece, and pagan Rome. The credit of founding lunatic asylums, so often claimed for Christianity, belongs to the Mohammedans of the seventh century. No lunatic asylum existed in Christendom until the fifteenth century, and then only in places in close proximity to to the Mohammedans.—Underwood.

SLAVERY is that which cramps powers. The worst slavery is that which cramps the noblest powers. Worse, therefore, than he who manacles the hands and feet, is he who puts fetter on the mind and pretends to demand that men shall think and believe and feel thus and thus because others so believed, and thought, and felt before.—Fred. W. Robertson.

FAR be it from us to intimate that belief in a God is not consistent with the highest moral purity and goodness. We wish simply to indicate that morality depends not for its sanction or its practice upon a belief in the supernatural. It is founded on human relations; its object is the happiness of man, not the glory of God. We would, therefore, hav as much time, energy, and wealth expended in trying to make men good as are now lavished in the worship of God.—Underwood's Modern Scientific Materialism.

IN the reign of folly, which has hitherto prevailed so deplorably, mind and muscle hav scorned each other, to the injury of both. On one side labor has been held in contempt as dishonorable, and on the other deplored as a curse. But it is both an honor and a blessing, whether by mind or muscle, or both together. There is no other honor and no other blessedness, and no other possible ground of self-respect. The most exalted and honorable of all individuals is he who exerts all such qualities as he has to make all wisely-directed labor as honorable and effectiv as possible. There is not a man in existence who can afford to despise or cheat the humblest hod-carrier—if he carries the hod faithfully and does not spill the mortar. There is not a woman, though she be a goddess Minerva, who can afford to harbor a thought of contempt for the sister woman who washes her china without breaking it.—Elizur Wright.

WHAT a man shall see when he opens his eyes is not in his own power; but the opening of his eyes is a voluntary act. So, after listening to a train of argument on a certain dispute, we might be irresistibly inclined to one side; but, supposing us to liv in a country where the adhesion to that side is criminal and punished severely, we should very likely be deterred from hearing or reading anything in its favor. To this extent the adoption of belief is voluntary. The application of strong motivs of the nature of reward or punishment is sufficient to cause one creed to prevail rather than another, as we see in those countries and in those ages when there has been no toleration of dissent rom the established religion. The mass of the eople hav been in this way so fenced in from now ing any other opinions that they hav become onscientiously attached to the creed of their educa on.—Chamber's Encyclopedia, Article Belief.

A LAKE in South Florida is said to hav enough alligators in it to build a fence around it four feet high. They will not be used for that purpose.

BILL NYE'S book is to be called "The Forty Liars." A man who can play upon forty liars should, in heaven, be able to make his harps accord.

IT is an extreme case of personal sacrifice for the good of science where a young man is compelled to part with his watch in order to practically demonstrate the real value of time.

"WHAT did the Puritans come to this country for?" asked a Massachusetts teacher of his class. "To worship in their own way, and make other people do the same," was the reply.

A WOULD-BE prophet declared that "he was sent to redeem the world and all things." Whereupon one of his audience sent up his little bill with the remark, "Perhaps you will kindly redeem that."

MISS CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG appears to hav postponed her marriage with that Philadelphia chap just for the sake of giving another series of farewell entertainments. This time they are to end about May 25th. Positivly her last appearance—until further notice.

WHO is this man with the mournful Countenance? He is an Editor, my Children! He writes the alleged Funny Paragraphs? Why do we call them Alleged funny Paragraphs? Because the Editor says they are funny, but has never been able to prove it. This is why the Editor looks so Sad.

A RECENT homily on married happiness says "married folks would be happier if they kissed and made up after every quarrel." The writer has no basis for his argument. Married folks do not quarrel. It is lovers only who quarrel. Married folks fight. If you don't believe it, get married.

"WHY do they call the man who gets married the groom, pa?" asked little Alexander. "Because he curries favor with his mother-in-law," said Philip, "and saddles his debts on his wife's father, puts a check on his cousin's visits, whips the children, and drives while the rest of the family pulls."

"DESIGNING women." Yes, they are all designing creatures. They either hav designs on your heart or on your pocket-book. Thank heaven, the best and truest, and of course the purest, hav designs only on your affections; but that as naturally opens the pocket-book as an organ-grinder sallies forth in early spring.

THE widow Flapjack, who livs on Austin avenue, recently lost her wedding ring. She was inconsolable for a while, and went about wringing her hands and saying: "There, now, I wouldn't hav lost that wedding ring for anything. I'll hav to go and get married again, for I'm bound to hav a wedding ring. I can't get along without it."

CRIES Sylvia to a reverend dean,
"What reason can be given,
Since marriage is a holy thing,
That there is none in heaven?"
"There are no women," he replied.
She quick returned the jest,
"Women there are, but I'm afraid
They cannot find a priest."

"MRS. BONESET, did you see anything of my hat this morning?" "Your hat! Now, what a thing that is to ask me about. What would you think of me if I'd come to you with an intimation that I could not keep track of my own hat?" "Your hat, Mrs. Boneset! Mountains and mastodons! If you could ever lose sight of that seven-acre enormity I'd say you was as blind as a hunk of putty—that's what I'd say!"

PLAINFIELD, N. J., was a highly religious town, where even the pies were pious and the what-you-call-ems sang Watts's hymns in the swamps as gentle spring thrust its yellow reeds up through the veil-like beautiful snow. But now at last it has fallen. Some of its too-two-or-three pilgrims hav done wrong, and even one of its most religious stallions has nearly killed a man. It must be a very queer town when even the horses kick.

"YOUNG subscriber" wants to know "what is an organ?" It is the opposition paper, my son, the vile and truckling sheet through whose venomous maw. fetid with vice and festering with the loathsome corruption in which it daily wallows, the other party, blistered with the plague spot of political leprosy, sewers the noisome filth of its pestilential ideas. Gur-r-r! That's what an organ is, my boy. Our own paper is a fearless and out spoken champion for the truth. You may hav noticed that.—Hawkeye.

THE Denver Tribune wails like this over four dollars:

Over the monstrous, swashing sea,
Over the Balderdash sea—
The jayhawk wings his fluttering flight—
The pelican greets the morning light—
Antonio—where is he?

Over the gruesome, gruntling sea,
Over the Brobdingnag sea,
Antonio came in the dead of night—
Came in like a jabberwock in his flight—
And borrowed four dollars of me.

Over the muddling, haggling sea,
Over the Caliban sea,
With four fair dollars come in if you can—
I'm strapped—I'm broke—Antonio—Man—
Brother—come back to me!

The Southern Clinic, a journal of medicin and surgery, says: "We took up this book with prejudice, but soon saw the author was a physcian, and a good one too; a sound physiologist, an instructiv writer, and a man of high moral sense;" and adds, "A race of vigorous, beautiful, sweet-tempered people would be the result of the observance of its principles."

The Home Journal, Boston, says: "We earnestly commend it to all. Its influence can be only beneficial. The author has a thorough mastery of his subject.

Demorest's Family Fashion Magazine says: "It contains enough sensible hints to set up a family."

The Alpha, edited by Dr. Winslow, says: "We like the book thoroughly." And adds: "Send for it, fathers and mothers, for your own good and for the sake of your children, who are to fill your places when you are called up higher."

The Buffalo Express says: "Whoever buys this book will find it a paying investment."

The Scientific American says: "Books on this subject are usually written by 'cranks,' but this is radically different; it is scientific, sober, clean, and worthy of conscientious consideration by every possible parent, and particularly by the young."

Dr. Dio Lewis of Boston, writes: "I hav read all of your works, and feel I must study this one. Your contributions to sanitary and social science hav all been imbued with the spirit of sound conservatism and earnest conscientiousness, all too rare among reformers. Whoever gods over this book will find himself on sacred ground. It is the most valuable of your many valuable books."

Prof. N. S. Townsend, of Ohio University, writes: "I am greatly pleased with this work. I hav loaned it to some of my pupils, who express delight with it. I hope every thoughtful young man and woman will read it."

"DESIGN" IN NATURE,

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

Notes and Clippings.

TOBACCO killed a boy of fifteen at Blair, Neb. He not only chewed great quantities of the weed, but swallowed the juice.

A UTICA clergyman had occasion to refer in a sermon to the prophet Jonah, and the report says that he delicately spoke of him as having "passed three days and three nights in the whale's—ahem—society."

THAT the Grangers are still alive in the West is shown by their ownership of ninety public halls in Michigan, ranging in cost from $200 to $3,000. These are used for the meetings of the granges and rented out for other purposes.

A DUBLIN comic paper says that the government is about to prohibit "the meeting of the waters" at Avoca, and that the growing of potatoes is to be interdicted because the government objects to "drilling" for "Irish champions."

THE United Brethren church at Williamsburg, Ind., was set afire, and it is charged that the incendiary was a zealous convert of the Baptist church in the same place. There had been opposition revival meetings, with a great deal of bitter rivalry.

IT is singular that the Lord, who is supposed to be omnipotent, allows as many churches as theaters to be burned. The latest case where he failed to interfere, although his own property was in flames, was in the burning of the church of the Incarnation.

AT the instance of Count Mastal, nephew of Pius IX., the correctional tribunal at Montpelier in France has condemned M. Leon Taxil, author of a novel describing the alleged amours of the pope, in 60,000 francs damages, and the publication of the judgment in sixty papers.

THE Sprinfigeld Republican felicitates Charles E. Walker, of Somerset, Mass., who was dismissed from the ministry on account of a divorce-suit scandal, upon the fact that he has risen from the position of a sea cook to that of captain of the schooner M. M. Merriam.

A FEW days ago three Socialists were turned out of Berlin by the police, and a crowd of persons were present at the railway station to bid them farewell. Considerable feeling was demonstrated for the unfortunate exiles, and on the departure of the train a hearty cry of "Long liv social democracy" was raised by the bystanders, several of whom were immediately arrested by the police.

THAT was a pleasant way in which a newly-settled Methodist minister disarmed the criticism of the people in the congregation to which he had been sent. Instead of getting angry about it, or complaining that they had hurt his feelings, he remarked from the pulpit: "I hear that you say I am not much of a preacher; well, I know it; and I know that if I could preach first-rate I wouldn't hav been sent here to preach to such a lot of ignoramuses as you." The church folks were struck with a new sense of the fitness of things as regulated by the admirable machinery of Methodism for adapting means to ends.

FOOL Talmage has made a discovery. A discovery compared with which all other evideuces of Christianity are as nothing. Nothing less than two testimonies to the complete list of the New Testament writings in the first century. Ingersoll may now hide his diminished head, and the ministers, who hav recently seceded from the churches to Infidelity, hurriedly make back tracks to orthodoxy. Fool Talmage's two wituesses are Jerome and Eusebius. He assures the Christian world that "Jerome and Eusebius in the first century, and Origen in the second century, and other writers in the third and fourth centuries, gave a list of the New Testament writers just exactly corresponding with our list." Unfortunately, Jerome was not born until A.D. 346, nor Eusebius till A.D. 270, and the latter rejected the book of Revelation. Origen did not write until the beginning of the third century, and he doubted the second epistle of Peter, and says of the epistle to the Hebrews, "God only knows who wrote it."—London Freethinker.

THE Jewish Record, although it speaks gratefully of Miss Sarah Burr's bequests to Jewish charities, thinks she made a mistake in leaving $10,000 to the Society for the Conversion of the Jews. It remarks: "The money will be devoted to helping some impecunious hypocrit to liv in idleness while angling for some needy or unprincipled Jew to simulate conversion in order to liv without labor."

IN the Oxford Undergraduates' Journal appears a poem upon a student named Morris Jones, who was drowned the other day, the tone of which may be estimated by the following verse:

Say, was he ready, this Morris Jones?
Was he man whom men call "Pi?"
Was he a man who his Savior owns,
Who teaches us cowards the way to die?
What were his last moments, then,
"Muse on it, think of of it," 'Varsity men.

MR. FAWCETT, the postmaster-general of England, said in the House of Commons the other day that the female telegraphers and clerks employed by the post-office had given general satisfaction. So much was that the case that the employment of women had been gradually and steadily extended. Any claims they had to promotion would be carefully considered, and he could readily giv an assurance that he would lose no opportunity of extending the employment of women whenever it could be done with advantage to the public service.

BISHOP O'REILLY of the Roman Catholic diocese of Springfield, Mass., has been preaching strongly against mixed marriages of Protestants and Roman Catholics. He says that a Roman Catholic woman who marries a Protestant endangers her own soul and that of her offspring, as the husband will not be likely to allow the children to be educated as Roman Catholics, whatever he may promis. Neither should a Roman Catholic marry a Protestant woman, because in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the children inherit the characteristics of the mother.

IN a recent scientific paper Sir John Lubbock say: "Like the sand of the sea, the stars of heaven hav ever been used as effectiv symbols of number, and the improvements in our methods of observation hav added fresh force to our original impressions. We now know that our earth is but a fraction of one out of at least 75,000,000 worlds. But this is not all. In addition to the lumiuous heavenly bodies, we cannot doubt that there are countless others, invisible to us from their great distance, smaller size, or feebler light; indeed, we know that there are many dark bodies which now emit no light or comparativly little. Thus in the case of Procyon, the existence of the invisible body is proved by the movement of the visible star." The foregoing statement in regard to the number of the stars, like each fresh utterance of science, only serves to increase our admiration for the impudence of the person who can say without blushing that he believes they were all created within a week by the one-horse God of the Jews.

THE results of the first counting of the returns of the census of France taken on the 18th of December show that the population has only increased by 389,670 since 1870, the present population amounting to 35,597,000 souls. There is a strong tendency throughout the country to immigrate into the towns and industrial quarters, a symptom which experience has not shown to be favorable to an increase of population. The population of the Department of the Seine, which ranks first on the list, has increased by 337,000 inhabitants. It contains now a population of 2,747,000. The Department of the Nord, with Lilie as its capital, has augmented its population by 74,000; that of the Rhone, containing Lyons, by 28,400; that of Bouches du Rhone, with Marseilles, by 28,300; Aude by 20,900; Pas de Calais by 19,300; Seine et Oise by 18,400, etc. The population of agricultural departments has diminished. All the Norman departments, especially, except Seine Infericure, with Havre and Rouen as its chief towns, show a decrease.

SOME little time ago Miss Frances Power Cobbe, who has so identified herself with the cause of anti-vivisection, called on a distinguished man of science in London to endeavor by persuasiv speech and viva voce arguments to gain him over to her cause. Three points were observable in Miss Cobbe's outward presentment, namely, she had an ostrich feather in her bonnet, a bird of paradise on or near her muff, and she carried an ivory-handled umbrella. Consequently the distinguished man of science replied as follows: "Madam, charity begins at home; when you hav given up wearing ostrich feathers, which are plucked from the living bird, causing the most exquisit pain, and birds of paradise, which, in order to enhance their beauty and luster, are skinned alive—when you hav abjured the use of ivory, because you know that the tusks are cut out of the dying elephant's jaw—then, and then only, come and upbraid me with the cruelty of my operations. The difference between us is, madam, that I inflict pain in the pursuit of knowledge, and for the benefit of my fellow-creatures; you cause cruelty to be inflicted merely for your personal adornment."

THE Sunday-school World is sorely distressed because of the criticisms made on the publications in its "Quarterly" of three of the fishes of the Sea of Galilee labeled in Latin, Chromis Nilotica, Clarias Maeracanthus, and Labeoberbus Canis. The World contends that the likening of these fishes to the porgy, the catfish, and the sucker would be an interesting exercise to any boy who is fond of fishing. But it maintains a golden silence on the pedantry which gave these names in Latin without also putting them in English, and which printed "after Tristram" without any explanation to the uneducated teacher or scholar as to who Tristram might be, and why these finny inhabitants of the Galilee waters were "after" him. One of the religious papers, commenting on the criticism of the fish, remarked that "on the average, just half a Sunday-school scholar to each Sunday-school was brought into the church in 1881." That paper intimates that the small harvest is the result of such pedantic teaching. The World severely combats this arithmetic, and says that in one hundred New Jersey schools there hav been two hundred hopeful conversions, while in a single Nebraska school forty new converts are reported. No proofs are cited to show that these new converts did or did not study the Latin names of the Galilee fishes.

GREAT consternation has been caused in Constantinople by a report that the mosque of St. Sophia is in danger of collapsing; for there is a tradition among the Turks that the fall of this basilica will herald the dismemberment of the empire. The mosque was restored at great expense by the Sultan Abdul Medjid in 1849, under the superintendence of the Italian architect, Fossati. But the work does not appear to hav been very well executed, for the grand dome, which is 120 feet in diameter, and 250 feet high, is so insecure that, according to the report of the architect who has been called in by the minister of public works, it may fall in at any moment. In other respects the interior of the mosque is in a fairly good state of preservation. Among the many relics preserved in the mosque of St. Sophia is the carpet upon which Mohammed was wont to pray, and close to the place where this carpet is suspended stands the pulpit from which the Khatib reads the Koran every Friday, holding in his hand a drawn sword as symbolic of St. Sophia having been conquered from the Infidel. Another of the relics preserved in St. Sophia is the cradle of our savior, which, according to tradition, was brought from Bethlehem, together with a sort of basin in which his mother washed him. The walls of the mosque are covered with green slabs, on which verses from the Koran are engraved in letters of gold.

DANIEL J. HALSTED, a prominent citizen of Syracuse, N. Y., died last August. For years he had been a convert to Spiritualism, and often held communion with the other world through the mediumship (so says the New York Sun) of John W. Truesdell, broker. Lately the ghost of Mr. Halsted has been appearing to his former acquaintances. The physicians of Syracuse say that the persons who hav seen Mr. Halsted alive since his death are the victims of abnormally activ imaginations.

THE TOWN OF JAFFA.

1. In less than two hours after leaving Ramleh and riding over the plain that lies between it and the sea, and while the sun was yet half an hour above the horizon, the confines of Jaffa were reached; and the hundreds of luxuriant gardens, and the thousands of orange-trees laden to the utmost with large, golden, and luscious fruit, were a most agreeable contrast to the rocks, the gravel, the chalk, and the aridity which for weeks the pilgrims had been compelled to look upon.

2. The luxuriant date palm-trees, with also the banana-trees growing in the Jaffa gardens, give the place a tropical appearance, and make one feel that he has reached the land where winter is unknown, and where the luxuriance of the torrid zone flourishes in positive magnificence. Such large oranges grow in but few places in the world. Many are fifteen inches in circumference and weigh over a pound. They are oval in shape and uniform in size; and as one rides along by these luxuriant gardens and groves and looks upon the thousands of bushels of golden fruit so lavishly presented before him, he feels that he has left a land of sterility and poverty, and reached a place of fruitfulness, richness, and plenty.

3. For miles around the scene is one of luxuriance and loveliness; lemons and pomegranates too are cultivated; they are inclosed with hardy hedges of prickly pear, or cactus, through which neither men nor animals will hardly try to penetrate. There are fully three hundred of the orange groves, averaging from three to twelve acres, and each grove is supplied with a well or two wells for the purpose of irrigation. The orange crop of Jaffa is said to amount to $400,000 per year. The fruit is shipped to Egypt, to Southern Europe, and in various directions. Eight million oranges is the yearly yield.

4. Jaffa presents a fine appearance from the sea, as it also does from the plain. It is built upon a large mound-shaped eminence; and its stone houses show off well at a distance, but when seen close by, its beauty vanishes, and its narrow, dirty, and winding streets are far from being attractive. It has a population of some 16,000, which are largely Moslems, with a thousand Christians and a few Jews. The stores are numerous, but not fine nor largely supplied with merchandise. The inhabitants have the swarthy, dirty appearance of all the natives of this part of the world.

5. What is called the German colony is situated in the northeast part of the town, which is by far the pleasantest part, for here are comfortable residences and many beautiful gardens, full of rare exotic flowers and plants most agreeable to view. Here one sees many new kinds of vegetable growths, and many peculiar to tropical climates. Here is located the Jerusalem Hotel at which the pilgrims make their home until the arrival of the steamer which is to convey them to the land of Egypt. The hotel is kept by Mr. Hardegg, a German, who knows well how to keep a hotel.

6. In the year 1866 a colony was founded here by religious and fanatical Americans, principally from the state of Maine, who followed the prophet Adams, and believed they could do God great service by coming to Palestine to spread here again the same gospel which in the first place emanated from this country. Their scheme was impractical and unsuccessful. Their money was not abundant enough to enable them to get comfortably located in this oriental world; some got sick, some died, and nearly all were compelled to endure a great amount of suffering. Greatly did the most of them long to return to America, but they had not the money to return with. When the Quaker City touched at Jaffa a few years ago she took forty of these miserable, heartbroken fanatics to Egypt, from which place the greater portion of them were enabled to reach America through the kindness of a noble-hearted American, who gave his check for fifteen hundred dollars to pay their passage.

7. This prophet Adams was not one of the number who returned, but he and a few others remained at Jaffa. He was once an actor, and then a Mormon, and was just the kind of material of which prophets are made. But he proved an unfortunate and unprofitable prophet to many of those who listened to his fanatical and delusive representations. Never did people more heartily regret ill-advised and mistaken steps.

8. One of the first persons who died after the colony reached Jaffa was a Mr. Clark, from Rochester, N. H., but his two sons became grown, and are now, and have been for some years, in the employ of Thomas Cook & Son, especially the elder one, Herbert C. He is a good and pleasant dragoman for Syria, and he it is who has been the captain of this band of pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh. The mother is still living; she has come to like Syria, and does not wish to return to America. It is probable the family will remain in the oriental world. A Mr. Ward, another of the same colony, is also in the employ of Thomas Cook & Son, as assistant manager for Syria and Palestine.

9. Jaffa, as remarked, is the Joppa of scripture. Some claim that it was named after Japheth, the third son of Noah. Others derive it from Yafet, meaning beautiful. Others, again, say its derivation is from Iopa, daughter of Æolus, one of the gods of the wind, and that Jaffa is the reputed scene of the legend of Andromeda. In Pliny's time the chains were still shown by which she was bound to the rocks by the cruel monster afterward slain by Perseus.

10. Joppa figures not a little in Bible history. It is mentioned in Joshua as in the boundaries of Dan. In the time it is claimed that Solomon built his temple, when he had to look to Lebanon for the timber for the same, Joppa was the place where the timber was to be sent in rafts, from which port it was conveyed to Jerusalem. Hiram's contract is said to have read in this way: We will cut wood out of Lebanon as much as thou shalt need, and we will bring it to thee in floats by sea to Joppa, . . . and will cause them to be discharged there (1 Kings, v, 9).

11. It is also claimed that the material for the rebuilding of the temple by Zerubbabel was conveyed from Lebanon to the same place. The Land of Yahweh never had a seaport of its own, and Joppa had to be utilized for the purpose, though, having no harbor, it is but an indifferent one.

12. It was here, according to the foolish story of Jonah, that the prophet fled to, to get out from the presence of Yahweh, showing that it was thought that Yahweh existed nowhere else save in the land he had chosen. It was at Joppa that Jonah took a ship for Tarshish, when he found that he had not fully escaped the presence of Yahweh; for he was followed up in a most marked manner by a fearful storm arising; whereupon, by the means of casting lots, or drawing long straws, it was found out for a positive certainty that it was on Jonah's account that the storm was sent, and he was unceremoniously thrown overboard, a great fish taking him in out of the wet.

13. One familiar with the localites where whales do congregate may wonder how it was that here in the Mediterranean whales should abound that could be on hand just at the nick of time, and be able to take a prophet in at a single swallow. Now, a journey of many thousands of miles from the Mediterranean has to be made to find a single whale. But such should remember that Yahweh prepared the fish, and that he could have prepared him on dry land just as well as anywhere. When once Yahweh wants a big fish for a special purpose, that fish is forthcoming without any postponement on account of the weather. Getting up a monster fish is but a small job for such a god.

14. At the time Jonah took that little sea-voyage the Suez canal had not been dug, and there was no way for Jonah to get to Nineveh by water, unless by going around the continent of Africa; so it is presumed that after being vomited up on dry land, he had to retrace his steps, and make an overland journey across the desert.

15. Joppa was under foreign rule at the time of the Maccabean wars, a Jewish minority being tyrannized over by the Greeks, Syrians, and Egyptians, who were continually reinforced by their fleets. Simon Maccabeus, in his time, took steps to improve and defend the place. A large number of Jews were drowned by the foreigners ruling in the place, and in revenge Judas Maccabeus attacked the town and burnt the shipping, with all on board.

16. The New Testament has considerable to say about Joppa. Here it is claimed that Peter raised Dorcas from the dead, and here he had that remarkable vision showing him that the distinction between Jew and gentile was forever abolished. In the time of the apostles many Jews dwelt in Joppa. The remaining population was a mixed multitude of Egyptians, Phœnicians, Syrians, and Greeks, with a few officials of the Roman government. Among the Jews were a few disciples of Jesus. When Dorcas died, full of good works and alms deeds, her companions sent for Peter, when, as the claim is, he restored her to life. He lodged at the house of Simon the tanner.

17. Jaffa was until recently surrounded by a high wall, but it was taken down and the material used in the construction of houses. Several merchants bought portions of the wall and converted the same into buildings. There are three mosques in the place, but they are said to possess no attractions. There are two Christian schools, one founded by an English lady, and the other is conducted under American auspices. The native children learn readily.

18. Col. Wilson, the American consul at Jerusalem, came to Jaffa the same day the pilgrims did, and put up at the same hotel. He rode Al Borak (by the bye a stallion), the same horse which the Scribe rode through the Land of Yahweh, and thus the scribe had an opportunity of bidding his four-footed friend good-bye. He, however, preferred that the colonel should ride him the forty miles to himself. The five pilgrims tarried over night at Ramleh, and rode into Jaffa on the following morning.

CHAPTER XLII.

MELCHISEDEC'S LAST VISIT.

1. The closing visit of the Venerable Friend was of the same character as the preceding ones; the same placidity, tranquillity, and quietness governed his movements and pervaded the room. The same genial smile which on every occasion had lit up his countenance illuminated it on this his last visit. His words were these:

2. My young Truth Seeker, it is with some regret that I come to-night to close our interviews, which have grown to be a pleasure to me. Thou hast listened so attentively and so patiently to the remarks I have had to make that thou hast won upon my kindest regards; and thou hast entered so readily into the spirit of my views that I may say I have learned to entertain a love for thee.

3. I perceive in thee a desire to learn what is true and what is false, and I give thee credit of being willing to embrace the truth, however unpopular, and however opposite it may be to the views entertained by the majority of thy countrymen and the Christian world at large. I honor thee for this, and can only bid thee proceed in the same course, to ever hold truth in the highest esteem, and to ever be its steadfast defender.

4. Another thing I have noticed in thee which has secured my approbation, and that is a willingness to write the whole truth about this Land of Yahweh. Many men hav performed pilgrimages here. Many have come to see how the country bears out the glowing opinions which they had formed, and what they could say to defend popular errors and preconceived prejudices.

5. There is not one in fifty of these men who have thus come to this country that has given a truthful statement; but it has been their effort to write in glowing colors, to clothe the country in dazzling hues which it has not, and to make the scores of thousands who never come here believe that this country is wrapped in a halo of glory, which it has never possessed.

6. I speak but the truth when I affirm that there is not upon the face of the entire earth another bit of country of the same size as this of which so many falsehoods have been told. I speak from knowledge upon this subject, and I am forced to assert that a continued series of the most arrant falsehoods have been spoken and written about this strip of miserable country from the earliest period down to the present time.

7. These falsehoods began nearly four thousand years ago, or, more properly, concerning that period, for the accounts were not written till a thousand years later. Much that refers to the ancient Israelites, much that passes for Jewish history, is a tissue of lies All claims of miracles and supernatural events are nothing but the grossest falsehoods, which men are fools for believing.

8. A great portion of what is called the New Dispensation, referring to Jesus and the system of religion built upon his name, and upon the miracles which he and his disciples are said to have performed is also false. A few threads of the warp are truth, but all the woof or filling is nothing but falsehoods; and it must be said that those who accept such unproved and impossible narratives and events would be equally justified in believing the stories of the Arabian Nights and the inventions of Baron Munchausen.

9. The class of men of later times, including those who have come to this country to write it up, and to spread a film of misrepresentation over it all, have been governed by the same spirit of untruth. They have kept back the unpleasant facts of the country and have put on an unreal glow, a fictitious gloss, which is as misleading as falsehood itself. But few have had the honesty and the bravery to speak the whole truth about this land in the past and present.

10. I am glad to see in thee a desire to utter what thou conceivest to be the truth, whether the same agrees with popular prejudices or not, and that thou art willing to dig up the falsehoods that have been covered over for centuries and accepted as divine truths. I commend thee for this. It is not in the range of possibility for falsehood to be converted into truth, whether it lies dormant for thousands of years or whether repeated scores of times every day.

11. It has for a long time caused me pain to know that so much falsehood has been uttered about this diminutive country, and that its miserably false system of theology has been borrowed and adopted by many intelligent peoples who ought to know better. Let it be thy labor during the remainder of thy career upon the earth to expose these falsehoods and uphold the truth, however unpopular. While there is nothing baser than to propagate falsehoods, there is nothing nobler than to utter the truth. Then, besides speaking the truth, hesitate not to speak it when thou hast found it, and be just as willing to unmask falsehood and error.

12. Thou hast now been over the greater part of the Land of Yahweh; thou hast come from the northern confines almost to the southern border, though not fully to Beersheba, which part, however, is no better than the portions bordering upon it, which thou hast seen. From the east to the west, a width of forty miles, thou art fully apprised of the narrow limits of the land as well as its poor and sterile quality.

13. Thou hast seen that the greater portion of the land which is capable of cultivation is now being cultivated, if not as thoroughly as it might be, still the natives are doing with it about all they are capable of; but with all they can do they manage barely to raise breadstuffs enough for the two hundred thousand people who now inhabit it.

14. Thou canst then judge whether these hills and mountains were ever productive valleys, whether they were ever luxuriant wheat fields, and whether this narrow, despicable land was ever capable of sustaining six millions of people, and, in the reign of two of its kings, of raising such a revenue as no other nation in the world has raised within the same length of time.

15. But as far from the truth as many of the statements are relative to the people who once occupied this land, the greatest absurdities of all pertains to the system of religion which the people venerated. They regarded it as a direct revelation from heaven, when it was simply the borrowed forms and ceremonies much earlier in use among other nations. There was little or nothing new in Judaism; little or nothing that was not borrowed from older and neighboring nations.

16. The Jews were by no means the first nation that had a god of its own, who took an interest only in the nation who worshiped him. They were not the first nation to sacrifice animals to their god for his gratification and pleasure. This rite was performed by many nations before the Jews had an existence, and they had altars, prayers, and modes of worship.

17. The Jews were not the first to have a hereditary priesthood, who pretended to be guided by heaven, and to receive from the invisible world instructions relative to the conduct of life and the various affairs pertaining to this world. This was common with all the nations of antiquity.

18. The Jews were not the first to make use of the rite of circumcision; this was employed by the Egyptians, the Ethiopians, the Colchians, and the Syrians before the time of Abraham.

19. The Jews had prophets who held communion with the gods; the ceremony of anointing kings and priests was common with them, and they had tabornacles and a temple, but not until long after the Egyptians and other nations had the same.

20. Their priests had robes and various paraphernalia for the performance of their religious ceremonies; they had feast days and fasts; they used incense and fragrant oils in their religious ceremonies; they laid yearly the sins of the people upon the head of a scapegoat, which bore them off to the wilderness; they had sacred writings or scriptures; and so had the Hindoos, the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, the Persians, and other nations, and at a much earlier date.

21. They had their divine law, including Ten Commandments, but other nations also had these ten commandments, and all as good in every particular.

22. They maintained the monotheistic idea, and so did the Persians in the time of Zoroaster; and the monotheistic idea was also the basis of the theology of other nations.

23. They pretended to have miracles and the performance of supernaturalisms, and so had other nations the same. There is scarcely one of the old systems of religion, save that of Confucius, that had not its pretended miracles and supernatural performances.

24. They had their tales about the creation of the world, a first pair—a man and woman—the parents of all the inhabitants of the globe; a flood, etc., but so had other nations, at a much earlier date and practically the same, not omitting the serpent and garden story.

25. So in going over the entire list of the rites, ceremonies, and dogmas of Judaism, it is found that there is not one among them which was not earlier believed in, taught, and practiced by other nations. If these were crude, pagan, and false with those other nations, they were also crude and false with the Israelites. No belief or practice is any more true or divine for having been held by the Jews, and it was the same with that outgrowth of Judaism—Christianity—as I showed in one of my early visits.

26. In all ages of the world religions and religious dogmas, the same as the gods, have been of human manufacture. In view of this great truth it is not strange that they have been as defective and imperfect as has been the case. The gods and religions that have been thus gotten up have been very crude and gross, but they were as creditable, perhaps, as ought to be expected for the age of the world in which they were devised.

27. It therefore does not follow that the more intelligent people of the world should continue to be satisfied with the crude and false notions which served the ignorant and superstitious people of the past. The world should have true and improved systems of religion quite as much as true systems of education, improved machinery, new and useful inventions.

28. It is equally as unwise to sit down and be content with the religious notions of three thousand years ago as it would be to continue to wear the same style of garments, shoes, and hats, to have only the literature of four thousand years ago, the implements and machinery of that age of the world, and to discard the printing-press, the steam-engine, steamboats, railroads, modern carriages, the telegraph, and the hundreds of valuable improvements and inventions which have been discovered within the past three centuries.

29. The people of four thousand years ago, or of two thousand years ago, were just as competent to establish what fashions, what implements, what inventions, and what arts we of this day should be permitted to use as they were to decide what religions we should have, what dogmas we should accept, and what pious tales we should believe. As men improve in intelligence, as they advance in scientific attainments, as they grow into and understand the laws of the universe, they will become more and more competent to formulate their own religious systems and creeds.

30. It is a cheering omen that the gods of antiquity are dying off, that the religious systems connected with them are giving way, that the mists and fogs of superstition and error are being dispelled by the sun of truth, and the stirring winds of inquiry and reason; and this must gradually continue until mankind become fully emancipated from all allegiance to the dark past, and become the intelligent disciples of the truth and science of the present.

31. The gods of ancient India once ruled with a heavy hand in a large portion of the Asiatic world, but they have lost their power. The gods and religion of Persia once swayed great power in their world, but their rule has long since become nought. The gods of Chaldea and Assyria, with their religions, long since took the sleep of death. The gods of Egypt and their intricate systems of religious belief long ago passed to their long repose. The gods and religions of Greece no longer have an existence; those of Rome have followed in the same direction. The gods and religions of Scandinavia and Germany have become the corpses of the past, and can never be resurrected.

32. Many of them had an existence of hundreds of years, and some of them even thousands, but at length the time of dissolution came; they have passed into utter and hopeless decay, and the countries where they flourished, or at least a portion of them, have not yet recovered from the crash which ensued.

33. The same class of phenomena has taken place here in this land where thou hast been sojourning within the past few weeks; the god of the Israelites, so far as this land and its people are concerned, is as dead as Brahma, Ormuzd, Osiris, Baal, Jupiter, Odin, and all the others of the gods which are now standing simply as milestones by the roadsides of nations to mark the progress of the past.

34. And this country to-day is but a bald and glaring monument of the weakness and nihility of the god which was once believed to be in full power here, and of the crude and senseless religion he enjoined. Greece is no more a ruin to day of the rule of Jupiter than Palestine is of the rule of Yahweh and the belief in him. Had not Yahweh been taken up by other nations which had not the originality to get up as good gods of their own, he would to-day, except with the Jews, be as dead as any god ever worshiped.

35. True, modern nations of Europe, having lost faith in the gods of the past, lacking the talent or the disposition to get up gods and improved systems of religion of their own, and in the confusion and national wreck which widely prevailed nearly two thousand years ago, being more engaged in war and bloodshed than in formulating sensible systems of religious belief and duty, found it convenient to adopt to some extent the God of the Jews, together with the religion of his son, an offshoot of the same.

36. This has hardly proved a fortunate thing for the world, for the adoption of that system of belief was followed by a thousand years of darkness and mental night long previously unknown in the more intellectual portion of the world; a worse state of superstition, darkness, and error prevailed than was known before or since; and a worse tyranny of oppression, persecution, and life-taking for religious opinion ensued than the earth was ever before cursed with.

37. It is true that there has been within the past two or three centuries some improvement in Christendom, both in the character of its God and in its practice with regard to controlling the views of the people. This god is now professed not to be a god of war, of bloodshed, of sacrifice, and hate, but he is claimed to be a god of mercy, goodness, and love, and his worshipers, instead of putting people to death for not entertaining the prescribed religious dogmas, have learned to become a little more tolerant, to incorporate more of humanity in their creed, and to conduct themselves somewhat as befits civilized human beings.

38. This evolution of the God and his religion has not grown out of the inherent qualities of his character, or of his religion; but it has been wholly due to the improved civilization of the nations who have adopted him. As peoples improve so do their gods also improve. But the record of Yahweh cannot be wiped out; his cruelty, his bloodshed, and his revenge cannot be obliterated. With all the reformation he is capable of, he will still remain the same unreasonable, irascible, revengeful, narrow, and impossible God that he has been from the first. He must be discarded before mankind can advance to the high position in the scale of civilization and perfection which they ought to occupy.

39. It is the same with his new and modified system of religion—Christianity. As it has nothing new or true; as it is made up of the shreds and old patches of paganism; as it is replete with falsehoods and miracles and supernaturalisms; as it has made deadly enemies of members of the human family, causing them to throw each other into prisons, to take each other's lives, and to deluge the earth with blood; as it is made up of errors and lies, it must also go by the board. It has been thoroughly tried, and has proved a failure; its bloody rule has proved a curse; it has blinded and fettered the human race; it has been a costly experiment in the world, and must step aside, like the errors of the same character which have preceded it, and must give place to the religion of humanity, of truth, of science, and of reason.

40. The prospect for the coming time is not without promise and cheer. It is only a matter of time when truth must prevail over error, when the superstitions of the past must give way before the light of the sun of truth. The wheels of progress often move slowly, and sometimes they have even turned backward; but in the eternal nature of things they must turn steadily on in the right direction; the race must progress; truth must come uppermost, and ever must justice be done.

41. It is cheering to note the signs of encouragement that are visible in the world's mental horizon; men are now giving more thought to the causes and elements of human progress than ever before; myths and falsehoods are being less revered than in former times; the students of science are becoming more and more numerous, and the masses of the people are embracing and accepting the truths which it teaches. Error is steadily giving way, the myths and fables are falling back, and the world is growing wiser and better.

42. It is the duty of those who have found truth to give their fellow-men the benefit of it. Those who have become freed from the shackles and fetters of error should gladly help to free those around them. Truth and happiness are not impaired by circulation and diffusion. It pleases me to think thou art aiming to pursue this course—to share with thy fellow-beings the excellence and benefits of the truths thou hast found.

43. Go on in this way; help the truth to be spread among your fellow-beings; be faithful and courageous in the performance of this duty, and a coveted memory will remain behind thee when thou hast passed away. Those who are now unborn will bless thee, and the welfare and happiness of thy fellow-creatures will be correspondingly increased.

44. Now, my young friend, I have completed the slight task I imposed upon myself. I have hurriedly touched upon several topics which might be greatly enlarged upon, and at the same time I have left many points unnoticed. What I have said must stand for what is worth. If it should be of even very slight use to any of thy readers, I shall not regret the hours I have spent with thee.

45. I thank thee for thy patience in listening to me, and for thy faithfulness in committing the same to writing. I shall continue to entertain for thee a high respect, and wish thee pleasure on thy journey round the world, several years of good health, much tranquillity of mind, and a peaceful closing of thy earthly career. I leave my peace with thee, and hope to sometime have other interviews with thee after thy return home. Good-night. I will now depart.

46. The Scribe felt duly grateful for the notice he had received, and just before the Visitor passed out spoke these words: Venerable friend, I beg thee to accept my sincere thanks for the visits thou hast paid me nightly whilst journeying through the Land of Yahweh. I prize the truths which thou hast uttered, and the peaceful, tranquil spirit which clothes thee as a garment. I will be glad for any future visits it may please thee to pay me, and I trust thou wilt always find me faithful in the discharge of my duty in doing what I can to promulgate truth and expose error. Venerable Friend, good-night. And then he was gone.

47. The Scribe has but few words to add to the foregoing. It is the farthest from his wish to mislead his readers, or to deceive them in the matter of communications from the Venerable Visitor. While he makes no claim to inspiration, nor to holding communion with departed spirits, he is aware that the line of distinction between what is thought to be inspiration, and the action of the human mind, is very dim and uncertain.

48. He is morally certain that many have fancied themselves inspired, and under the guidance of disembodied spirits, when it was only their own minds that were at work, and their own thoughts being evolved. In view of all this, and fearing that he may claim too much, and thereby mislead his readers, and lest some of his own thoughts may have been woven into this recital, he wishes to now withdraw all claims that he was inspired to write what he has written, and moreover to admit that Melchisedec probably did really and positively visit him. Amen.

CHAPTER XLIII.

NINETEENTH DAY—LOOKING ABOUT JAFFA.

1. Not much remained for the pilgrims to do while waiting for the steamer, but to see what few sights are in Jaffa. The gardens and orange groves were visited, and the beautiful exotic plants and flowers were admired by the pilgrims.

2. They also visited the dirty town, and patiently endured the hundreds of cries for backsheesh from ragged and equally dirty natives, and the small stores were hastily inspected, without much temptation to make purchases being encountered.

3. The house of Simon the tanner, where Peter performed the astounding miracle of raising Sister Dorcas from the dead, was taken in, or rather the house where it is pretended the wonderful feat was performed; though as the whole town was razed to the ground, and as all who for a long time subsequently dwelt there had to abide in tents, it is a little difficult to see how the house could be identified and located, unless by the help of Saint Helena.

4. The house is a modern stone structure, probably erected within the last fifty years; like other houses, it has a flat roof, from which, the house being but a short distance from the sea, a very fine view of it is obtained. It may be that Peter raised a dead woman to life in this building, or where it stands, but the Scribe does not believe it.

5. The pilgrims inspected the schools, one of them having some sixty native girls as scholars, and the other about two-thirds that number. The scholars seem fond of singing, both in English and Arabic, and acquitted themselves finely. Contributions are requested from the generous-hearted, both in England and America, to keep the schools in a flourishing condition.

6. Five miles north of Jaffa, or thereabouts, are several water-mills for grinding wheat, etc. These belong to the government, and are rented out at good prices to enterprising men who run them. They are pretty largely patronized, people coming to them for forty miles around.

7. Somewhat nearer is a German settlement, aside from the colony forming a part of the town, which is said to be flourishing reasonably well in agricultural pursuits.

8. This closes the Book of Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Vahweh. May the next country visited be more interesting, and not bring to mind so many untruthful narratives and so many impossible supernaturalisms. Adieu to Yahweh for the present.

The Epistle of Bennett the Aposte to the Truth Seekers.

CHAPTER I.

INJUNCTIONS DIVERSE AND SUNDRY.

1. Bennett, an apostle of truth and common sense, by the grace of numerous friends now on a journey around the world, sends greeting to all the faithful disciples who remain at home in the broad land of Unclesam.

2. The things which be near to my heart speak I unto you, partly to remind you of the anxieties I feel for you and the desires I have to be remembered by you. Therefore speak I freely unto you.

3. Comfort and sustain Mary and contribute the needful supplies to keep the lamp of truth brightly burning, to the end that light may be spread abroad in the land.

4. Encourage Eugene, and hold up his hands, that he and you may prevail over the legions of darkness and error.

5. Hearken to Elizur and Thaddeus, to Theron and George, to Robert and Samuel, to Horace and Josiah, to Stephen and Titus, to Moses and William, and to all who speak words of truth and enlightenment.

6. Listen to Elmina and Lucy, to Amelia and Olive, to Amy and Fannie, to Ella and Susan, to Grace and Mattie, and to all those good sisters who by their words of cheer and counsel make the way plain and clear before you.

7. Greet each other often in the bonds of fraternal love and in unity of purpose, keeping always in view the greatest good that can be accomplished for such portions of the family of man as come in contact with you.

8. Be not cast down though adversities sometimes come upon you, and though the enemies of truth and mental liberty may seek to cast opprobrium upon you and represent you as not respectable before men.

9. Be not discouraged, even, though some within your own ranks should prove false and seek, by designing arts, to weaken your efforts and to present you in an unfavorable light before your enemies.

10. It is in the nature of things that some should be treacherous and false, and that while they claim for themselves great purity and respectability they should seek to stab you in the dark. Think not strange if sometimes these things occur.

11. Fear not misrepresentation and defamation. Be not dismayed though some should seek to asperse you and call you uncultured and impure and denounce you as the off-scouring of the earth, even the rag tag and bob tails of society. Such epithets will harm you little, and more those who use them. Verily they shall have their reward.

12. Be strong in your own integrity and resolve to do right at all times, though to do so causes you to be unpopular in the eyes of men.

13. Let your actions be governed by the best of motives, and accomplish the most good in your power in the position you find yourselves placed.

14. Remember that you are called to be the salt of the earth, to be governed by the highest principles of morality and right, and that you should let your light shine before all men.

15. Be circumspect in your actions, be watchful over your conduct, and at all times be resolved to accomplish the greatest good in your power toward your fellow-beings, and in keeping with your abilities, your rights, and your station in life.

16. If through the weakness of human nature you should sometimes deviate from the straight path of rectitude and propriety, play not the false part to deny your mistake, but frankly admit that you were weak for the moment; but resolve that the fault shall not be repeated.

17. Remember that falsehood always aggravates a fault and makes it more heinous in the eyes of all good people. One who always speaks the truth is deserving of great honor.

18. Always bear in mind that you have but yourselves and each other to depend upon, and that you cannot expect aid from supernatural sources, and that you have no friend above the clouds who will come to your aid when you fail to help yourselves.

19. Be assured it is far wiser to exercise to the fullest extent the powers and abilities which you possess, and to use the means within your reach, than to call upon imaginary beings and to look for help to those whom you know nothing of.

20. Be not faint-hearted in what you undertake to do, and fear not the lions you may find in your way. Courage and determination can accomplish much, while timidity and irresolution must always prove failures.

21. Let justice and right be the standard by which you govern your actions, and never forget that the grandest thing a man can perform is to do what is right under all circumstances.

22. The greatest virtue which men and women can attain to is to do their full duty to their fellow-beings, and to do naught that will cause pain or sorrow to visit a fellow mortal. That is the highest duty we are called to fulfill.

23. While we do nothing to injure another, it is the highest and holiest incentive to increase the happiness of those around us, to make sunshine and joy take the place of gloom and sorrow, and to make sadness and trouble give way to cheerfulness and peace.

24. We are not all called to perform great deeds and to accomplish proud achievements, but none of us are so humble but what we can do acts of kindness to those around us, and contribute, though in a small way, to the happiness of others.

25. It is not our duty, however, to make ourselves miserable that the happiness of others may be increased, nor to take the food from our own mouths to feed those who make no exertions for themselves; but as a rule we will find that the more we contribute to the happiness of others the more we will add to our own.

CHAPTER II.

LOVE TO HUMANITY RECOMMENDED.

1. Every one's duty is first to provide for himself and for his own household, but this being faithfully performed a love for humanity is the next highest and holiest sentiment he can feel. Humanity is our highest object of reverence.

2. We can do good or do harm to our fellow-beings, but we can do neither good nor harm to infinite gods, whether they dwell in the ethereal blue, a thousand miles from the earth, or make their residence in the most far away star.

3. If there are any such beings as gods, they are unknown to us, they are far from us, they are beyond our reach, they have no need for our services, and it is wholly beyond our power to do them either good or harm. They may be likened to the sun, which is neither helped on by our praise nor retarded by our frowns.

4. But our fellow-men are always with us; among them we always find those who are good and noble and true, worthy of our highest esteem, and among them, too, we always can find those who are needy of the little we may have to spare and the little we can do to assist them.

5. We can always find those who are weighed down with trouble and sorrow whom a kind word will cheer, whom a kind action will make happier, and whom sympathy and tenderness will gladden and soothe.

6. The love of humanity is, then, the highest love we can cherish, and to do good deeds to our fellow-beings is the most commendable work we can perform. We have no knowledge of the gods, and can have none, but we have much knowledge of man and should strive daily to increase it.

7. Those who act with a great lack of wisdom who bestow all their adoration, praise, and love to an unknown, imaginary being above the clouds, while they can see no good in their brothers and sisters, and see fit to do little to smooth their pathway through life.

8. There could be no grander conception of a happy world than for every individual in it to be anxious to add a little to the happiness of every other individual with whom he comes in contact.

9. There is nothing impossible, nothing superhuman, nothing very difficult, devolving upon any individual to perform, but the duties of life are easy, every day to be occupied in some useful employment to benefit his condition and to add a little to the aggregate of human good deeds.

10. If our motives are of the right character, if we make it our element to be doing good, to add a little to the sum of human happiness, to help a little in removing want and in lessening misery, it is always easy, always a pleasure, to do so.

11. It is grand to show kindness even to the brute creation, to the animals which are serviceable to us, and minister to our needs and our comforts; and then how much grander to be kind to human beings whose needs are greater and whose sorrows are often more acute.

12. Man has already made great progress since he began to rise from the low estate in which he first found himself, but the progress is but slight in proportion to what he is capable of. He has done well, but he is capable of doing still much more.

13. Man may be regarded as an epitome of all that is below him in the scale of animal life; and he is endowed with passions and selfish qualities which, if yielded to, not only interfere with the happiness of others, but also with his own.

14. It is man's prerogative to draw from existence all the happiness that is possible, but this is not done by yielding to the voice of passion, or by following the tastes which end in excesses that militate against his physical and mental health, and must result in pain and unhappiness.

15. More happiness is secured by maintaining a proper control of the passions, the appetites, and selfish desires than in allowing them to be the controlling motive, and in yielding to their dangerous influences.

16. Immoderate selfishness is man's great fault. It makes him unjust to his fellow-man; it causes him to see his own advantage, his own profit, and his own pleasure, even to the detriment and injury of his fellow-beings.

17. To overcome this selfish propensity, to not be always eager to secure his own pleasure and profit, to not be willing to injure the interests of others that his own may be promoted, is the grandest work to which man can devote himself.

18. Our tastes, our incentivs, our desires and objects are all susceptible of modification and improvement. We can make of ourselves almost anything we please. Self-control and a constant watch over ourselves will accomplish it.

19. It is for better for a man to be able to control himself than to be desirous to compel others to submit to his will. He that governeth himself wisely is greater than he who commands an army, or controlleth a city.

20. Could man's motives always be of an exalted character, always governed by noble impulses, and actuated by the desire to serve others rather than himself, he would arise greatly in the scale of useful existence.

21. Every individual ought to feel a desire to improve himself and his own usefulness, and to improve the world, if only a little, to leave it some better than he found it, some wiser and some happier for his having lived in it.

22. This is all within our power if we will but act up to the best knowledge we hav. We can do as well as the angels are supposed to do if we only make the necessary effort, and curb every incentive to do that calculated to injure ourselves, or our fellow-beings.

23. It is not difficult to spend one hour in the day in pursuit of that which we know is high and worthy, which will improve our status in life; and what we can do for one hour we can do for the entire day; what we can do for a day, we can do for a month, for a year, and for a lifetime.

24. Life is made up of breaths, of inhalations and exhalations, and while taking a breath any person can perform his duty, and not fall short in it; and what he could do while taking one breath he can do while taking a thousand.

25. Perfection, however, is not to be expected from human beings. Slight mistakes are almost inevitable, but with a settled purpose to pursue the right course and to do wrong to none, one's life may be passed in doing much good, and very little harm.

CHAPTER III.

GOOD CONDUCT ALWAYS PREFERABLE.

1. You should not forget that you are called to sustain a higher morality that the believers in gods and devils, whose actions are governed by fear of suffering, and the anger of the gods and devils.

2. You should lead good lives because it is right, and because it is your pleasure to do so, rather than from the fear of any angry or malicious being. He who abstains from wrong doing from fear of punishment or of being cast into hell deserves little more credit than he whose life is spent in evil doing.

3. It is a brave and good man who pursues the right course, and who performs his duty faithfully because of the superiority of good actions over evil actions, and he is cowardly and contemptible who only does the right that he may escape punishment. Do good because it is right, and shun evil because it is wrong.

4. The population of the world is made up of a heterogeneous mass of humanity, and with the thousands of years that have rolled away since man has dwelt on the earth the race is yet far from what it should be; there is not that spirit of love and kindness between man and man that should be sacredly cherished.

5. This is because the spirit of love has not been cultivated and fostered as much as it should be; the more animal part of man's nature has governed him; his aim has been to rule over his fellow-men, to subdue them to his wishes, and to appropriate to his own use the fruits of their labors.

6. This spirit has brought chieftainship and kingcraft and priestcraft into existence, and has introduced servitude aud slavery of the most onerous character. The masses have been the servants of the few; one man has governed his thousands.

7. But men have now become more intelligent, they have received more knowledge, and it is time for all the oppression to end. The conviction is gaining ground that even the most humble have their rights as really as the great and strong.

8. The condition of the world is changed by each individual changing a little. If each person living would place a single stone on a pyramid or monument a vast pile would be raised.

9. So if every person will add but a little to the monument of good deeds, a great accession will be made—a pyramid of immense size.

10. And in the same way, if each will make a little change in the direction of reform and improvement, the aggregate of the gain will be great indeed.

11. If each person adds but one good deed to the monument of excellence, its magnitude will be greatly augmented.

12. Knowledge, the right disposition, and effort are the necessary agencies to lead to this result. Without knowledge, without the right disposition and the proper effort, little progress can be made.

13. This effort and this proper disposition should be widespread, and not confined to a few. If every one will do a little it will be easy for all, and great good will be accomplished. If all pull in one direction a great body can be moved along.

14. Every one who shows a disposition to help in any good work encourages every other person who is disposed in the same direction; it also has its effect upon the indifferent, and brings them to have a similar disposition.

15. Good deeds are as contagious as the bad, and a good example from a wise man will help many to also perform good works. The more we see of kind and humane actions in others the more we wish to excel in the same ourselves.

16. If men could realize at all times the great influence which example exerts upon those younger, and with less powers of mind, there would be more circumspect and guarded, and would wield a much greater influence for good.

17. Love begets love, kindness begets kindness, sympathy begets sympathy, and good deeds, even though small and simple in their character, draw forth good deeds from all who witness them and are brought under their influence.

18. It is the same with deeds of an opposite nature; their influence spreads far and wide; anger begets anger, contention breeds contention, selfishness begets selfishness, and hatred begets hatred. A bad example is as prolific of wrong as a good example is of the right

19. This is just as simple as the addition of the smallest numbers in making a sum which a child can comprehend, but it is just as true as the most elaborate problem in Euclid. Every example, every action, exerts its influence, either good or bad, according to its nature.

20. A child whose parents are always mild, gentle, patient, reasonable, and forbearing will grow up with an amiable disposition, and with a decided tendency to good conduct and a good life, unless its organization is an unfortunate one, and then that influence is far more beneficial than its opposite.

21. It would be well could parents always realize the great responsibility that rests upon them in molding and forming the habits and characters of their children. Children are much what their parents make them.

22. It is the same with the older children of a family with regard to the younger. The power of example is so strong that the little tender minds are bent and inclined by the examples and influences which surround them.

23. All persons who have come to the age of maturity should remember that a responsibility of much weight rests upon them. Their example before the young should be such as to incline them to good actions and not to wrong.

24. Good parents insure good children; discretion on the part of the mature in life conduces to discretion on the part of the young; while the more imprudence and impropriety seen by the young the more they will be attracted to the wrong.

25. Far, far better and happier would the world be if a bad example was never set before the young, and if needless pain was never inflicted. The nearer this is attained to the more of a paradise will be established here upon earth, the more of heaven we will find.

CHAPTER IV.

SCIENCE THE SAFEST TEACHER.

1. The greatest gain we can make is knowledge. This will help us to cause the world to grow better more than all other agencies we can employ—the knowledge of the true, the knowledge of the false, the knowledge of the right, and the knowledge of the wrong.

2. First of all knowledge to be acquired is of nature's laws; these are the foundation of all knowledge, the principles which govern all existences, all movements, all conditions.

3. Nature is the highest power that exists, it is the sum total of all existences, the highest, the lowest, the all. It cannot be too well understood, it cannot be too closely studied; and knowledge of its laws cannot be too thoroughly learned.

4. Every facility which is afforded to aid in the acquirement of a knowledge of nature, of the laws of the universe, is a blessing to the world and a great promoter of human good.

5. Science is the handmaid to knowledge; science has done more to impart true knowledge to mankind than all other agencies combined. Demonstrated science may be regarded as the only true source of knowledge—it is knowledge.

6. What is called revelation is a snare, a delusion, a falsehood. It is pretended to be information given from the gods, but it really comes from no farther than the channel which conveys it.

7. Those who pretend to bring intelligence from the gods know no more about them than the most ignorant person to whom the announcement is made. Those who claim to speak for the gods simply speak their own thoughts. What they wish to make men believe they pretend is said by the gods.

8. Simple men have believed these statements, and in this way the grossest errors have been spread and the deepest darkness has existed among mankind.

9. The very claim that the gods speak unto men, or send messages to them through the offices of a mediating party, is based upon deception and falsehood. The more men listen to such falsehoods the worse it is for them.

10. These messages are often conflicting, often absurd, often injurious, often darkening, and always false; because the gods do not speak; they are as dumb as the rocks, they are as speechless as the grave.

11. With nature it is not so; her language is always clear, her representations are always true; she never pretends to what is false, she never misleads. To know her is to know the truth, and to study her is to be wise.

12. School teachers are needed to give lessons to the uninformed regarding nature and her laws—men who have made a thorough study of her phenomena and her principles and who correctly place her above all priestly claims and pretensions.

13. These men are called scientists, for science is the sum of all demonstrated knowledge, which is acquired by close observation, accurate tests, and continued study and application.

14. These are the true friends of mankind; these show men what is truth; they point out falsehoods and errors; they prove that everything that takes place is natural; that nothing ever was or ever can be supernatural.

15. Supernaturalism is an utter absurdity; it is an impossibility, it is wholly an assumption, it is an imposition, it is a tyranny, it is an enemy, it is a constant and perpetual lie. Nothing has done so much harm in the world as an acceptance of the supernatural.

16. No true scientist, no real student of nature, no man who understands her thoroughly, and is unblinded by priestcraft, no man who is able to perceive the truth can believe in supernaturalism.

17. Supernaturalism is the doctrine of gods and devils, of purgatory and hells, of wretchedness and lies; but nature is at the same time the fountain of life, the cause of existence, the source of all truth.

18. Let us then regard the men of science, teachers of nature, the expounders of her laws, the demonstrators of her forces, those who show us the danger in violating her exactions, as our best friends. Let us learn their lessons; let us study their works; let us studiously seek all the information they have to impart.

19. As the men of science are those who study nature the most closely; as they have learned most of the laws of the universe, as they have acquired the greatest measure of truth; let us choose them for our priests and our prophets, and let us discard all who teach falsehoods and lies.

20. Yes, let us regard the men who pretend to talk for the gods and those who profess to expound and explain what the gods have said, who tell us that supernaturalism is true, and should be the guide to mankind, as enemies of the human race, the sources of darkness, and the disseminators of the grossest impositions.

21. They have been leading men astray four thousands of years; they have set up their own inventions in place of reality; they represent the universe as a thing made a little while ago from nothing; they teach that the gods made it in a few days, and for pastime. Oh, what falsehoods they teach!

22. They cry nature down and speak slightly of her, as though she was something to be despised and hated; they set their gods above her as being wiser, truer, better; but at the same time they claim that their gods cannot be understood and comprehended only as they themselves go between and vouchsafe to make known the same.

23. Truly this class of men are enemies to the world because they teach falsehood instead of truth, darkness instead of light, supernaturalism instead of naturalism.

24. Thus we see standing before us the teachers of nature's truths, and the teachers of the falsehoods of gods and devils. It will not require long for us to be able to choose between them. When once understood one class cannot be mistaken for the other.

25. Then let us be wise and embrace the truth. Let us take the students of nature by the hand. Let us commit to heart the lessons they teach. Let us learn all we can of nature; and let us forever discard her enemy supernaturalism, with all the false teachers who promulgate it.

CHAPTER V.

GODS AND RELIGIONS OF THE PAST.

1. Friends of truth, while making this journey on which you sent me, I have had ample opportunity to look over the countries where the gods and superstitions held sway thousands of years.

2. I have comprehended the effects these gods and superstitions have had upon the countries where they existed, upon the people who hugged those delusions, as well as their general effect upon the world.

3. In Greece the gods once flourished in regal splendor; society was based upon the belief in them; the theory and supernaturalism connected with them were woven into their literature, their poetry, and their art.

4. They were a great and grand people, but they had only a limited knowledge of nature and her laws; they foolishly looked to the gods for aid; they expected supernatural assistance, and they failed.

5. They and their works passed away. Their superstition was superseded by another of a still worse variety—more dark and forbidding—called Christianity, and all her greatness passed away and a wreck, a shadow, was all that remained.

6. The same is true of ancient gods and religions of Troy, of Ephesus, and of Cyprus, and the same of Phœnicia, the same of Egypt, not yet visited, the same of Chaldea, Assyria, and Persia, the same is true to a large extent of India, Thibet, and Burmah.

7. The same is true, sadly true, of Palestine, where for a time its god and religion flourished, which were thought to be destined to fill the earth; but now the country is desolate; no country is more utterly and hopelessly in ruins.

8. The gods and religions of no country promised more, no country was more surfeited with extravagant predictions, but none have been more thoroughly falsified, and in no country has the fall of both the gods and of the people been more thorough and overwhelming.

9. In no country and of no country have greater misrepresentations been made, in none have high hopes been more thoroughly disappointed, and in none have more arrant falsehoods been told. In the matter of falsehoods, past and present, Palestine beats the world.

10. A fragment of the religion of the latter country, but founded upon its errors and containing much of its untruth, has been imported and adopted by other nations; and being comparatively fresh and new, it still exhibits considerable life;

11. But as whatever is based upon error cannot endure, so this paganism engrafted upon Jewish stock is bound to follow in the wake of its predecessors, to go into ruins and be counted among the relics of the past.

12 All these gods and religions have been based upon the great untruth of supernaturalism; all have been composed largely of the same gross falsehoods, and all have been inimical to the best interests of the human race.

13. All have fallen short of affording to man the truths he needed, all produced darkness instead of light: all proved an incubus instead of an aid; all augmented the evils of ignorance instead of increas ing knowledge.

14. When these gods and religions were in their glory it was firmly thought to be a great merit to belive in them; faith in them was counted a virtue; and to be considered a moral man was to blindly accept all the claims with regard to these gods and religions.

15. A greater fallacy, however, could hardly be devised. There is at no time merit in believing unfounded assertions; there is no excellence in being deceived; there is no virtue or morality in believing a falsehood.

16. These remarks apply with much force to the current system of religion. Its promulgators make loud claims that there is great merit in the simple matter of believing the tales upon which their religion is established.

17. By general consent it is thought that no system of morality is equal to that which comes from believing the Christian system of religion; and to doubt its claim is held to be the worst of immorality, the worst of sins.

18. There is no greater absurdity than this. Belief is not a matter of choice, not a matter of will, but with people of good intelligence it is a matter dependent upon evidence. It is not a person of sound mind who believes without evidence.

19. It is a stupid man that refuses to believe the evidence of his senses; it is an unreasonable man who, in forming his belief will throw good evidence aside; and that man is equally stupid and unreasonable who will found a fixed belief on no evidence at all.

20. Of course a man will accept the evidence of persons with whom he is acquainted, and whom he knows to be men of veracity; when they make a statement that is probable, that is not impossible, but from this it does not follow that he should believe persons wholly unknown to him when they proclaim utter impossibilities.

21. It may be no sin for a man to lack good sense; it may be no crime for him to be simple and overcredulous; it may not necessarily make him a bad man to believe every wild and unfounded tale he may hear, but certainly there is no virtue in becoming a fool, nor in swallowing every falsehood that may be uttered.

22. It would be a species of wrong for a reasonable man to demand that a person should believe anything wholly unnatural without proof. A reasonable God would be no more exacting. But this is what the advocates of Christianity are constantly doing—they demand belief without the slightest proof.

23. A child may reasonably believe the statements of its parents without proof, until by own knowledge and experience it is able to judge for itself; but it would be wrong for grown men and women to be required to always remain children and to believe without proof. It is the prerogative of mature minds to found their belief upon evidence.

24. When told that twice two makes four, that two halves are equal to a whole, that a part is less than the whole, we are compelled to believe it, because it is sustained by evidence and our own experience, and we could not doubt it if we tried.

25. But to believe without evidence, to accept without investigation, to admit apparent impossibilities without a vestige of proof, is not a virtue; it is not conducive to morality. Strange and unnatural things should not be believed until unmistakable evidence is forthcoming.

CHAPTER VI.

LOVE, FAITH, AND THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH—PAUL IMPROVED.

1. It does not follow, then, because we cannot believe that of which there is no evidence, that we are immoral. A credulous person may be very defective in morals, while an incredulous person may have the best moral character. Morality is to be measured by actions, not by opinions.

2. All other conditions being equal, those whose belief is founded upon evidence should be the most moral. They understand that good and bad conduct inevitably produce their effects, and they govern their actions accordingly.

3. They obtain not their salvation, their justification, nor their happiness upon the merits of others; but having only their own good works to depend upon, it stands them in hand to practice the best morals, to entertain the purest sentiments, and to be governed by the best motives.

4. They are entitled to the use of the best maxims that have been spoken and written in the ages of the past, including the sayings of that other apostle who wrote so many epistles, and to whom several are accredited which he did not write.

5. Let us, then, make use of some of his injunctions, with such modifications and improvements as may suggest themselves; to be followed, perhaps, by a few of a more ancient date by several centuries.

6. I make mention of you in my prayers, and remember you in the spirit of kindness and gratitude, and I wish to share with you in all that my eyes find to behold, and my mind finds to contemplate.

7. If I am a trifle free with my advice, and bring various hints to your remembrance, it is not because I think myself any better than you, or that I am any better judge of what constitutes the purest morals.

8. On the other hand, I am sensible of my own imperfections, the little weaknesses of my own nature, and that, like the greater portion of the human family, I have not yet quite attained to perfection, nor do I expect to for a year or two.

9. I long to see you—not that I may impart to you great spiritual gifts, nor to introduce you to the Holy Ghost, but to assure you of the regard I feel for you, to encourage you in maintaining the true belief in the face of all opposition.

10. I would be comforted together with you by the mutual faith both of you and me. I rejoice that your faith is understood and duly spoken of by many of the best and brightest minds in the world, and I pray the same may abide.

11. Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren and sisters, that oftentimes I purpose to come unto you, that I may have some fruit among you, even as among other heathen, and that we may cheer each other in the performance of the good work which is before us.

12. For as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel of truth to you and to all who are willing to hear, whether in Rome or anywhere else. I would that all men be brought to a knowledge of the truth.

13. For I wish to assure you that I am not ashamed of the gospel of truth, for it is the power of reason unto salvation from all the errors and superstition that abound in the world and have abounded for many centuries.

14. Glory, honor, and peace to every man and woman that worketh good, for there is no respecters of persons among those who are truly wise and upright; every person who doeth good shall surely receive his just reward in the fruit it yields.

15. As important as it is that man should possess the right faith, knew ye that no man is justified by faith alone; only so far as faith leads to good works is it a justification to him who embraces it. When faith and works are compared, works stand far ahead. It even may be said it matters little what a man believes, so his actions are right.

16. It is wrong to say that faith is to be accounted for righteousness; for unless a man's works are of a righteous character there is no righteousness in him. It is true that faith without works is dead.

17. Be not deceived, no man's faith can be a justification to you, no more can any man's works be a justification to you. Every man must perform good works himself if he would have the justification which good works afford.

18. Circumcision is nothing, the shedding of the blood of animals is nothing, baptism is nothing, the joining of the church is nothing, the communion with saints is nothing, the partaking of the bread and wine is nothing, if a man hath not the right spirit in his heart, and performeth not the deeds which are commendable.

19. The performance of rites and ceremonies is as chaff, the profession of faith is as the dust driven by the wind, if a man hath not the right spirit in his heart and striveth to do the works which are comely.

20. For as many as are led by the spirit of truth, they are the children of the truth, and the truth shall make them free from all the bondage and dark and false creeds that prevail in the world.

21. For I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels nor principalities nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come; nor hight nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of truth which is in nature and reason.

22. I say the truth is in nature. I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the spirit of truth itself; that I have great cheerfulness and continual joy in my heart, because of the great truth which you and myself have found.

23. Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer are for the progress and happiness of the human race, that they may all so far as possible come to a knowledge of the truth, for the truth freeth from bondage and superstition and maketh its possessor free indeed.

24. For I bear record before you and all men that I feel a love for the truth and I rejoice in my heart greatly when any man or woman doth find it. I feel a zeal for the truth which gives me peace and I find a joy in its service that the advocates of error cannot deprive me of.

25. It is written, How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of truth and of peace and bring glad tidings of good things to those who have been sitting in darkness, and upon whom the sun of truth has not thrown its brilliant rays.

26. All day long will I stretch forth my hands and raise my voice unto the sons and daughters of men, and seek to deliver unto them the gospel of truth which we have found, and to tell them of the liberty and peace which dwells in the truth as it is in nature.

CHAPTER VII.

MORE FROM THE APOSTLES — TRUTH, JUSTICE, AND BRAVERY vs. HYPOCRISY AND FALSEHOOD.

1. I beseech you, therefore, brethren and sisters, in the name and spirit of truth, that ye also consecrate yourselves to the love and service of the truth, for it is more excellent than all other treasures to be found in the world. It leadeth to happiness and peace.

2. And be not conformed to the hypocrisy and superstition which are in the world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your minds, and the reformation of your lives, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect obedience to truth.

3. For I say through the grace and strength which abound in the truth, to every man and woman among you, not to think of yourselves more highly than you ought, but to think soberly according to reason and justice which nature deals out to every person.

4. Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good. Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honor preferring one another. Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit, serving one another.

5. Rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation; continuing instant in good efforts, distributing to the necessity of the needy; given to hospitality. Be patient with those who persecute you and traduce you, showing that you have a better religion than they. Bless, and curse not.

6 Rejoice with them that do rejoice and weep with them that weep. Be of the same mind one toward another. Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate. Be not wise in your own conceit. Recompense to no man evil for evil. Provide things honest in the sight of all men.

7. If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men. Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves unwisely, nor in a spirit of passion, and neither improperly give place to wrath. If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him to drink. Heap not coals of fire on his head lest they burn him; be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.

8. Owe no man anything longer than is necessary, and make it your leading principle to discharge all your just debts. There is no better religion than to pay your honest debts. Deal honestly with all men, and despise to misrepresent in making a bargain, and seek not to take advantage of your neighbor.

9. Remember at all times that a spirit of honesty and a principle of integrity are the grandest characteristics that a man can possess, and that it is the worst of meanness for a man to take an advantage of one who is inferior to himself, or who is his own equal.

10. Be punctual in carrying out the contracts which you enter into, first giving due and careful consideration to the things you agree to perform. Blessed be the memory of the man who honestly and faithfully performs what he agrees.

11. Let the professors of false doctrines, those who boast of going to heaven upon the merits of another, have the monopoly of forfeiting their word, and of taking little contemptible advantages in business transactions, but as the disciples of the truth let me enjoin you not to act in that manner.

12. In your very hearts despise meanness of all kinds. Despise the very spirit that leads man to do wrong to a brother, a friend, or a neighbor, or which would cause him to commit an act of which are honorable man would be ashamed.

13. Despise in your very hearts the man who, with lies and falsehood and uncleanness in his heart, delights to bring trouble and anguish upon others, who wears a hypocritical mask, and pretends to be working for purity and morality, when in fact he is laying his plots to get some unfortunate person into deep trouble.

14. Despise the hypocrite, the liar, the defamer, and the man who attempts to do a deep wrong to a brother in the name of purity, of higher morality, and of superior virtue. Worse than all other mean acts are those performed by hypocrites under the cloak of purity and virtue.

15. Despise the man governed by envy and malice and hatred, to cover which he boasts of his own goodness, and says, I am better than thou. Honor not the man who seeks to build himself up by pulling another down. Honor not the hypocrite and the liar.

16. Despise the man who makes himself busy in digging up the faults and mistakes of his brother, which have been buried and forgotten, to spread them before the world, and to shout to all men, saying, See what a bad man is here; trust him not; patronize him not; withdraw your friendship from him.

17. Honor not the falsifier, the backbiter, the conspirator who, by the dark arts of the brigand and the assassin, combines with evil-minded men to work injury upon an unsuspecting brother who knows not of the machinations and plottings against him.

18. Honor not the man who will take a mean advantage of a brother when down, when in prison, and in the hands of the enemy. Verily such conduct is unworthy a thief, and is what many a thief would scorn to be guilty of.

19. But accord honor and esteem to the man whose whole conduct is governed by justice and truth, who despises hypocrisy and falsehood, and who would sooner cut off his right hand than take advantage of a prostrate foe.

20. Love the man of integrity and honor, whose principles of justice and integrity are as firm as the hills, who would sacrifice his fortune, his good name, and even his life, before he would descend to arts of the knave, the hypocrite, and the liar.

21. All honor to the man of truth; all honor to the judge who sits in judgment and holds the scales of justice truly and fairly; who will not be swerved by favoritism, prejudice, and bigotry to deprive a fellow-citizen of the honor and liberty which are dearer even than life.

22. But shame and infamy rest upon that judge who will use the position which the money of his countrymen pays him to fill, to wreak revenge and injury upon a man far better than himself. Cursed be the memory of that judge who executes injustice in the name of religion, and who aids the villain to blast the innocent.

23. Honor be to that man, in whatever station in life, who has the integrity and uprightness to do his duty by his fellow-men, and will not swerve from the path of rectitude for any benefit that he may win to himself; but perpetual disgrace to the hypocrite, the traducer, and the liar.

24. All honor to the man of bravery who will not hesitate to embrace the truth, though by doing so he is aware he will lose the approbation of Mrs. Grundy and her set. Honor to the man who dares to be brave, and to be true.

25. A man should not needlessly throw away the bread which his wife and family need to sustain them, but honor to the man who esteems principle more than policy, and who prefers to be true rather than to be popular or rich. Honor forever to the brave and honest man.

CHAPTER VIII.

FURTHER MODIFIED SENTIMENTS OF THE APOSTLES.

1. Now the spirit of truth fill you with all joy and peace in believing that ye may abound in hope through the power of truth and justice. And I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye also are full of goodness, filled with true knowledge, able also to admonish and edify each other.

2. Nevertheless, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort, as putting you in mind, because of the confidence I feel in the truth of which above all things I desire to be a worthy minister. I would do honor to the cause which we are all brethren.

3. Let us walk honestly as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying; but put on the armor of truth, and make not provision for the works of evil, nor to perpetuate the wrongs thereof.

4. Now I beseech you, brethren, for the truth's sake, for the love of the spirit of harmony, that ye strive together with me in your efforts, that we may show unto many men the righteousness of our cause, and the excellency of the truth which we have found.

5. I beseech you, brethren, in the name of the cause which we love, that there be no harmful divisions among you, and that ye be as perfectly joined together as is practicable, in the same mind, and in the same judgment for the spread of the truth.

6. The fruit of the spirit of truth is love, joy, peace, willingness to suffer, if necessary, gentleness, goodness, kindness, generosity, sympathy, charity, meekness, temperance, faithfulness, industry, purity, humility, sincerity, honesty, perseverence, patience, and devotion to the right.

7. The truth does away with all bitterness and wrath, anger and clamor, and evil speaking, and hatred, and malice. So be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving, charitable, and be ye disposed to think kindly of those around you; then shall your lives be rendered far more happy than by the opposite course.

8. The fruit of the spirit which you ought to cherish is in all goodness and righteousness and truth, proving what is acceptable unto all good men. Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them.

9. Children, obey your parents in the truth, for this is right. Honor thy father and mother, which is the first commandment with promise, that it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long and be respected on the earth by thy fellow-men.

10. And ye, fathers, provoke not your children to wrath, but bring them up to lead good lives and to faithfully perform their duty in all the positions and avocations of life. Remember that, as a rule, good parents make good children.

11. Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think on these things.

12. Those things which ye have both learned and received, and heard and seen in others, faithfully pattern after, and make your own rule in life, and the spirit of peace shall remain with you. To do right under all circumstances is the greatest excellence to which you can attain.

13. Brethren, be not weary in well doing. Prove all things and hold fast that which is good. Abstain from every appearance of evil, and the very spirit of truth sanctify you wholly; and I desire that your whole spirit and your bodies be preserved blameless and harmless unto the coming of the reign of reason and righteousness.

14. Refuse profane and old wives' fables, and exercise yourselves rather unto sensibleness; for therefore we all both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living truth, which is the savior of men, especially of those who follow it.

15. Reject also the fables of the priests, for they are more harmful and contain even less of truth than the wildest of those which the old wives can tell. Discard fables of all kinds, unless, like Æsop's, they are designed to illustrate a truthful lesson.

16. These things should be at all times observed. Let no man despise your worth, but be ye examples to those who dwell around you; be discreet in conversation, be active in charity, in purity, and faithfulness, in dispensing happiness, in assuaging sorrow, in every manner of good works.

17. Neglect not to use the talents with which you are endowed; use properly the best faculties you possess, and in your every effort let your object be to perform a little good in the world; be not slothful nor indolent in the performance of your duty.

18. Giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience goodness, and to goodness cheerfulness, and to cheerfulness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness charity.

19. And to charity cleanliness, and to cleanliness prudence, and to prudence circumspection, and to circumspection frugality, and to frugality industry, and to industry integrity, and to integrity a forgiving spirit, and to a forgiving spirit a love of truth;

20. And to a love of truth a hatred of hypocrisy, and to a hatred of hypocrisy a thoughtful mind, and to a thoughtful mind an even temper, and to an even temper a love of justice, and to a love of justice self-control, and to self-control generosity;

21. And to generosity toleration; and to toleration sincerity; and to sincerity earnestness; and to earnestness studiousness; and to studiousness forbearance; and to forbearance all the virtues in the entire catalogue. Resolve that the believers in myths and falsehoods shall not excel you in a good life.

22. Dearly beloved, these things I write unto you that you may not be unmindful of the duty which we owe to ourselves and to our fellow-beings. When we have discharged these duties, we owe no others. To gods and devils we owe nothing, and it should be our settled purpose to let them take care of themselves.

23. Love the world and the people who are in the world, for you are of them and they are worthy of your kindest care and consideration. Regard not devils nor gods, but love your fellow-men with all your heart, with all your soul, all your strength, and try above all things to take care of yourselves, and provide well for your families.

24. Little children, let no man or woman deceive you; above all things, let not the priests deceive you; they beguile many with their wily lies and inventions, destroying much happiness in the world and scaring the old women of both sexes with their frightful tales of devils and hell. Despise them in your very hearts and listen not to their lying yarns.

25. Greet each other often with words of encouragement and hope; strengthen each other in well doing and in withstanding the current of error which is swelling up all around you. Meet together often, bring to mind the duty you have to perform in life, and resolve more and more every passing day that you will oppose error and sustain the truth.

CHAPTER IX.

RE-ECHOES FROM THE TEACHERS OF OLDEN TIME.

1. Preserve thyself from self-sufficiency, and do not covet property belonging to another. The way to eternal beatitude is open to him who without omission speaketh the truth.

2. All works ought to be regarded merely as means of purifying the intelligence, as the means to guide the traveler to his home.

3. The foolish, plunged in ignorance, believing themselves wise, resemble the blind leading the blind; but men who have maturely considered the perishable nature of all advantages that works can procure; hermits who live in the forests on alms; fathers of families endowed with wisdom worshiping Brahma, preaching austerities, subduing the senses, those are dilivered from all sin, and ascend to the highest heaven, where reigns the immortal Brahma, as ancient as the world.

4. Though man finds pleasure in that which he sees, hears, smells, tastes, and touches, he derives no benefit from the pleasure because the soul attaching itself to external objects forgets its high origin—the universal soul.

5. To know that God is and that all is God, this is the substance of the Vedas. When one attains to this there is no need of reading or of works; they are but the bark, the straw, the envelope. No more need of them when one has the seed, the substance, the creator. When one knows him by science he may abandon science as the torch which has conducted him to the end (The Vedas).

6. Let a man not be proud of his rigorous devotion; let him not, having sacrificed, utter a falsehood; let him not, though injured, insult a brother; having made a donation, let him never proclaim it.

7. To a man contaminated by sensuality neither the Vedas, nor liberality, nor sacrifices, nor strict observances, nor pious austerities will procure felicity (Menu).

8. Do good to all, both the evil and the good, even your enemies. Men who hav no self-command are not capable of fulfilling their duties. Pleasure and riches should be renounced when not approved by conscience.

9. The wrongs we inflict upon our neighbors follow us like our shadow. Love of his fellow-creatures should be the ruling principle of the just man in all his works, for those weigh the most in the celestial balance.

10. As the earth supports those who trample it under foot and rend its bosom with the plow, we should return good for evil. Let the right hand of the good man be always open to the poor and the unhappy; and let him never boast of his benefits (Christna).

11. (1) Thou shalt not kill. (2) Thou shalt not steal. (3) Thou shalt not commit adultery. (4) Thou shalt not speak untruth. (5) Thou shalt not take any intoxicating drinks. (6) Thou shalt avoid all anger, hatred, and bitter language. (7) Thou shalt not indulge in idle and vain talk. (8) Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goods. (9) Thou shalt not harbor envy nor revenge nor malice. (10) Thou shalt not follow the doctrines of false gods.

12. Let a man overcome anger with love; let him overcome evil by good; let him overcome the greedy by liberality; the liar by truth. Hatred ceases by love; this is the eternal rule. He who holds back rising anger like a rolling chariot, him I call a real driver; the best do but hold the reins.

13. Forsake all evil; bring forth good; master thy own thoughts; such is Buddha's path to the end of all pain. Overcome evil with good, the avaricious with generosity, the falsehood with truth. One day of endeavor is better than a hundred years of sloth.

14. Watch thyself with all diligence and hold thyself in as the spirited steed is held in by its owner. Master thyself; so mayest thou teach others, and easily tame them, after having tamed thyself; for self is hardest to tame. The taint worse than all others is ignorance.

15. The good, like snowy mountains, shine from afar; the bad, like arrows shot by night, are not seen. The heart of love and faith accompanying good actions spreads to beneficent shade through all the world.

16. The true sage dwells upon earth as the bee that gathers sweetness with his mouth and wings, without harming the color and perfume of the flowers (Buddha).

17. It is the duty of children to obey their parents; of wives to obey their husbands. Treat old age with great reverence and tenderness. Cultivate the soil, drain the marshes, and destroy dangerous creatures.

18. Do not allow thyself to be carried away with anger. Reply to thy enemy with gentleness. Take not that which belongs to another. Contend constantly against evil. Succor the poor and refuse not hospitality. Avoid everything calculated to injure other. Have no companionship with a man who injures his neighbors (Zoroaster).

19. Faithfulness and sincerity are the highest qualities. When you transgress do not fear to return. Learn the past and you will know the future. Not to correct our faults is to commit new ones. Be rigid to yourself and gentle to others, and you will have no enemies.

20. Return bad treatment with equity and remember kindness with kindness. Never do to others what you would not have others do to you. Fix thy thoughts on duty; practice without ceasing the virtue of humanity, and if you have leisure cultivate the arts (Confucius).

21. Know thyself. Let your study be to correct the blemishes of the mind rather than those of the face. Stop the mouth of slander by prudence. Enrich not thyself by unjust means. Be not idle, though rich. Entertain not evil. Idleness is troublesome; intemperance hurtful; ignorance intolerable.

22. Use moderation. Believe not all. Be equally mindful of friends present and absent. Cherish thy parents. What thou bestowest on thy parents thou shalt receive from thy children in thy old age. That which thou blamest in another do not thyself to thy neighbor.

23. Sound health, moderate fortune, and a mind well stored with knowledge—these are the grand ingredients of happiness. True happiness consists in perfect health, a moderate fortune, and a life free from effeminacy and ignorance (Thales).

24. In all things let reason be your guide. In everything you do consider the end. Study excellence and aim at acquiring it. Reverence thy parents. Cherish thy friends. Laws are like cobwebs which entangle the lesser sort; the greater break through.

25. To make laws against and ordain punishment for a crime that hitherto has never been known or heard of is the way to introduce it, rather than prevent it. Those are happy who are completely furnished outward things. Act honestly and live temperately. I feel that I leave the world better than I found it (Solon).

CHAPTER X.

MORE MORAL MAXIMS FROM THE ANCIENTS.

1. It is a proof of a weak mind to desire impossibilities. The greatest infelicity is not to be able to endure misfortune patiently. Great minds alone can support a sudden reverse of fortune. The most pleasant state is to be always gaining.

2. If you are handsome, do handsome things; if deformed, supply the defects of your nature by your virtues. Be slow in undertaking, and resolute in executing. Praise not a worthless man for the sake of his wealth.

3 Lay in wisdom as the store for your journey from youth to old age, for it is the most certain possession. Many men are dishonest; then love your friend with some degree of caution, for he perchance may become your enemy (Bias).

4. Do not that to your neighbor which you would not wish to take from him. Speak ill of no one, not even your enemies. Whatsoever you do, do it well. Never boast of your plans before they are executed, for fear of the ridicule and disappointment to which you will be exposed if you do not accomplish them (Pittacus).

5. Truth is to be sought with a mind purified from the passions of the body. Having overcome evil things, thou shalt experience the union of the immortal God with mortal man. The noblest gifts of heaven to man are to speak truth and do good offices. Those two things resemble the works of God.

6. Strength of mind depends upon sobriety, for this keeps reason unclouded by passion. Youth should be habituated to obedience, for it will then find it easy to obey the authority of reason. Every man ought to act and speak with such integrity that no one would have occasion to doubt his simple affirmation.

7. Do what you think to be right whatever people think of you. Despise alike their censure and their praise. The rational mind of man is more excellent than this sensitive soul as the sun is more excellent than the stars; the discourse of a philosopher is vain if no passion of man is healed thereby (Pythagoras).

8. There is no better way to true glory than to endeavor to be good rather than seem so. Only the wise man can be brave, just, and temperate. Vice of every kind is ignorance. If a man is cowardly it is because he does not rightly appreciate the importance of life and death. He thinks death an evil and flees from it. If he were wise he would know that death is a good thing, or at least an indifferent one, and therefore would not shun it.

9. True felicity is not to be derived from external possessions, but from wisdom, which consists in the knowledge and the practice of virtue; that the cultivation of virtuous manners is necessarily attended with pleasure as well as profit; that the honest man alone is happy, and that it is absurd to separate things which in nature are so closely united as virtue and interest.

10. O beloved Pan, and all ye other gods of the place, grant me to become beautiful in the inner man, and that whatever outward things I may have may be at peace with those within. May I deem the wise man rich, and may I have such portion of gold as none but a prudent man can either bear or employ. Do we need anything else, Phaedrus? For myself, I have prayed enough (Socrates).

11. Honor is divine good. No evil thing is honorable. There is no one so bad but love can make a god of him by virtue, so that his soul becomes like unto the supreme beauty. What light and sight are in this visible world, truth and intelligence are in the real, unchangeable world.

12. The perfectly just man is he who loves justice for its own sake, not for the honors and advantages which attend it; who is willing to pass for unjus while he practices the most exact justice; who will not suffer himself to be moved by disgrace or distress, but will continue steadfast in the love of justice—not because it is pleasant, but because it is right (Plato).

13. Prefer labor to idleness, unless you would prefer rust to brightness. The truly learned are not those who read much, but those who read what is useful. Young people should be taught those things that will be useful to them when they become men.

14. Friendship is reciprocal benevolence which inclines each individual to be as anxious for another's welfare as his own. It is better to be poor than illiterate; for the poor only want money, the illiterate lack the distinguishing characteristics of human nature (Aristippus).

15. Love is the god which gives the greatest safety. A true philosopher, unless prevented, will faithfully serve the state. Most people seek in the tavern for that pleasure which is to be found in labor. Whether the slave has become so by conquest or by purchase, the master's title is bad (Zeno).

16. Justice is the virtue of treating every one according to his deserts. Justice includes the observance of the laws for the preservation of society and the discharge of obligations and debts between equals. Learning is the best provision against old age. There is just as much difference between the wise and the foolish as there is between the living and the dead.

17. Friends are one soul in two bodies. A virtuous life is itself a source of delight. The purest and noblest pleasure is that which a good man derives for virtuous actions. Happiness consists in conduct conformable to virtue (Aristotle).

18. It is criminal not only to do mischief, but to wish it. He who subdues his passions is more heroic than he who vanquishes an enemy. Do nothing shameful though you are alone. It is the office of prudence, where it is possible, to prevent injuries; but where this cannot be done a wise regard to our tranquillity will prevent us from revenging them (Democritus).

19. I would wish you to think nothing good or bad upon my decision. The first and last thing I would say to a man is, Think for yourself. A happy life is like neither a roaring torrent nor a stagnant pool; but a placid, crystal stream that flows gently and smoothly along. Perfect pleasure, which is happiness, you will have attained when you have brought your bodies and souls into a state of satisfied tranquillity. To arrive at this much previous exertion is requisite; yet exertion not violent, only constant and ever. At first the body, with its passions and appetites, demands gratification and indulgence. But beware! for here are the hidden rocks which may shipwreck your bark on its passage, and shut you out forever from the heaven of repose.

20. Nothing can ever spring from nothing, nor can anything ever return to nothing. The universe always existed and will always remain, for there is nothing into which it can be changed. There is nothing in nature, nor can anything be conceived, besides body and space. Body is that which possesses the properties of bulk, figure, resistance and gravity. It is this alone which can touch or be touched. Space is the region where body is or may be occupied by body, and which affords an opportunity of moving freely. Besides these—body and space—no third nature can be conceived; for such a nature must either have bulk or solidity, or want them, that is, it must either be body or space. The universe consisting of body and space, is infinite, for it has no limits. Bodies are infinite in multitude. Space is infinite in magnitude. The universe is to be conceived as immovable, since beyond it there is no place into which it can move; and as eternal and immutable, since it is neither liable to increase nor decrease, to production nor decay (Epicurus).

21. Act toward others as you deserve them to act toward you (Isocrates). We should do good to our enemy and make him our friend (Cerbulus). Do nothing which will occasion grief to yourself or others (Cleanthes). Do not judge thy neighbor until thou hast stood in his place. Promote peace and be a friend to all men. Do not unto another what thou would not have another do unto thee. This is the whole law; the rest is mere comment (Hillel).

22. We are created for the sake of mankind and to be useful to each other. Nature endears man to man. Nothing is more natural to man than kindness. Knowledge seems isolated and barren unless accompanied by love of all men and trust in our common brotherhood. All men are plainly bound together. Duty is always performed when the advantage of mankind is sought. He is a good man who benefits as many people as possible and harms nobody. True philosophers have not neglected the advantage and and interests of mankind. Care for other men and serve the common brotherhood. Nothing is so much in accord with nature as utility. The standard of utility is the same as that of morality. Whatever is useful is virtuous, though it does not at first seem so (Cicero).

23. The grandest of empires is to rule one's self. There is nothing grand that is not also calm. Who has most? He who desires least. Throw away all anxiety about life and make it pleasant. If you hear that others have spoken ill of you, consider whether you have not done the same about many people. How much better to heal an injury than to avenge it. I shall take the world as my country. Guard vigorously that social tie which binds man to man and establishes the rights common to the human race. Life is warfare, and those who climb up and down steep paths and go through dangerous enterprises are the brave men and the leaders in the camp; but to rest basely at the cost of others' labors is to be a coward, safe because despised (Seneca).

24. Dearly beloved truth seekers, I have now, with the quotations I have made from those who have talked better than I can, finished my epistle for this time. Perhaps when I have more time I may write you another. But be that as it may, please remember that I am with you in spirit, and hope ere many months roll away to be with you also in body. I rejoice that there are as many truth seekers in the world as there are, and trust the number may increase from year to year. I long to see the day when truth and reason may rule the world, and when the truths of nature will be valued more than all the myths, fables, and superstitions which interested and designing priests have invented. As intelligence increases in the world the gods and devils and supernaturalism, with all the absurdities that belong to them, must give way. I trust I have fought a good fight, that I have kept the faith, and will till I finish my course; and I hope that henceforth there is laid up for me, if not a crown of righteousness, the love and esteem of the friends who are as dear to me as life. Let us all work together for the dissemination of nature's truths, and the plain dictates of reason and common sense. Farewell.

A Ministerial Thief Arrested through the Instrumentality of The Truth Seeker.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Noticing in your issue of the 4th inst. that one Geo. H. Austin had forged a draft on a bank in Madison, Ind., for $280, I would say that that same holy man was arrested near Dodd City, yesterday, by Geo. W. Smith and Alderson Franklin, handcuffed, and put in the Fannin county jail. It appears that Mr. Smith went out to hear him preach. On the day before he had read in The Truth Seeker an account of one Rev. Geo. H. Austin having forged the names of some persons in Indiana, drawn some money on the note, and absconded. Messrs. Smith and Franklin came to town and telegraphed to the cashier of the Madison bank, and found that the man was wanted. They then went back and arrested Austin and lodged him in jail. Austin acknowledged that he was the Rev. Geo. Austin, and also confessed his guilt. He is now awaiting the arrival of the sheriff, who is looked for on every train, to accompany his reverence to Indiana. This reverend gentleman came here about a fortnight since, and had not remained long before he entered upon his holy mission of saving souls. His gigantic intellect ushered forth profound theological ideas, sweeping doubt before him as a Texas cyclone might get away with an ant. If Talmage could hav been present once to partake of the feast of reason and outpouring of brain-essence, Ingersoll would be no more in his path than a gnat on a bull's horn. As far as eloquence and oratory go, Parson Austin makes pigmies of those Ciceros, Webster, Clay, and even Dick Hubbard and Col. Bob Taylor, of Texas. Last Sunday he ranted against "Bob" Ingersoll, and champed like a Mexican cougar. But his shouts had hardly ceased echoing down Bois d'Darce bottom when a warrant of arrest was served on his person.

Now, Mr. Editor, had it not been for the circulation of your valuable paper in this section, this lamb of God that taketh away the sins Texas would probably never hav met with justice. You are entitled to the credit of his arrest through its instrumentality.

Dodd City, Texas, March 15th. F. B.

D. P. Willcox is running a hotel at Deadwood, Dakotah, on the Freethought basis, and requests that Liberal papers send him copies for his reading room. It will help them and be of great advantage to him. Any Liberal going to Deadwood will always find his latchstring on the outside. Mr. Willcox believes in going right down to bedrock and giving the people correct religious ideas and honest meals at a fair price.

The thirteenth free lecture of the winter course of the Society of Humanity will be delivered by Courtlandt Palmer, Esq., on Sunday evening, April 2d, in Science Hall. Subject: "The Evolution of Religion, as Shown by Extracts from the Ancient and Modern Poets."

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 1, 1882.

Round the World.

By the time this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches its readers we hope to be mailing the first volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" to the subscribers to the fund. We are glad to announce that the first edition has nearly all been subscribed for, and that we shall hav to issue a second shortly. Since the list of names was stereotyped we hav received many new ones. They all wished to be enrolled, but it was too late for the first edition, and to accommodate them and many others we hav concluded to put them in the second edition of the first volume, and also open a list of subscribers to appear in the second volume. This will giv all an opportunity who may wish it, and also aid in paying expenses. The volumes will be sold separately for $2 per volume, and the three for $5 if taken before the volumes are completed. We would very much like a larger list to greet the traveler with on his return home. The books will be very cheap at $5—much cheaper than any other publisher would get them out.

In this issue the "Chronicles" are completed, and next week, Mr. Bennett commences, in natural style, a description of what he saw in Egypt.

The following is the list of subscribers who hav sent in the $5, and the amount will be acknowledged in the dedication of the second volume. We shall see the list grow with great pleasure:

Ought Liberals to Hav a Chronology of Their Own?

It is one of the inevitable results of the relativity of knowledge that things need constant revision; for that which may be true and useful in one age or generation may be, and quite frequently is, quite the reverse in a succeeding one.

Our institutions, laws, and customs are based on certain relations or facts, which are, or are believed to be, true at the time of their inception, but which, by some new generalization, invention, or discovery, may be rendered untrue, or so disrelated as to render all deductions based on them either false or wholly without significance or relevancy.

A striking example of this may be seen in the Christian system of chronology, the invention of the monks in the fifth century, which is based on what, in that age, was believed to be the grandest event that ever did or ever could happen, namely, the advent on this earth of the son of God, the savior of the world!

But in the process of time, through the agencies of science and modern criticism, the mental condition of the race has been so changed, and knowledge so advanced, that what was an undoubted truth a few centuries ago is now believed only by a few, and in some degree doubted by all.

Still, though the event has lost its significance even when admitted to be possible, in continues in vogue from the impetus that ages of use hav lent to it.

From a communication in another column it will be seen that the question of its disuse by the substitution of another method is beginning to be agitated.

Is it necessary that this Christian method of computing time should be continued?

If not, what good results would follow to the Liberal cause by substituting the one proposed by Mr. Wakeman above referred to?

The question whether the old system can be dispensed with hardly requires an answer; for every system of chronology is purely arbitrary, and where, as in this proposed system, it admits of translation into the old by the simple addition of 1,600 to the hundreth figure, all objection to the new method is anticipated.

Of the many reasons which might be urged for the change we will mention but one:

It would emphasize a grand and universal astronomical truth, the importance of which on human destiny can hardly be estimated, while at the same time it would commemorate the death of a martyr to science (Giordano Bruno), an event of far more significance to this world than the death of the so-called son of God!

The antithesis which this would suggest to the minds of men would awaken thought, and thereby weaken superstition.

Col. Ingersoll's Lecture.

Steinway Hall was crowded last Sunday night to hear the noted orator. The lecture was substantially the same as that printed under the title, "What Must We Do to be Saved?" but varied in minor points. He said:

There are a great many people who imagin that they can destroy orthodox Christianity without anybody finding it out; that they can dig nights under the corner of the church, and cover the place over toward morning, and attend meeting every Sunday, and just hug themselvs with delight, thinking that after a while the edifice is going to fall. But every orthodox Christian knows his enemy, no matter how kindly he writes, no matter how scientific he is. There is not one who does not know that every advocate of intellectual liberty is his enemy; he knows that every man who claims the right to judge and guess for himself is not on his side.

Fear is the dungeon of the mind, and superstition is a dagger with which hypocrisy assassinates the soul. Courage is liberty. I am in favor of absolute freedom of thought. In the realm of mind every one is monarch; every one is robed, sceptered, and crowned, and every one wears the purple of authority. I belong to the republic of intellectual liberty, and only those are good citizens of that republic who depend upon reason and upon persuasion, and only those are traitors who resort to brute force. Now I beg of you all to forget just for a few moments that you are Methodists or Baptists or Catholics or Presbyterians, and let us for an hour or two remember only that we are men and women. Let us, if possible, banish all fear from the mind. Do not imagin that there is some being in the infinit expanse who is not willing that every man and woman should think for himself and herself. Do not imagin that there is any being who would giv to his children the holy torch of reason, and then damn them for following that sacred light. Let us hav courage. Priests hav invented a crime called "blasphemy," and behind that crime hypocrisy has crouched for thousands of years. There is but one blasphemy, and that is injustice. There is but one worship, and that is justice. There was a Jewish gentleman went into a restaurant to get his dinner, and the devil of temptation whispered in his ear, "Eat some bacon." He knew if there was anything in the universe calculated to excite the wrath of an infinit being, who made every shining star, it was to see a gentleman eating bacon. He knew it, and he knew the infinit being was looking—that he was the eternal eavesdropper of the universe. But his appetite got the better of his conscience, as it often has with us all, and he ate that bacon. He knew it was wrong, and his conscience felt the blush of shame in its cheek. When he went into that restaurant the weather was delightful, the sky was as blue as June, and when he came out the sky was covered with angry clouds, the lightning leaping from one to the other, and the earth shaking beneath the voice of thunder. He went back into that restaurant with a face as white as milk, and he said to one of the keepers, "My God, did you ever hear such a fuss about a little piece of bacon?"

As long as we harbor such opinions of infinity; as long as we imagin the heavens to be filled with such tyranny, just so long the sons of men will be cringing, intellectual cowards. Let us think, and let us honestly express our thought.

The next question is, Can I commit a sin against God by thinking? If God did not intend I should think, why did he giv me a thinker? For one, I am convinced, not only that I hav the right to think, but that it is my duty to express my honest thoughts. Whatever the gods may say, we must be true to ourselvs.

We hav, I say, a Christian system, and that system is founded upon what they are pleased to call the "New Testament." Who wrote the New Testament? I do not know. Who does know? Nobody. We hav found many manuscripts containing portions of the New Testament. Some of these manuscripts leave out five or six books—many of them. Others more; others less. No two of these manuscripts agree. Nobody knows who wrote these manuscripts. They are all written in Greek. The disciples of Christ, so far as we know, knew only Hebrew. Nobody ever saw, so far as we know, one of the original Hebrew manuscripts. Nobody ever saw anybody who had seen anybody who had heard of anybody that had ever seen anybody that had ever seen one of the original Hebrew manuscripts. No doubt the clergy of your city hav told you these facts thousands of times, and they will be obliged to me for having repeated them once more. These manuscripts are written in what are called capital Greek letters. They are called Uncial manuscripts, and the New Testament was not divided into chapters and verses, even, until the year of grace 1551. In the original the manuscripts and gospels are signed by nobody. The epistles are addressed to nobody; and they are signed by the same person. All the addresses, all the pretended ear-marks showing to whom they were written, and by whom they were written, are simply interpolations, and everybody who has studied the subject knows it.

You must remember, also, one other thing. Christ never wrote a solitary word of the New Testament—not one word. There is an account that he once stooped and wrote something in the sand, but that has not been preserved. He never told anybody to write. He never said: "Matthew, remember this. Mark, do not forget to put that down. Luke, be sure that in your gospel you hav this. John, do not forget it." Not one word. And it has always seemed to me that a being coming from another world, with a message of infinit importance to mankind, should at least hav verified that message by his own signature. Is it not wonderful that not one word was written by Christ? Is it not strange that he gave no orders to hav his words preserved—words upon which hung the salvation of a world?

And let me say here, once for all, that for the man Christ I hav infinit respect. Let me say, once for all, that the place where man has died for man is holy ground. And let me say, once for all, that to that great and serene man I gladly pay the tribute of my admiration and my love. He was a reformer in his day. He was an Infidel in his time. He was regarded as a blasphemer, and his life was destroyed by hypocrits, who hav in all ages done what they could to trample freedom and manhood out of the human mind. Had I lived at that time I would hav been his friend, and should he come again he will not find a better friend than I will be. That is for the man. For the theological creation I hav a different feeling. If he was in fact God, he knew there was no such thing as death. He knew that what we called death was but the eternal opening of the golden gates of everlasting joy; and it took no heroism to face a death that was eternal life. If he was God, he could hav made the cross a bed of roses.

A while ago I made up my mind to find out what was necessary for me to do in order to be saved. If I hav got a soul I want it saved. I do not wish to lose anything that is of value. For thousands of years the world has been asking that question, "What must we do to be saved?" Saved from poverty? No. Saved from crime? No. Tyranny? No. But "What must we do to be saved from the wrath of God, the vengeance of infinit mercy?" If God made us he will not destroy us. Infinit wisdom ever made a poor investment. Upon all the works of an infinit God a dividend must finally be declared. Why should God make failures? Why should he waste material? Why should he not correct his mistakes instead of damning them? The pulpit has cast a shadow over even the cradle. The doctrin of endless punishment has covered the cheeks of this world with tears. I despise it, and I defy it.

Now let me make myself plain upon one subject, perfectly plain. For instance, I hate Presbyterianism, but I know hundreds of splendid Presbyterians. Understand me. I hate Methodism, and yet I know hundreds of splendid Methodists. I hate Catholicism, and like Catholics. I hate insanity, but not the insane. I do not war against men. I do not war against persons. I war against certain doctrins that I believe to be wrong. But I giv to every other human being every right that I claim for myself.

In the sixteenth chapter of Matthew it says: "And Jesus called a little child to him and stood him in the midst, and said, Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." I do not wonder that in his day, surrounded by scribes and Pharisees, he turned lovingly to little children. And yet, see what children the little children of God hav been. What an interesting dimpled darling John Calvin was! Think of that prattling babe, Jonathan Edwards! Think of the infants that founded the inquisition, that invented instruments of torture to tear human flesh. They were the ones who had become as little children. They were the children of faith.

The church has always been willing to swap off treasures in heaven for cash down. And when the next verse was written the church must hav been nearly bankrupt. "And again I say unto you, it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." Did you ever know a wealthy Christian in New York to unload on account of that verse?

Mark says: "In my name shall they cast out devils. They shall speak with new tongues, and they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them. They shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover."

Bring on your believer! Let him cast out a devil. I do not ask for a large one. Just a "little one for a cent." Let him take up serpents. "And if he drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt him." Let me mix up a dose for the believer, and if it does not hurt him I will join a church. "Oh! but," they say, "those things only lasted through the apostolic age." Let us see. "Go into all the world and preach the gospel, and whosever believes and is baptized shall be saved, and these signs shall follow them that believe."

How long? I think at least until they had gone into all the world. Certainly those signs should follow until all the world had been visited. And yet if that declaration was in the mouth of Christ, he then knew that one-half of the world was unknown, and that he would be dead fourteen hundred and fifty-nine years before his disciples would know that there was another continent. And yet he said, "Go into all the world and preach the gospel," and he then knew that it would be fourteen hundred and fifty-nine years before anybody could go. Well, if it was worth while to hav signs follow believers in the Old World, surely it was worth while to hav signs follow believers in the New. And the very reason that signs should follow would be to convince the unbeliever, and there are as many unbelievers now as ever, and the signs are as necessary to-day as they ever were. I would like a few myself.

This frightful declaration, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned," has filled the world with agony and crime. Every letter of this passage has been sword and fagot; every word has been dungeon and chain. That passage made the sword of persecution drip with innocent blood through centuries of agony and crime. That passage made the horizon of a thousand years lurid with the fagot's flames. That passage contradicts the Sermon on the Mount; travesties the Lord's Prayer; turns Shall We Hav a New Calendar?

The following correspondence, which has just passed between T. B. Wakeman, president of the National Liberal League, and Geo. N. Hill, secretary of the Investigator Society, must awaken the interest of all who read:

MR. HILL.

BOSTON, MASS., Feb. 7. in the 282d year of the new Era (A. D. 1882).

T. B. WAKEMAN, ESQ.: In the part of your lecture on the "Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels" published in THE TRUTH SEEKER last October you suggested that the Liberals of the whole world might well unite upon some one event as a basis and beginning for a new calendar. In this way it was proposed to replace the confused and superstitious calendars now in use by various peoples and sects on the earth by a new one that would represent the modern life of mankind, and be more convenient than the old sectarian year of our Lord.

You proposed that the new year should be called the Era of Science and of Man, and that it should begin with January 1st as the day, and the old year of 1600 as the year most proper for the new year one—making our present year 282.

This suggestion made a deep impression on my mind. I hav, for years, maintained that modern people, and especially Liberals, should no longer be using the distinctiv calendar of Christianity, which is nothing but a continuation of their myth. Why adhere to that any more than to any other doctrin or distinctiv feature of that huge and bloody superstition? I determined, therefore, to second your suggestion, and hereafter date my correspondence in the new era in which we are living, and which began January 1, 282 years ago, or, as the Christians would say, with the year of their Lord 1600.

In order to bring this matter before my fellow-Liberals, I hav offered the following resolution before the Investigator Society and Liberal League, of Boston, of which I am a member:

Resolved, That in future all records of official documents by the Investigator Freethinkers' Society, of Boston, Mass., shall bear date from the beginning of the year of the publication of the new (Copernican) Astronomy [A. D. 1600], and of the burning at the stake, by the Christians at Rome, of that noble martyr for science and man, Giordano Bruno (which occurred February 16th of that year); and that this era, of which the present year is the two hundred and eighty-second, shall be used and proclaimed as the age or year of reason, of science, and of man—the age in which we are living; and that this new mode of reckoning be recommended for general adoption.

This resolution was very favorably received, but owing to the importance of the subject it was laid over for further consideration. When the matter comes up again I should be very glad to hav some further statement from you, showing more fully than the short reference in your lecture permitted the grounds upon which the date is selected. I am fully impressed with the idea that a change should be made, and that the martyrdom of Bruno was a part of the struggle then and now going on between science and superstition. All this is made clear to us by Prof. Draper's splendid book on the "Conflict between Science and Religion," and his touching reference to Bruno.

But how much that year and that event may mean as a turning-point in history I would like to hav shown in a concise way. If you will kindly favor me in this matter, I shall be still further your obliged friend, GEORGE N. HILL.

MR. WAKEMAN.

93 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK, February 22, Era of Man 282, Era of Christ 1882.

MY DEAR FRIEND HILL: Your resolution to make the change to the new era of science practical struck me with surprise. It is another instance of seed sowed at random coming up when and where least expected. But I see no reason why the change should not be begun at least. It can certainly never be accomplished unless there is a beginning. You may yet receive the congratulations of the world as the first man who wrote the 282 of the new era—the Era of Man.

It is quite evident that some change of the calendar will be made within the next 120 years. Intelligent, emancipated mankind will not go on dragging the dead body of "our Lord" through 2000, 3000, 4000, etc. It would be too repulsiv and inconvenient. Before 1900 is out there will be a new calendar upon which not only Christian sects, but the whole of mankind, can unite. Many are the suggestions already made to that end.

The first question is, What will that new calendar represent? what will it stand for?

The answer to this question shows a gratifying unity. There is a very general agreement that the new calendar should, in a word, represent the new, the modern, the scientific, the human era, as you call it, the age of reason. That is, to use Virgil's phrase, the true novus ordo rerum (the new order of things), to modern men, far more than the favored birth of a god in Palestine, or of a Roman aristocrat like Virgil's Pollio. (See his Eclogue 4, and Pope's translation.)

The next question is, With what day and year should the new order begin?

As to the day, there is and can be no dispute, for astronomy, convenience, and the general usage of the past fix that it must be at the winter solstice, or within a week of it, say January 1st. The necessity of thus beginning the astronomical year forced the mythical Christ to be born on Christmas very absurdly, but science gladly recognizes the great day which all ages and peoples had marked and honored as the beginning of the year and as the great festival of human nature, long before Christ was ever thought of.

The next question is to fix the first year of the new era.

As to this, there is less unanimity In the lecture you refer to I hav stated several suggestions which hav been made by Comte and others, and hav alluded to the reasons by which they hav been sustained.

One objection seems to apply to all of the proposals yet made; that is, that they refer only to the events of some one nation, people, or race, while that which is needed is something which shall be common to the whole human race. For instance, a calendar based on the American Revolution of 1776 has been proposed, but it has never been seriously worked out.

Comte, however, has actually worked out his calendar based upon the year 1789, as the year one, because it was the beginning of the French Revolution. He has started from that date, making thirteen months of twenty-eight days and four weeks each to the year, with two supplementary days at the end. He has selected the names of the greatest servants of humanity, in his estimation, to replace the present names of the months. Thus we hav 1789 as the first year and the months are;

1. Moses (January),
2. Homer (February),
3. Aristotle (March),
4. Archimedes (April),
5. Cæsar (May),
6. St. Paul (June),
7. Charlemagne (July),
8. Dante (August),
9. Guttenberg (September),
10. Shakspere (October),
11. Descartes (November),
12. Frederick (December),
13. Bichat (over),

and two days over.

The days of the week are all renamed from less distinguished servants of humanity, so that the whole calendar is a great pantheon of human history up to Comte's day.

This calendar of Comte's has attracted great attention, but chiefly as a lesson of great value in the synthetic, social, and comparativ study of history. For that purpose it can hardly be too highly estimated. But that it will ever be adopted is improbable. It breaks with the past too abrubtly with its unhandy thirteen months and supplementary days. It begins with the date of a revolution peculiar to the French people only, and which was soon overcome by a reaction. From 1793 to 1804 the French Revolutionists used their "republican" calendar based upon their Revolution, in many respects superior to Comte's; but the present republicans of France show no desire to revive it, nor to adopt that of Comte, and the rest of the world are not likelv to follow their example if they should make the attempt.

These French efforts hav failed, though far more likely than any other to succeed, because they had too narrow a base, and were unhandy in their use. Let us see how the new suggestion obviates these difficulties.

1. Its base is the broadest possible. The change from the old to the new astronomy was an objectiv, scientific event, common to our whole planet, and to every generation of human beings afterward born upon it. It gave them a new cosmogony, always the base of a new religion. It gave to them liferally a new heaven and a new earth, as distinguished from the old. It involved consequences which are as yet but partially realized. All this is set forth in the lecture referred to, and which you and all interested may there read, so that repetition is unnecessary.

2. The next great event common to the human species, and which was fraught with consequences of incalculable importance, was the discovery of humanity; that is, that collectiv man is a grand organism, endowed with solidarity and continuity. This was the great historical human social event of the modern world, and it was largely dependent upon the reversal of the Christian cosmology by astronomy. My second lecture, now being published, upon "The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels" will develop this idea, so that it need not be done here. The new era will concern man and be the human era, as the last was concerned about Christ and was thence called the Christian era.

3. The burning of Bruno, to which you hav referred, and which has been so grandly described by Prof. Draper, is an event that enables this one man to represent, as no other individual could, the consequences of the two great contemporary events above named. He was beyond question the great scientific and human proto-martyr. His fate was the culmination of centuries of Christian persecution and slaughter, which makes that faith the creed of blood, and which will cause future generations to shudder when they turn the records of its slaughtered millions.

These three great events—first, scientific; second, human; and third, individual—are clearly and decisivly the ones upon which the new era rests in fact, and they are the ones which should be recognized by it.

Does the year 1600 represent them? It certainly does more nearly than any other year that could be fixed upon. It was the very year of Bruno's martyrdom on account of his adherence to the new astronomy. It was his death that especially published that new system to the world and consecrated it through all time. It had been discovered, or we may rather say surmised, by Copernicus as early as 1507, but, to secure his peace, he had suppressed it and his book announcing it from the public until his death, in 1543. Even then the book and its contents were suppressed, and it was not really known until the efforts and death of Bruno, followed by the adherence of Galileo also, at or about 1600, brought the matter before the world. The new cosmogony became a fact and its date was fixed by the burning of Bruno in that year. He thus bore the brunt of the discovery. The telescope, then too first discovered, was turned to the sky by Galileo, and every doubt was dissipated. Science had given to man a new heaven and a new earth. (See Draper's Conflict, page 169, etc.) We say had given to man, for the year 1600 also fairly represents the discovery of man as a collectiv, terrestrial organism, gifted with solidarity and continuity, as above stated.

1. This was made manifest by the settlement of the Western hemisphere, and also by the annexation of East India and China to the family of nations, by the English, Dutch, French, and Portuguese traders, explorers, and colonists. These world-wide efforts may be well represented by the formation of the English East India Company in 1602. The circumnavigation of the earth, shortly preceding, had led to these results and confirmed the new astronomy,

The discovery, through the English occupation of India, of the Sanskrit language was another event of greatest importance. It opened up the filiation of all of the peoples of the Aryan race from the Himalayas to Iceland. It avowed that the peoples of the world were but a grand family, and laid the basis of a true ethnology.

2. The extension of commerce over the whole world at the same period compelled the recognition of this brotherhood of nations and peoples under the idea of a common human nature and a common interest.

Commerce, with its community and interchange of interests, carried law and political economy around the earth.

3. These wonderful events led to the working out of international law, which was especially done in 1600 by the learned Hollander, Hugo Grotius. His labors, then begun, led to the publication of his great work on the "Rights of War and Peace" in 1625. Since 1600 the human race has been more and more regarded as a whole brotherhood of peoples and nations, confederated together by common rights, duties, and responsibilities. The more these obligations are recognized by nations, peoples, and individuals, the higher they rise in the scale of being.

4. The same year, 1600, marks the establishment of the independence of the English-speaking people under Elizabeth as against popery, the Spanish Armada, and the rule of the Vatican. That event, with their improvements of the compass then made, made the English explorers and colonists the future inheritors of the earth, which seems destined in time to become an English planet, under an English-speaking confederation.

5. The reason is that the soul of man was emancipated in England in 1600, by the effects and works of Hobbes, Bacon, Hunter, Harvey, and others in science and thought, and more than all by Shakspere and Milton in art. Thus the human soul rose up inspired by the genius of universal emancipation, and Superstition has never since been able to encircle it again with her chains, and she never will.

If these great events do not fix the new era, what possibly can? Other dates of importance confirming this result can be supplied from auy book of dates or history, and that work I will leave you to supply at leisure.

The last point to be noticed is that this proposed change differs from all others in being the most convenient, in fact, the handiest possible. It merely drops the superfluous 1600 from 1882, which may be at any time added by an instant of thought, so that the new era may be compared with or restored to the old, as occasion may require. Again, it does not inconveniently change the twelve months or moons of the year. These were well arranged by Cæsar and now are so reformed by astronomers that they will run more accurately than any other division of the year proposed for at least 100,000 years. A change in this respect would be more fanciful than useful. (See article on the calendar in the new Enclopedia Britannica).

If it seems desirable to lay aside the names of the months for better ones it can be done hereafter when the new era is established. In the mean time let us begin with the era. The number of the month can, in the mean time, be used by those who prefer simplicity. Thus, this Washington's birthday would be simply, 2, 22, 282.

As a means of propaganda of Liberalism this new era, if generally used by Liberals, would be very effectiv. It would at once excite thought which would lead many a miud to discover the era of science and of man as the result of the age of reason.

That this letter may tend to that result is the wish of your friend, T. B. WAKEMAN.

Pious Cant.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Recently I was witness to an unpleasant scene. An honest but impulsiv old friend of mine, from representations made him, had concluded to do an act of benevolence in relieving the necessities of a pious and deserving widow. He hated ostentation and publicity, but this generous intention of his, to his mortification, had somehow leaked out. One day, sitting in his office, quietly conning over with him the contents of the daily newspapers, he had a call from the widow, in company with her minister or spiritual adviser. After the usual civilities were passed, business like, he drew down his check-book, and commenced to fill out one to the intended amount, when the man of God broke out audibly, but in a subdued tone, to the old lady: "Sister P———s, here we behold the love of the blessed Jesus; hence to Christ belongs all the glory! Here we see the manifest efficacy of prayer! Who dare, after this, deny faith in the Lord Jesus? To Christ, dear sister, belongs all the glory!" My old friend suddenly dropped his pen, wheeled around in his chair, and mutely gazed upon the ecstatic features of the holy man, and then, placing his hands on his knees, looking steadfastly in the face of the man of God, remarked:

"Look here, dominie, who is doing this little benevolent act, myself or Jesus Christ? I want it understood I am seeking no fame or glory in this trifling transaction, but if there is any merit in doing a simple act of kindness or duty, that merit belongs to me! Do you understand? I am not willing to act as a canting, fanatical cat's-paw to any Jesus Christ or the devil. Until your necessities teach you good breeding, common sense, and simple honesty, so far as I am concerned, you will hav to rely on your shadowy friend!"

Here he impulsivly slammed to the lids of his check-book and withdrew. Left alone with the minister and the saddened widow, I was really in a very unpleasant atmosphere. Here was a well-intentioned kind action completely frustrated by the ill-mannered and canting meddling of a fashionable religious fanatic. The dominie and the widow gazed at each other in mute silence for a few minutes, and, after asking me if Mr. S. might be expected back soon, to which I gave reply that it was a matter of much uncertainty, they mournfully withdrew.

Now my friend is known to be a warm-hearted Materialist, or, what is worse, a Spiritualist; but this fact seems only to sharpen his inclination to indulge his feelings in doing acts of kindness to the needy, regardless of faith or creed. He is, however, a close observer, and hence keenly alive to the fashionable pious trick of meanly accepting donations from Sunday-school children and sewing-girls, and accrediting the gifts to the glory of something they call Christ. Unfortunately for the widow, in this case the man of God was too precipitate in his imputation. I am pleased to add, however, that the widow did get relief from my impulsiv friend, but she had to listen to a calm lecture on what he conceived to be the true meaning and application of the fulsome word glory, and by all means avoid tickling with flattery her Jesus or Christ—if she believed in one—in a way that would be insulting and disgusting if offered to a human being. From Brick Pomeroy's Great West.

D. M. Bennett, editor of that stanch, strong-minded newspaper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, published at 141 Eighth street, New York city, is on his way home from Jerusalem, and will be in California, en route for New York, in April. He is welcome, thrice welcome home. After a little rest he should take the lecture field and relate something of what he has seen.

The Inevitable Conflict.

Mr. Miln recently offered his resignation as pastor to the Unity church, Chicago. He felt that he was so far advanced that he could not serve even a Unitarian church. But his congregation thought differently, and asked him to remain; they were willing to hear his best thought; but lo and behold! when he gave forth his best thought, they instantly changed front, and requested him to renew his resignation.

Now, we must not blame these poor "sheep." They probably had no idea of what is going on in the world, and supposed that Mr. Miln, radical as he might be, would still preach God and immortality; and no doubt they were thoroughly astonished when he plainly declared that he had no faith in these dogmas. They got more than they bargained for. They could stand anything inside of God and immortality; but to pass outside of this time-worn "taffy" was more than they could endure. Their childhood asserted itself. Being children in these matters, they hav acted like children. They are not like men, ready to front the universe exactly as it is, and find genuin hope and joy in its beautiful reality. They still cling to images.

Mr. Miln shows the depth and sweep of the Freethought of to-day and just where it will surely land in the long run. He is a man of culture, of logic, of delicate feeling, of noble conscience; and with the strength and fervor of his manly and bold intellect he has come just where every one must come who accepts the scientific method. The only escape is by the door of transcendentalism, but that door opens only into an infinit vacuity.

Of course there is something that is called God in the minds of a few thinkers like Chadwick and Savage; but it is scarcely a remnant of the old "God." It is merely a vague brightness which shines out of the heart and in the triumphant pathway of science. That idea, so far as science is concerned, is forever vanished. Science does not deal with it; it cannot admit it. It might as well admit that two and two make five!

Science must always hav two terms and a relation between them in order to hav a starting-point; but an "infinit God" allows but one term, and thrusts out all relations whatsoever. It is an intellectual absurdity. Science can only reason about the finite; the infinit is simply the incomprehensible unknown, in which science reasons, but concerning which it can hav no thought, or picture, or relation, or affirmation Therefore the infinit must evermore remain simply the infinit. It cannot by any possibility be translated into a person, or God, or will, or intelligence. If science deals with these terms, it must accept them solely as finite, capable of being defined and represented.

An "infinit God" is what? It is infinit goodness, infinit wisdom, and infinit power. Science proclaims, if it proclaims anything, if it has any verity whatever, that such a God is an utter impossibility; for it says, with the emphasis even of thunder, that there is such a thing as evil in the world, something to be crushed and got out of the way, and annihilated if possible. Now if there is evil, there cannot be an infinit perfection—only a finite perfection, and therefore a finite God.

Every man of sense and honesty will eventually come to this conclusion. This is the conclusion of all high-minded men and women. It is only a weak sentimentalism that believes in a God to-day. "God" must go the way of Santa Claus. He has only been a doll for children, very beautiful, and garnished out with all sorts of brilliant colors; but an image, a doll merely, that can giv no comfort to the mature intellect. Hereafter we must make the best we can of things good and bad, but science will not permit us to fall back upon a "God" to help us out of any difficulty or "wipe all tears away." We must battle with nature, and conquer it, and so reach consolation and peace.

It is the same with the kindred doctrin of immortality. As Mr. Miln says, it is a beautiful dream. There is no ground for it in science. The only possible basis for it lies in the obscure facts of Spiritualism; but these facts are so indeterminate, coming and going, refusing to be put into the crucible of scientific examination, that they can afford no solid reason for a belief in immortality. In the universal experience of the race there has not been any manifestation of mind outside of an organized body. That mind is anterior to matter is a pure assumption. There is not a particle of proof; all the evidence that we can accumulate is the other way; but we will not say that matter produces mind, only that it always, to our experience, accompanies mind, and therefore always will. But when the mind leaves the body there is not a particle of proof that it takes lodgment in another body; and therefore, so far as science is concerned, it vanishes from the domain of knowledge. I do not think that any well-disciplined mind cares to believe in immortality. One can find enough in the boundless, heaving, ever-opening and expanding, and fruitful life round about his daily pathway to satisfy all his hope and aspiration. To me the "land of immortality" is a very shadowy land compared to the magnifient wonders of this world in which I now liv and breathe, that touch every fiber of my body with infinit joy. I fully expect, when my body dies, to surrender my self-consciousness; and the anticipation of such a fate does not giv me a particle of melancholy.

Mr. Miln will be justified by the advancing thought of the day, which, as it grows strong and partakes of the scientific spirit, will lay aside as altogether useless the dogmas of God and immortality. They are parts of the old ideas. They can not remain in the new order.

Just here, on these very questions, the conflict will come; we cannot help it. Some would like to preserve these beautiful imageries, and would like to keep a little corner for them in the mind where science will not intrude and disturb their "dim religious light." But science will claim the whole field of human knowledge; it must claim this, or it can claim nothing. There will be no half-way work. Science will be imperativ. This is necessary to human progress.

Now, many so-called Liberals will arrange themselvs on the side of the dogmas of God and immortality, as against the inevitable outcome of science. But sooner or later a decision must be made. One must wave these dogmas, or marshal himself against science, and become essentially the defender of orthodoxy.

Such is the position of the Unitarian church to-day. It is not a free church. Its platform is no longer as broad as science. It does not commit itself to the universe. It clings to the narrow plank of orthodoxy. We need not wonder at this. Unitarianism is the "esthetic" child of Orthodoxy. It takes delight in the lily and the sunflower. It puts emphasis upon beauty. It is fond of decoration. It has ventured into Freethought just far enough to satisfy its religious sentimentalism. It will go no farther. It trembles as the boundless ocean of truth rolls before it. It dares not leave the shore, and can only gather pebbles. It has no moral strength, no intellectual daring, no manly purpose. It is a congregation of sentimentalists—the lily-bloom of mere feeling, the sunflower of a complacent optimism. We cannot depend upon it for any more good work, whatever it may hav done in the past. Its greatest glory has passed away with Dr. Bellows. He was indeed a hero. Every true man must honor him. Through him Unitarianism made itself felt. He is the genius of its past splendor. In his day he was noble and fearless; but he who follows in his footsteps must go farther still, and strip himself of beliefs that were dear even to this noble leader. We cannot hold them, as he held them, with sublime sincerity and power of conviction; we can only hold them in pueril feeling, and so held they are worthless.

Mr. Miln sees the conflict, and, like a bold, clear thinker, he has placed himself upon the right side, while the church of Unity, like a huddle of children, has placed itself upon the wrong side. It prefers the "confectionery" of orthodoxy to the bread and meat of science. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Simple Creed.

From the N. Y. Times.

On Sunday morning last, Mr. Beecher, in the course of his sermon, made a new confesssion of his faith. As might hav been expected by any one who has watched Mr. Beecher's progress toward Liberalism during the last ten years, his confession of faith is chiefly a confession of want of faith. It is not so much a statement of what he believes as of what he disbelieves. It is a protest, rather than a creed.

Long ago Mr. Beecher rejected the dogma of future punishment, and hence he did not think it necessary last Sunday to reiterate his horror of the blasphemous theory that the Almighty may differ from the pastor of Plymouth pulpit as to the proper principles of divine government. There were, however, other doctrins commonly thought to be a part of Christianity which he had not previously rejected—that is to say in public—and these he abjured with much care and nicety of expression. He expressed his entire disbelief in the story of Adam's fall, or in the dogma that Adam's conduct in any way affected his descendants, and maintained that the scriptural account of the fall is purely allegorical. He generously admitted that the gospels are in the main truthful, but claimed that, like Xenophon's "Memorabilia," they were written in the infancy of history, and that the writers were so utterly regardless of the element of time in making their records that it "was impossible to frame out of the four gospels anything like harmony." Of the atonement there are, according to Mr. Beecher, seventeen or eighteen different theories, all of which he rejected, and in their stead held that "the evolution of the divine nature in Christ Jesus—the making known of the father heart and mother heart in God—constituted that power which, acting upon the imagination and the heart of man, should bring him to the love of God." As to the church, Mr. Beecher proclaimed that "churches and church ordinances do not matter if one has the right spirit," and that "every age has improved on the theologic idea of the age before;" or, in other words, that Mr. Beecher's views of what constitutes true Christianity are much clearer and better than those of the apostles and the church which they instructed. By this process of elimination of doctrin after doctrin Mr. Beecher's final creed is reached. He believes that Christ was a historical person of whom the writers of the gospels hav given a reasonably trustworthy account, and that it is a wise and proper thing for man to imitate his nobility of thought and conduct. This is certainly a very simple creed—so simple, indeed, that even Mr. Bob Ingersoll could find no difficulty in accepting it.

It has often been said that, while Mr. Beecher is a brilliant orator, he is not a logician. But, so far as his theology is concerned, he certainly cannot be accused of any failure to perceive or to accept the logical conclusion following the theological premises long ago adopted by him. The whole scheme of Chriftian theology rests upon the assumption that its cardinal doctrins hav been supernaturally revealed by God to man, either through the infallible scriptures, the infallible church, or both. Mr. Beecher, while conceding that, as a record of facts in the life of Christ, the gospels may be regarded as substantially true, cannot admit that they hav the character of a direct revelation, and hence cannot accept the theological doctrins proclaimed in the New Testament as having any higher origin than the brains of the New Testament writers. Neither does he believe in a church of supernatural origin, the witness and guardian of the faith, and teaching with an authority the same in charcter as that which would attach to an infallible Bible. Having rejected both these media of revelation, from whence is Mr. Beecher to derive his theology? Obviously he must build up a system of his own in the same way in which a philosopher frames his system of philosophy. If neither the church nor the New Testament has any higher authority than Xenonphon's "Memorabilia," the doctrins of the fall and the atonement, as set forth by St. Paul and other canonical writers, or the doctrins of the trinity, as taught by the church, are merely human theories which may be accepted by one century and rejected by another. In the nature of things there can be no certainty in a theology of this purely speculativ nature, except the mere fact of Christ's life in Judea, and the desirability that men should imitate whatever was worthy of imitation in him. Had Mr. Beecher, after his rejection of all authority, still clung to any of the leading doctrins of Christianity, he would hav been guilty of a weakness unworthy of a logical mind.

"In all highly organized churches," remarks Mr. Beecher, "the old doctrins remain untouched." If the doctrins of Christianity owe their origin to revelation, this unchangeableness is a necessary feature of the church, but in accordance with Mr. Beecher's theory that Christianity is a philosophic system which men are rearing, with many mistakes, and frequent changes from age to age, the persistency with which the church keeps the faith once committed to the saints shows a painful and reprehensible conservatism. Said another clergyman last Sunday morning, "Christ has continued himself in the church his mystical body—a divine-human organism that bears from him to me the invisible stream of divine life." Had Mr. Beecher ever firmly held to this conception he could never hav reached his present position, but as he has always rejected this conception, how can any one wonder that he now sneers at the conversatism of the church in matters of doctrin, and frames a creed for himself and his followers which permits him to exchange pulpits with Mr. Bob Ingersoll?

IN the North American Review for April Gov. Eli H. Murray, of Utah, treats of the existing crisis in the political fortunes of that territory. According to the present method of local government there, the minority of the population, the gentiles, though they possess the greater part of the wealth of the territory, exclusiv of farm property, and though they constitute by far the most enlightened and enterprising portion of the community, are practically without a voice in legislation. The author proposes a drastic remedy for these and all the other evils prevalent in Utah. An article entitled "Why They Come," by Edward Self, is devoted to the consideration of the many important questions connected with European immigration to this country. Dr. Henry A. Martin, replying to a recent article by Henry Bergh, defends the practice of vaccination. E. L. Godkin has an article on "The Civil Service Reform Controversy;" Senator Riddleberger on "Bourbonism in Virginia;" and General Albert Ordway on "A National Militia." Finally there is a paper of interest on the exploration of the ruined cities of Central America. The Review is published at 30 Lafayette Place, New York, and is sold by booksellers and newsdealers generally.

A Christian Young Man's Lie.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: On the 27th of February an obscure daily paper, issued in this aity, published an article headed an "Unjustifiable Proceeding," in which it was stated that persons who attended the meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association on the previous day had Freethinking tracts "thrust into their faces" by a person whose conduct was more adapted to "disgust than amaze" the victims; that the person alluded to "intruded the aforesaid tracts into Christian assemblages," and that it "might be dangerous to continue." As I am the only person who was distributing tracts anywhere near the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association at the time mentioned, I made no bones of taking this to myself, but offered the following communication to the old granny who edits the obscure paper mentioned:

"Editor of the Free Press: I am the only person to whom your article of Monday, headed "Unjustifiable Proceeding," can be intended to apply, and I beg to state that you are misinformed. I thrust the tract mentioned into nobody's face, unless that term applies to offering it, as tracts usually are offered, indiscriminately. It certainly is quite a misrepresentation to say that I intruded the tracts into a Christian assemblage. I would not do such an ungentlemanly act. I distributed them out of doors, at a considerable distance from any assemblage. I hardly think you meant to threaten me with danger for that. Surely you must be aware that the days when Christian young men silenced gainsayers with the sword, the stake, and the gallows are over. There is only one way to apply such arguments now, which is to hav somebody swear that the unbeliever sent him an indecent publication through the mails. As several Freethinkers hav been imprisoned on charges of that character, which appear to hav been false, but were tried in United States courts, where, as our lamented Senator Carpenter said, there is no such thing as a jury, perhaps I hav some reason to be afraid. On the whole, however, I am not."

The old granny refused to publish the above because of the sentences in which I reply to the insolent threat about danger. He besought me with tears in his eyes to call him a liar, but spare the feelings of that sweet-scented Christian young man who, he admitted, had told him that I stood at the door of the meeting, and a heap of other lies. I do not call the old granny a liar, because his distress excited my compassion. But the Christian young man is a liar, who dares not repeat his slanders to my face, and a coward, who couldn't be "dangerous" to a mouse, except perhaps by the method of perjury above mentioned, which was invented by Anthony Comstock, a prominent member of the same dirty gang.

Eau Claire, Wis., March 2, 1882. C. L JAMES.

To Charles Bradlaugh, M.P.

On the morning after his expulsion from Parliament, the following was dispatched to Mr. Bradlaugh by the National Liberal League:

NEW YORK, Feb. 23, 1882.

HON. CHARLES BRADLAUGH, My Very Dear Sir: The Freethinkers of the United States wake up this morning to read the news of your repeated expulsion from Parliament. We are simply astonished that the dying old religion of the Anglo-Saxon race has still the strength and the temerity to proceed to this extremity at this late day.

But the situation, both in England and here, in regard to Freethought, is like the situation here before our recent war in regard to slavery. In our ante-bellum days, we could confidently rely on the pro-slavery party committing some new outrage, to keep alive the spirit of liberty, and add new recruits to the swelling ranks opposed to slavery. Whenever a lull occurred in the agitation, and after a period of comparativ peace, some sense seemed creeping into the brains of the slavocrats, another mob would opportunely arise and tar and feather some innocent free white citizen; another printing office would be gutted and broken up; another negro would be chased and torn by blood-hounds; another mother, crossing a river, close pressed by her pursuers, would throw her infant into the rushing water beneath her to save at least it from capture; another statesman would be challenged to the field, or bludgeoned on the very floor of our House of Congress. Then, following each outrage of this character, all the fires of liberty would spout up anew from the ashes of our sleeping volcano.

All these horrors hav been suffered to free the bodies of men. The same process, it seems, must be gone through to liberate their minds; and we can cherish the same confidence in the stupidity of the church party, and place the same reliance on their continuing, at every inopportune emergency, all those hourly weakening processes which were practiced at their hight in the days of the Inquisition, to keep down Freethought.

From this latest ebullition of ecclesiastic spite, of which you are the honored victim, we hope and believe—indeed, we know—you will rise victorious. Your constituents, without any doubt, will return you triumphantly to the seat from which you hav been so unjustly excluded, and great gain to mental liberty will be the result.

In this faith and hope, representing many thousands of Freethinkers in this country, I remain, most devotedly yours, the splendid religion of deed and duty into the superstition of creed and cruelty. I deny it. It is infamous! Christ never said it!

T. C. LELAND, Sec'y.

Now upon these gospels the churches rest; and out of these things, mistakes and interpolation, they hav made their creeds. And the first church to make a creed, so far as I know, was the Catholic. It was the first church that had any power. That is the church that has preserved all these miracles for us. That is the church that preserved the manuscripts for us. That church is the first witness that Protestantism brought to the bar of history to prove miracles that took place eighteen hundred years ago; and while the witness is there Protestantism takes pains to say, "You cannot believe one word that witness says now."

That church is the only one that keeps up a constant communication with heaven through the instrumentality of a large number of decayed saints. That church has an agent of God on earth, has a person who stands in the place of deity; and that church is infallible. That church has persecuted to the exact extent of her power—and always will. In Spain that church stands erect, and is arrogant. In the United States that church crawls; but the object in both countries is the same—and that is the destruction of intellectual liberty. That church teaches us that we can make God happy by being miserable ourselvs; that a nun is holier in the sight of God than a loving mother with her child in her thrilled and thrilling arms; that a priest is better than a father; that celibacy is better than that passion of love that has made everything of beauty in this world. That church tells the girl of sixteen or eighteen years of age, with eyes like dew and light; that girl with the red of health in the white of her beautiful cheeks—tells that girl, "Put on the veil, woven of death and night, kneel upon the stones, and you will please God."

I tell you that, by law, no girl should be allowed to take the veil and renounce the joys and beauties of this life.

I am opposed to allowing these spider-like priests to weave webs to catch the loving maidens of the world. There ought to be a law appointing commissioners to visit such places twice a year and release every person who expresses a desire to be released. I do not believe in keeping the penitentiaries of God. No doubt they are honest about it. That is not the question. These iguorant superstitions fill millions of lives with weariness and pain, with agony and tears.

The next church I wish to speak of is the Episcopalian. That was founded by Henry VIII., now in heaven. He cast off Queen Catherine and Catholicism together, and he accepted Episcopalianism and Anne Boleyn at the same time. That church, if it had a few more ceremonies, would be Catholic. If it had a few less, nothing. We hav an Episcopalian church in this country, and it has all the imperfections of a poor relation. It is always boasting of its rich relativ. In England the creed is made by law, the same as we pass statutes here. And when a gentleman dies in England, in order to determin whether he shall be saved or not, it is necessary for the powers of heaven to read the acts of Parliament. It becomes a question of law, and sometimes a man is damned on a very nice point. Lost on demurrer.

A few years ago a gentleman by the name of Seabury, Samuel Seabury, was sent over to England to get some apostolic succession. We had not a drop in the house. It was necessary for the bishops of the English church to put their hands upon his head. They refused. There was no act of Parliament justifying it. He had then to go to the Scotch bishops; and, had the Scotch bishops refused, we never would have had any apostolic succession in the New World, and God would hav been driven out of half the earth, and the true church never could hav been founded upon this continent. But the Scotch bishops put their hands on his head, and now we hav an unbroken succession of heads and hands from St. Paul to the last bishop.

When I was a boy, the other churches looked upon dancing as probably the mysterious sin against the Holy Ghost; and they used to teach that when four boys got into a hay-mow, playing seven-up, the eternal God stood whetting the sword of his eternal wrath waiting to strike them down to the lowest hell.

The Episcopalians hav persecuted just to the extent of their power. Their treatment of the Irish has been a crime—a crime lasting for three hundred years. That church persecuted the Puritans of England and the Presbyterians of Scotland. In England the altar is the mistress of the throne, and this mistress has always looked at honest wives with scorn.

About a hundred and fifty years ago, two men, John Wesley and George Whitfield, said, If everybody is going to hell, somebody ought to mention it. The Episcopal clergy said, Keep still; do not tear your gown. Wesley and Whitfield said, This frightful truth ought to be proclaimed from the housetop of every opportunity, from the highway of every occasion. They were good, honest men. They believed their doctrin. And they said, If there is a hell, and a Niagara of souls pouring over a precipice of ignorance, somebodv ought to say something. They were right; somebody ought, if such a thing is true. Wesley was a believer in the Bible. He believed in the actual presence of the Almighty. God used to do miracles for him; used to put off a rain several days to giv his meeting a chance; used to cure his horse of lameness; used to cure Mr. Wesley's headaches.

In old times they were very simple. Churches used to be like barns. They used to hav them divided—men on that side, and women on this. A little barbarous. We hav advanced since then, and we now find as a fact, demonstrated by experience, that a man sitting by the woman he loves can thank God as heartily as though sitting between two men that he has never been introduced to.

There is another thing the Methodists should remember, and that is that the Episcopalians were the greatest enemies they ever had. And they should remember that the Freethinkers hav always treated them kindly and well.

The next church is the Presbyterian, and in my judgment the worst of all, as far as creed is concerned. This church was founded by John Calvin, a murderer! John Calvin, having power in Geneva, inaugurated human torture. Voltaire abolished torture in France. The man who abolished torture, if the Christian religion is true, God is now torturing in hell, and the man who inaugurated torture is now one of the best musicians in heaven. John Knox started this doctrin in Scotland, and there is this peculiarity about Presbyterianism—it grows best where the soil is poorest. I read the other day an account of a meeting between John Knox and John Calqin. Imagin a dialog between a pestilence and a famin! Imagin a conversation between a block and an ax! As I read their conversation it seemed to me as though John Knox and John Calvin were made for each other; that they fitted each other like the upper and lower jaws of a wild beast. They believed happiness was a crime; they looked upon laughter as blasphemy; and they did all they could to destroy every human feeling, and to fill the mind with the infinit gloom of predestination and eternal death. They taught the doctrin that God had a right to damn us because he made us. That is just the reason that he has not a right to damn us. There is some dust. Unconscious dust! What right has God to change that unconscious dust into a human being, when he knows that human being will sin; when he knows that human being will suffer eternal agony? Why not leave him in the unconscious dust? What right has an infinit God to add to the sum of human agony? Suppose I knew that I could change that piece of furniture into a living, sentient human being, wrapped in a robe of passionate flesh, and I knew that that being would suffer untold agony forever. If I did it I would be a fiend. I would leave that being in the unconscious dust. And yet we are told that we must believe such a doctrin or we are to be eternally damned!

The other day a young gentleman, a Presbyterian, who had just been converted, came to me, and he gave me a tract, and he told me he was perfectly happy. Said I, "Do you think a great many people are going to hell?" "Oh, yes." "And are you perfectly happy?" Well, he did not know as he was, quite. "Would you not be happier if they were all going to heaven?" "Oh, yes." "Well, then, you are not perfectly happy?" No, he did not think he was. "When you get to heaven, then you will be perfectly happy?" "Oh, yes." "Now, when we are only going to hell, you are not quite happy; but when we are in hell, and you in heaven, you will be perfectly happy. You will not be as decent when you get to be an angel as you are now, will you?" Well, that was not exactly it. Said I, "Suppose your mother were in hell, would you be happy in heaven then?" "Well, he says, "I suppose God would know the best place for mother." And I thought to myself, then, if I was a woman, I would like to hav five or six boys like that.

No church has done more to fill the world with gloom than the Presbyterian. Its creed is frightful, hideous, and hellish. The Presbyterian god is the monster of monsters. He is an eternal executioner, jailer, and turnkey. He will enjoy forever the shrieks of the lost—the wails of the damned. Hell is the festival of the Presbyterian god.

Christians say to me: "What do you propose? You hav torn this down, what do you propose to giv us in place of it?" I hav not torn the good down. I hav only endeavored to trample out the ignorant, cruel fires of hell. I do not tear away the passage, "God will be merciful to the merciful." I do not destroy the promis, "If you will forgiv others God will forgiv you." I would not for anything blot out the faintest star that shines in the horizon of human despair, nor in the sky of human hope; but I will do what I can to get that infinit shadow out of the heart of man. "What do you propose in place of this?" Well, in the first place, I propose good fellowlowship—good friends all around. No matter what we believe, shake hands and let it go. That is your opinion; this is mine; let us be friends. Science makes friends; religion, superstition, makes enemies. They say belief is important. I say, no, actions are important. Judge by deed, not by creed. Good fellowship, good friends, sincere men and women, mutual forbearance, born of mutual respect. We hav had too many of these solemn people. Whenever I see an exceedingly solemn man I know he is an exceedingly stupid man. No man of any humor ever founded a religion—never. Humor sees both sides. While reason is the holy light, humor carries the lantern, and the man with a keen sense of humor is preserved from the solemn stupidities of superstition. I like a man who has got good feeling for everybody—good fellowship. One man said to another, "Will you take a glass of wine?" "I do not drink." "Will you smoke a cigar?" "I do not smoke." "Maybe you will chew something?" "I do not chew." "Let us eat some hay." "I tell you I do not eat eay." "Well, then, good-bye, for you are no company for man or beast."

I believe in the gospel of cheerfulness, the gospel of good nature, the gospel of good health. Let us pay some attention to our bodies. Take care of our bodies, and our souls will take care of themselvs? Good health! And I believe the time will come when the public thought will be so great and grand that it will be looked upon as infamous to perpetuate disease. I believe the time will come when man will not fill the future with consumption and insanity. I believe the time will come when we will study ourselvs, and understand the laws of health, and then we will say we are under obligation to put the flags of health in the cheeks of our children. Even if I got to heaven, and had a harp, I would hate to look back upon my children and grandchildren and see them diseased, deformed, crazed—all suffering the penalties of crimes I had committed.

I believe in the gospel of good living. You can not make any god happy by fasting. Let us hav good food, and let us hav it well cooked, and it is a thousand times better to know how to cook than it is to understand any theology in the world. I believe in the gospel of good clothes; I believe in the gospel of good houses; in the gospel of water and soap. I believe in the gospel of intelligence; in the gospel of education. The schoolhouse is my cathedral. The universe is my Bible. I believe in that gospel of justice, that we must reap what we sow.

I do not believe in forgivness as it is preached by the church. We do not need the forgivness of God, but of each other and of ourselvs. If I rob Mr. Smith and God forgivs me, how does that help Smith? If I, by slander, cover some poor girl with the leprosy of some imputed crime, and she withers away like a blighted flower, and afterward I get the forgivness of God, how does that help her? If there is another world, we hav got to settle with the people we hav wronged in this. No bankrupt court there. Every cent must be paid.

The Christians say that among the ancient Jews, if you committed a crime you had to kill a sheep; now they say, "Charge it; put it on the slate." It will not do. For every crime you commit you must answer to yourself and to the one you injure. And if you hav ever clothed another with wo, as with a garment of pain, you will never be quite as happy as though you had not done that thing. No forgivness by the gods. Eternal, inexorable, everlasting justice, so far as nature is concerned. You must reap the result of your acts. Even when forgiven by the one you hav injured, it is not as though the injury had not been done. That is what I believe in. And if it goes hard with me I will stand it, and I will cling to my logic, and I will bear it like a man.

And I believe, too, in the gospel of liberty, in giving to others what we claim for ourselvs. I believe there is room everywhere for thought, and the more liberty you giv away the more you will hav. In liberty extravagance is economy. Let us be just. Let us be generous to each other.

I believe in the gospel of intelligence. That is the only lever capable of raising mankind. Intelligence must be the savior of this world. Humanity is the grand religion, and no God can put a man in hell in another world who has made a little heavin this. God cannot make a man miserable if that man has made somebody else happy. God cannot hate anybody who is capable of loving anybody. Humanity—that word embraces all there is.

So I believe in this great gospel of humanity. "Ah! but," they say, "it will not do. You must believe." I say, No. My gospel of health will bring life. My gospel of intelligence, my gospel of good living, my gospel of good-fellowship will cover the world with happy homes. My doctrin will put carpets upon your floors, pictures upon your walls. My doctrin will put books upon your shelves, ideas in your minds My doctrin will rid the world of the abnormal monsters born of ignorance and superstition. My doctrin will giv us health, wealth, and happiness. That is what I want. That is what I believe in. Giv us intelligence. In a little while a man will find that he cannot steal without robbing himself. He will find that he cannot murder without assassinating his own joy. He will find that every crime is a mistake. He will find that only that man carries the cross who does wrong, and that upon the man who does right the cross turns to wings that will bear him upward forever. He will find that even intelligent self-love embraces within its mighty arms all the human race.

"Oh," but they say to me, "you take away immortality." I do not. If we are immortal it is a fact in nature, and we are not indebted to priests for it, nor to bibles for it, and it cannot be destroyed by unbelief. As long as we love we will hope to liv, and when the one dies that we love we will say, "Oh, that we could meet again," and whether we do or not it will not be the work of theology. It will be a fact in nature. I would not for my life destroy one star of human hope, but I want it so that when a poor woman rocks the cradle and sings a lullaby to the dimpled darling, she will not be compelled to believe that ninety-nine chances in a hundred she is raising kindling-wood for hell.

One world at a time is my doctrin. It is said in this Testament, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" and I say, Sufficient unto each world is the evil thereof. And suppose, after all, death does end all. Next to eternal joy, next to being forever with those we love and those who hav loved us, next to that is to be wrapt in the dreamless drapery of eternal peace. Next to eternal life is eternal sleep. Upon the shadowy shore of death the sea of trouble casts no wave. Eyes that hav been curtained by the everlasting dark will never know again the burning touch of tears. Lips touched by eternal silence will never speak again the broken words of grief. Hearts of dust do not break. The dead do not weep, Within the tomb no veiled and weeping sorrow sits, and in the rayless gloom is crouched no shuddering fear.

I had rather think of those I hav loved, and lost as having returned to earth, as having become a part of the elemental wealth of the world—I would rather think of them as unconscious dust, I would rather dream of them as gurgling in the stream, floating in the clouds, bursting in the foam of light upon the shores of worlds, I would rather think of them as the lost visions of a forgotten night, than to hav even the faintest fear that their naked souls hav been clutched by an orthodox god.

But for me, I will leave the dead where nature leaves them. Whatever flower of hope springs up in my heart I will cherish, I will giv it breath of sighs and rain of tears. But I cannot believe that there is any being in this universe who has created a human soul for eternal pain. I would rather that every god would destroy himself; I would rather that we all should go to eternal chaos, to black and starless nights, than that just one soul should suffer eternal agony.

I hav made up my mind that if there is a God he will be merciful to the merciful—upon that rock I stand; that he will not torture the forgiving—upon that rock I stand; that every man should be true to himself, and that there is no world, no star, in which honesty is a crime—upon that rock I stand; that the honest man, the kind, sweet woman, the happy child, hav nothing to fear either in this world or the world to come. Upon that rock I stand.

Wishing Mr. Bennett every success and a safe return, I remain,

MR. EDITOR: I hav succeeded in securing one more name for the roll of honor. You will find herewith $5 for the Round-the-World trip for N. J. Loomis, of Farley, Iowa. The remainder of inclosed cash you will apply on books, etc., as directed.

In the matter of the two books of "A Truth Seeker Abroad," I prefer that titile to "An Infidel Abroad," on account of having them circulate among Christians. I am now almost alone in this free library affair, and cannot get as many books each year as we ought to hav, but what we hav got are doing good work and their influence is felt inside the churches here. There is no time but what some of the books are out, and often among church-members. I also take six Liberal papers, all of which I keep on the move, either by handing around or by mailing to parties at a distance. The general sentiment in this part of the country is becoming more Liberal year by year. When I look back five years and see the change that has come over the people, I am surprised. It is far better than I expected when I began to fight for the right, and I think that I can see plainly that our cause is advancing with increased ratio. One of our churches has been holding a revival for about two weeks, and so far, I understand, their efforts hav proved a failure. There is not much danger of any great religious excitement in this town. When we hear of any one getting warmed up to the subject we cool him or her off if it is in our power. Sometimes we use argument, sometimes ridicule, and at others use our books, papers, lectures, tracts, etc. And for five years we hav successfully combated all efforts to raise a religious excitement, and consequently converts hav been exceeding scarce. If every Liberal would subscribe for one live Liberal paper and giv it to his friends to read, our cause would sweep over the world like an avalanche. I cannot see why it is that Liberals so generally fail to respond to the needs and duties of the day. For shame that it should be so! H. GILMORE.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 extra on the $5 for the books of Mr. Bennett's trip for the best binding, mentioned in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am well pleased with the paper, and can hardly wait till it comes. I am highly delighted with the letters from Bro. Bennett. PETER GOBERT.

AUGUSTA, MICH., March 16, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $9—$3 for a renewal of my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I see by the tab on the wrapper that my time expired the first of March. MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $8—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $3 to hav my Round-the-World books bound in morocco, and $2 to help defray the expenses of Mr. Bennett's trip, as I think $5 is too small a sum to pay friend Bennett for traveling around the world and publishing the books.

Hoping Mr. Bennett may get home safe, I remain,

Yours truly, LEONARD WALTERS.

GOLDSMITH, IND., March 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $6—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $3 for the extra binding of the books. I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hardly know how I could do without it. I am surrounded by the meanest set of Jesus-eaters that the sun ever shone on. They are Presbyterians. I will giv a specimen of their conduct. I was road-master some three years ago. It was my duty to warnout all males over twenty-one and under fifty years of age. I went to one good praying man. I made my business known to him. Well, he said he thought he was too old to work on the road. He had told me about two years before that he was forty-two. I felt that I was beat. I went to the auditor's office and got the assayer's book of 1867 and found him booked for forty-two over his signature. He had lied out of at least four year's work. He is one of the loudest prayers in the Presbyterian church. This is only one of a number of mean tricks I could enumerate.

Yours truly, DAVID SMITH.

MEMPHIS, MO., March 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I was glad to see the brief but cogent letter of Amy Post in your last issue.

I, too, wonder that there are those who refuse to investigate Spiritualism when there are so many mediums in whose presence no honest and intelligent person can fail, by proper perseverence, to be convinced of its truth. And yet many who never seek for the truth on this subject speak as dogmatically upon it as any church bigot. I never expect to see any nearer approach to miracles than such people. But it must be caused by the horrors with which old theology has clothed the future. Would that they could shake that off.

My mind often reverts to a visit I enjoyed at the hospitable home of Isaac and Amy some twenty-six or eight years ago. I, for the first time, saw in the evening a table move without visible contact with any moving force. The medium was a lady who was giving a course of lectures in Rochester, but whose name I cannot now recall. Benisons on Amy and spirit Isaac. STEPHEN YOUNG.

ADRIAN, MICH., March 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Your editorial in the last TRUTH SEEKER in reference to the intolerant and dogmatical character of the Catholic church, and its inroads on American institutions, was well timed, though it throws a dark shadow on American liberties, and it should be a renewed incitement to all lovers of our country's future welfare to themselvs in the direction of using their influence in trying to build up intelligent Freethought, based on correct moral principles, for this is the true and sure foundation on which to build a higher manhood. It was this that laid the foundation of this government. There was no priestly dictation there; no building on an anthropoid God, or any other kind of a myth, but they boldly and publicly declared to the world of mankind at large that their government should be built on the rights of man.

That law was for the protection of the weak, and derives its just powers from the consent of the governed, and no God, no Jesus Christ about it. In the language of George Washington to the Turkish government, when it objected to opening its ports to the United States government on account of its Christian character, as the Christian evangelical religion, through the European nations, had given them so much trouble from their encroachments on their political rights, "this is in no sense a Christian nation."

In order to put this matter at rest with them, George Washington assured them that the United States government was in no sense a Christian government, and it was the intention of the fathers of this nation that it should be entirely secular in its character, and free from any religious domination, and yet a government that should protect all shades of religious thought, so long as their religion did not interfere with the rights of man as established by this general government.

But how is it to-day? Does this Catholic church not interfere with the spirit of our general government, and the rights of man, when it boldly and publicly teaches that the church's authority is from God, and the government is from man, and that true Catholics must obey God rather than man?

Then this Christian, evangelical, orthodox, Catholic church has been able to manipulate this government to that extent as to let them stamp their lie on our coin (In God we trust), while the facts of the case are that there is not one in the whole crew that trusts to this Bible God for the first thing. In fact, this government knows nothing of him, nor never did. He has never made his appearance in America. In the eastern hemisphere, from the accounts we hav of him, it seems that he showed Moses his back parts (Ex. xxxiii, 33), but he never condescended to do us even that little favor here in America; and why we as a nation would allow our government officials to be duped by this superstition to that extent, as to allow them to hav this lie stamped on our coin is more than I can tell. Is there any one that can giv us an intelligent reason for this? I hope they will rise and explain. S. D. MOORE.

THE CRISIS.

SOLESBURG, March 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR:

The crisis is coming! resounds from on high,
Let our bird scream, as it floats in the sky,
The light of the ages, that shone in the past,
Is burnished by science, grown brighter at last,

And it came to pass about the year 1882 of the Christian era, and in the reign of traditional superstition over all the earth, that many did run to and fro seeking knowledge above what is written in the holy book of the Chronicles of the holy wars of the God of the Jews, as chief general of his chosen people. Even D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, whom you all well know, is now on a pilgrimage around the world, seeking, perhaps, the four corners thereof, but nary a corner had he found when last heard from in the land of Yahweh, where the corner idea, with many other wonderful stories, originated. Mr. Bennett tells of many rocks and stones existing there, belonging to former ages, but is silent on the supposition that they once formed a great pillar to support one of the four corners of the earth in that place, when the earth was a table-land, and the mighty orb of day rolled majestically around it, except for a short season, to accommodate General Joshua in drenching the earth with the blood of his fellow-beings to please his God of vengeance, now revered by professing Christians as a God of love.

Oh! what ignorance, worse than that, priestcraft has done it all,
And yet it rears its hydra-head 'neath stately temples tall;
But science's light is marching on, like D. M. Bennett round the world,
Weaving a banner as he goes, to float o'er all the world,
And rouse the nations, one and all, beneath its friendly wave,
Till priestcraft shall be dead and buried in its grave;
'Tis founded on a monster myth, a myth and nothing more,
When its votaries hav the power they dye the earth with gore.
Religion is a work of anxious soul, for good of all humanity,
And not tied up in stupid creeds, like selfish Christianity.
The time is at hand, for time to decide,
Whether priestcraft is right or to be denied;
Beheld as the author of many the vices,
And doomed to go down now in the crisis!

"A LITTLE MORE GRAPE."

"A little more grape," Taylor told Bragg,
And the foe will be ready to put in a bag.
They are beginning to doubt, to waver, and fear,
From the charges they got, so plain and so clear,
Like the soldiers in blue, gave the soldiers in gray,
When they conquered for freedom, the pride of our day!

I regret very much that my age and circumstances forbid my name being on the starry role for D. M. Bennett's banner books. I hope to get them at some future time if life permits. I am about opening an office in this place (Carversville), with the following invitation to all:

Come walk into my office, when I'm not away,
And enjoy your freedom, to hav your honest say,
According to the broadest liberty compatible with human justice.
I want to answer questions, my answers shall be free,
So none should be offended if we different see.

Yours truly, E. W. ALLEN.

COVINGTON, PA., March 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find one dollar for books. I was sorry to hear that our old hero had to work so hard to get out of the Jordan, and trust that he may not meet with any mishaps, but return home to his friends. I am in an orthodox town where they all think that Thomas Paine denied the god of nature, and confound an Infidel with an Atheist, and they hear it preached from the pulpit that to think or reason is sinning against the holy spirit. There are a few Freethinkers here, and we intend to organize a Liberal League next fall and show ourselvs. When one is reading the scribe's description of the country in the "Book of Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh" (chap. xxvi), turn to Exodus xxxiv 24, and the scripture is plain enough.

Yours truly, O. J. LOVELL.

The Cottage Maiden.

BY ALHAZA.

But the tender heart o'lleesome love,
What mair hae queens upon a throne ?—Burns.

Oh mirk was the night, the wind blew cauld,
The sheep, a' safe, were within the fauld;
He brought me gloves, and a Highland plaidee,
And went to the wars, my ain kind laddie.
The laddie's awa', the brave laddie.

It jars me great that he is gone,
'Neath the milk-white thorn I weep and moan.
So the thrush is lonely far over the lea,
The bird that is flown she is waiting to see.
The laddie's awa'.

They told me one day he was sick and sad,
My heart is sair for the absent lad;
No rose of the simmer is lovely to me
Till fate restores the pale laddie to me.
For he is awa'.

The wind blaws cool from the mountain's crest,
The lavrock rises with dew on his breast,
But the *westlin wind comes never to me,
To bring the laddie I wish to see;
For he is awa'.

Oh where was God when the ship was a wrack,
And the shivering sails by the north wind strack,
And the stranded vessel was left alone.
And hoarsely sounded the sea's wild moan ?
Oh, where was the laddie?

The sea-gulls flew from their rocky home
To wet their beaks in the ‡purple foam;
Now the breeze is still that should waft him to me,
And my heart is chill as the moaning sea.

* "Westlin wind," meaning western breeze, an expression used in Scotch ballads.

‡ "Purple foam." The sea-foam is dark by shoal water.

What Was His Creed?

Republished by request.

He left a ton of anthracite
In front of a poor widow's door,
When the deep snow, frozen and white,
Wrapped street and square, mountain and moor;
That was his deed;
He did it well.
"What was his creed?"
I cannot tell.

Blest "in his basket and his store,"
In sitting down and rising up,
When more he got, he gave the more,
Withholding not the crust and cup.
He took the lead
In each good task—
"What was his creed?"
I did not ask.

His charity was like the snow,
Soft, white, and silken in its fall;
Not like the noisy winds that blow
From shivering trees the leaves, a pall
For flower and weed
Drooping below,
"What was his creed?"
The poor may know.

He had great faith in loaves of bread
For hungry people, young and old;
And hope-inspiring words he said
To him he sheltered from the cold.
For man must feed
As well as pray.
"What was his creed?"
I cannot say.

In words he did not put his trust;
In faith his words were never writ;
He loved to share his cup and crust
With any one who needed it.
In time of need
A friend was he—
"What was his creed?"
He told not me.

He put his trust in heaven, and worked
Ever along with hand and head;
And what he gave in charity
Sweetened his sleep and daily bread.
Let us heed,
For life is brief;
Adopt his creed.
And give relief.

The Brain and the Bible.

Does anybody want a good book, interesting, instructiv, with fresh, new arguments, and enchaining the attention from beginning to end? Then procure and read Mr. Beall's book with the above caption, and you will rise from its perusal with a better understanding of yourself, your neighbors, your friends, and a more tender sympathy for all humanity. In this book the author does not simply reiterate the old arguments against the unstable system of ancient and modern Christianity, already worn and wearisome to the student and observer, but earnestly and candidly sifts the character and development of the influences that hav been brought to bear upon man, and made him as we find him to-day, and presents facts in a new and different light. Society—the world in general—deals with effects; Mr. Beall goes back to causes and shows the why and wherefore of the evil and the good. He is a practical scientific phrenologist, and, from a phrenological (which is the correct one, I think) standpoint, has given in this book much valuable matter and food for thought, showing conclusivly and clearly that, in the author's own words, "the brain is the only true Bible—that nature embraces all there is of which we hav any logical evidence, and that neglect of nature paves the broad road to the only hell, while obedience to natural law makes a flowery path to the only heaven."

I hav not in some time read a book that has pleased me so much as this. The arguments are so true and logical, the matter treated so important, and the great ally of Materialism, phrenology, is brought forward in such a fair and reasonable way that none can fail to see its great importance in the elevation of our human kind.

The chapters are all extremely interesting, and the splendid introduction by Col. Ingersoll sparkles like all the jewels of his wonderful genius, and givs an added luster to the work, which is destined to liv and take its place with the standard literature of the world. This book will undoubtedly meet with a large sale, as it deserves. It is handsomely and neatly bound, printed on good paper with clear type, and is dedicated to "all friends of humanity who do not fear to discover in nature the only cause and cure of all that stands in the way of our highest good." SUSAN H. WIXON.

Spirit Samuel Bowles's Opinion of Henry Ward Beecher.

In the late work of Samuel Bowles, "Contrasts in Spirit Life," which is just now having such an unprecedented sale all over the country, is to be found on page 82 the following very interesting remarks concerning Mr. Beecher:

Question: How would Henry Ward Beecher be received were he to go to spirit life now, with the knowledge of spirit return, but lacking the courage to proclaim it?

Answer: He would be received as one who preached the truth, but not the whole truth; as one who worked for humanity, did his duty as far as possible without calling upon him public contumely. Henry Ward Beecher to-day is doing a great work. He is carefully breaking up the old ideas and giving new ones. He is daily showing that it is acts, not blood, that save men. He has clothed his thoughts on this subject in non-committal words, and were he to come to spirit life now he would be received lovingly by many whom he had benefited, but reproachfully by that class of spirits who, knowing his powerful intellect, his strong magnetic qualities, knowing that from his own experiences, and from those of a sister, he must hav been convinced of spirit return, yet know that he has not made it publicly a spoke in the mighty wheel of progress. This failure in duty would come to him as a reminder of what might hav been, and the thought of the powerful lever he might hav worked for the good of a sinning people would be a reproach to him when he viewed it as we view it. Should this meet his eye, I would remind him of the force back of him which givs him his finest thoughts, of the power he possesses to sow seed for a great harvest. If he chose he might unite spirit return and communion with his glowing thoughts, and teach people they are never alone; that the friend whose cold form was yesterday deposited in its resting-place is to-day a living, working being with love intensified.

May angels and all that is good spare Henry Ward Beecher until, with every beautiful sermon he preaches, the nearness of the two worlds is made manifest, and until he sees the necessity of urging his numerous flock to study into lessons that show them if a man die he does liv again.

This charming book contains Mr. Bowles's interview with Dr. J. G. Hall, and which is itself worth the price of the book. It can be obtained at this office for fifty cents.

Liberal Notes from Illinois.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since I wrote you last I hav visited most of the large towns in Ford, Champaign, Piatt, Douglass, Edgar, Vermillion, and Iroquois counties; and, taken as a whole, I hav found less activ Liberalism in these seven counties than in any other portions of this state I hav traveled over during my nearly twenty months' traveling over Illinois in the interest of Liberalism. This inactivity does not arise from the want of numbers, as there are a great many Freethinkers in nearly every place I hav visited; but the trouble is, they do not, as a general thing, take any Liberal papers, and as a consequence are uninformed and indifferent as to the importance of organization.

When in Paxton, Ford county, I had the pleasure of attending two lectures by Prof. W. F. Jamieson, on the evenings of January 17th and 18th. And let me say that if any community wants to get a good shaking up until the dry bones of old orthodoxy fairly rattle, let them engage Prof. Jamieson or Mrs. H. S. Lake to giv them a course of lectures.

I spent some time in Paris, the birthplace of THE TRUTH SEEKER, where I met with many warm friends of Mr. D. M. Bennett, amongst whom I would name Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Cretois, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Bradbury, Mr. J. A. Walthall, Mr. William H. Geohegan, and J. R. Martin.

I expect to go north from here to Pontiac, and thence into La Salle county, and visit what of the state I can lying between here and the Illinois river between this and the time for holding the next annual state Liberal League convention, which I am arranging to hold in Maennerchor Hall, in the city of Bloomington, on Saturday and Sunday, June 3d and 4th.

To make this convention a success is going to involve some expense. But this can be easily met if those of our Liberals who can afford to do so will only come forward and join the state Liberal League. One dollar makes any man or woman a life member of the state Liberal League of Illinois. The sum is but little for each one. There are now one hundred and twenty-five life members to the state League of Illinois, and there ought to be five hundred by the first of June. My Liberal friends, let me ask you once more to send me a membership fee to the state League, and thus help forward the cause in this state. It takes all and more than I make from the sale of books to pay railroad and hotel expenses, yet I cannot think that you are disposed to let the good work commenced in this state stop through the want of a little help.

My post-office address until after the June convention will be Bloomington, Illinois. Please let me hear from you.

Yours for mental liberty, F. F. FOLLET,
Sec. State Liberal League of Ill.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO
THE
Bennett-Mair Discussion.
BETWEEN
D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men lily informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. 3m53

CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, in Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II, and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesnits and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hydrocele (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials aided by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Please send and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, and his system based upon scientific fact."

Gems of Thought.

IF we should claim for our own religion the advantage of being supported by the authority of a long succession of able, wise, and virtuous men, fully competent to judge of its truth, yet if our adversaries can produce an equally imposing list of authorities against us, we shall hav gained but little by our mode of reasoning. These one-sided ways of proving the exclusiv claims of a particular creed are as if a person should maintain the vast superiority of his countrymen over foreigners by a reference to the battles they had won, the territory they had conquered, and the bravery they had displayed; forgetful to inquire whether there were not other nations which had gained victories equally transcendent, made conquests equally extensiv, and evinced a heroism equally admirable. —Amberley's Analysis.

IT has been said by Carlyle and by many others, that work is worship, and that nature is the most constant, unfailing, and determined of workers; but worship implies a devotional feeling, and an earnest sense of duty performed in the labor you undertake. In this sense alone can work be regarded as worship; in all others it is mere labor and toil under the sense of the necessity or pleasure in occupation. The notion of worship can only be referred to a devotional feeling as in the search after truth, in the desire to do what is right and best, and in the love of truth, both for its own sake and for the general good and in the elevating sense of our highest duties and noblest conceptions, and in the name of the true, the good, and the beautiful.—Henry G. Atkinson.

No sober judge of human affairs will feel bound to be indignant because those who force on our notice truths which we should otherwise hav overlooked, overlook some of those which we see Rather he will be thankful that so long as popular truth is one-sided, it is more desirable than otherwise that unpopular truth should hav one-sided asserters too; and being usually the most energetic and the most likely to compel reluctant attention to tho fragment of wisdom which they proclaim as if it were the whole.—Mill's Liberty.

THAT mind alone is free which, conscious ever of its own feebleness, feeling hourly its own liability to err, turning thankfully to light from whatever side it may come, does yet refuse to giv up that right with which God has invested it of judging, or to abrogate its own responsibility, and so humbly and even awfully resolves to hav an opinion, a judgment, a decision of its own.—Fred. W. Robertson.

THE prayer of Ajax was for light.
Through all that dark and desperate fight,
The blackness of that noonday night,
He asked but the return of sight.
To see his foeman's face.

Let our unceasing, earnest prayer
Be, too, for light—for strength to bear
Our portion of the weight of care,
That crushes into dumb despair
One-half the human race.

O sniffering, sad humanity!
O ye afflicted ones who lie
Steeped to the lips in misery,
Longing, and yet afraid to die,
Patient, though sorely tried!

I pledge you in this cup of grief,
Where floats the fennel's little leaf,
The battle of our life is brief,
The alarm—the struggle—the relief—
Then sleep we, side by side.
—Longfellow's Goblet of Life.

CHRIST'S "descent into hell" is not attested by even one evangelist. On the other hand, they all bear testimony to the "resurrection," but not one of them was an eye-witness, and it is described in a different manner by all; in short, attested like any other event that we are compelled to regard as unhistorical. And what sort of an event? One so impossible, in such direct antagonism to every law of nature, that it would require a testimony of tenfold reliability to be as much as discussed and not scouted from the very first.—Strauss.

IF you dispel the clouds the sky remains. If you explode incredible dogmas self-evident truths remain. If Eden, the Lord God walking in it in the cool of the day, the universal deluge, the tables and thunders of Sinai, total depravity, the atonement by the death of a God-man, hades, hell, and the devil should all go to the limbos of vanity, the Golden Rule would not go. It would only shine brighter and brighter unto the perfect day. Nature did not wait for books to teach that. It shone into the heart and head of Confucius even a little more clearly than into those of Jesus. It seems natural to many animal tribes as well as man. The absence of it is exceptional, or society could not exist. It will grow the stronger the more you clear away the weeds of theology.—Elizur Wright.

THE Mohammedans regard their Koran with a reverence that few Christians pay to their Bible. The Koran is admitted everywhere as the standard of all law and all practice; the thing to be gone upon in speculation and life; the message sent direct out of heaven, which this earth has to conform to and walk by; the thing to be read. Their judges decide by it; all Moslems are bound to study it, seek in it for the light of their life. They hav mosques where it is all read daily; thirty relays of priests take it up in succession, get through the whole each day. Thus, for twelve hundred years, has the voice of this book, at all moments, kept sounding through the ears and the hearts of so many men. We hear of Mohammedan doctors that had read it seventy thousand times.—Carlyle.

To those who plead woman's lack of mental power we would say, Giv her a chance to show to what hights she may be developed, ere you condemn her. Giv her a few ages of culture, a few thousand years in which prenatal influences and true educativ surroundings may mold and form her mind and develop it into its highest and truest perfection, and then will it be seen that she will eequal to the situation.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

INDICATIONS.

Now doth the Jersey farmer see
Increasing signs of coming spring:
The cawing crow is on the wing,
The snow-plow leans against a tree.

From off the roofs the melting snow
Drops moistly on his aged hat,
And beats a festiv rat-a-tat
Upon the thawing earth below.

Within his barn he hears the bleat
Of early lambs—the clucking hen—
The lazy swine root in their pen,
The tramp is on his summer beat.

The sun sets farther to the west,
As earlier goes the swain to bed;
His boots with nativ mud are red,
Upon the bed-post hangs his vest.

The wheels are put upon the hearse.
Book agents wander through the land;
Now comes the little German band,
The spring-time poet writes his verse.
—G. E. Macdonald in The Judge.

IN his poem, "The Dole of the King's Daughter?" Oscar Wilde sings:

"There is one man who loves her true,
(Red, oh red is the stain of gore!)
He hath duggen a grave by the darksome yew,
(One grave will do for four)."

Now, there is a case either of a low down swindle on the part of the sexton, or a niggardly economy on the part of the mourners. Either the sexton has been paid for digging four graves, and has made up his swindling mind to fill up his contaact on the American plan of planting the four remains in one grave and sending in his bill in quadruplicate, or else the bereaved family is going to swindle the honest sexton out of his just dues by tamping four loved ones into a lonely grave. No wonder, when people begin to express sentiments of such obnoxious economy, that the advocates of cremation should daily gain strength. If it once be conceded that one grave is enough for four, why not for six or seven, or a dozen, until the time will come when a family lot for Brigham Young would measure only six by two, superficial measure, and be as deep as an artesian well, and the cemetery business would be ruined? We are glad Mr. Wilde has called attention to such ghastly practices, and hope that a much-needed reform will soon be agitated, until every man will feel reasonably certain of some day having a grave all by himself.

A NEW VERSION OF AN OLD POEM.

Pity the sorrows of your poor old Grant,
Whose limbs so often bring him to your door;
Giv freely to relieve his pressing want,
And thank your stars that he demands no more.

You doubtless thought that you had done your best
That all your duty to the man was done,
When you had honored him above the rest,
Including your immortal Washington.

But now the days of whisky rings are past;
His houses and his lots he has to buy;
The latest plum he got may prove the last,
Unless you feed him from the public pie.

True, he is rich; but richer men by far
His hungry eyes can here and there behold,
And envious folks his daily pleasures mar,
Contrasting them with Vanderbilt and Gould.

Since he could not be emperor or king,
And third-term glories were to him denied,
A heavy pension is the proper thing
To pay him for his loss of place and pride.

No wounds he shows, nor any sort of scars,
No hurt or harm from any fight or fray,
But brings the coat from which he stripped the stars
When he accepted higher rank and pay.

Open, kind friends, the public purse again—
It may be long before he asks for more—
And giv your Grant enough to help him train
To enter for the race of eighty-four.

A MICHIGAN man who has a patent windmill went down to Tennessee last fall to see what he could do among the farmers of that state. Reaching a town in the central part of the state, he went to a dealer in agricultural implements and stated his desire to erect his machine and call attention to it.

"Well, it can be done, I guess," was the reply.

"But how had I best proceed?"

"Well, you can put her up over on the hill thar. I don't know who owns the ground, but if you treat the crowd I guess no one will object."

"Very well."

"Next Tuesday is market day, and there'll be heaps of folks in town. You want to be around early and treat the crowd."

"Yes."

"Set the old thing going and ask the boys over to drink something."

"Just so."

"You want to stand on a bar'l and make some explanations, of course, for it will be new to most of 'em. But don't talk too long. Make it about ten minutes, and then treat the crowd."

"Yes."

"If you hav to talk any more, tell 'em there's another drink ahead."

"I see."

"If the old man Jones comes in with his boys there'll be a row in the crowd, They shoot on sight. Keep your eye peeled, and if you see any signs of a row, ask the whole crowd out to drink."

"Yes, but—"

"Look out for dog fights. If one takes place you can't hold the boys a minute. Keep your eye on the cannes. If you see a yaller purp begin to bristle up ask the crowd to step over and moisten."

"Yes, but by that time the whole crowd will be drunk," protested the agent.

"Sartin it will, and that's what you want, of course. That will giv you a chance to skip out and take your life along with you; and if you make a stop anywhere within a hundred miles I'll send the windmill by freight—provided there's anything left to send! Nothing like knowing how to handle a Tennessee crowd, my friend. Did you ask me out to take sunthin?"

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with forty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of the work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec, to Damascus.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

The Southern Clinic, a journal of medicin and surgery, says: "We took up this book with prejudice, but soon saw the author was a physcian, and a good one too; a sound physiologist, an instructiv writer, and a man of high moral sense;" and adds, "A race of vigorous, beautiful, sweet-tempered people would be the result of the observance of its principles."

The Home Journal, Boston, says: "We earnestly commend it to all. Its influence can be only beneficial. The author has a thorough mastery of his subject.

Demorest's Family Fashion Magazine says: "It contains enough sensible hints to set up a family."

The Alpha, edited by Dr. Winslow, says: "We like the book thoroughly." And adds: "Send for it, fathers and mothers, for your own good and for the sake of your children, who are to fill your places when you are called up higher."

The Buffalo Express says: "Whoever buys this book will find it a paying investment."

The Scientific American says: "Books on this subject are usually written by 'cranks,' but this is radically different; it is scientific, sober, clean, and worthy of conscientious consideration by every possible parent, and particularly by the young."

Dr. Dio Lewis of Boston, writes: "I hav read all of your works, and feel I must study this one. Your contributions to sanitary and social science hav all been imbued with the spirit of sound conservatism and earnest conscientiousness, all too rare among reformers. Whoever gods over this book will find himself on sacred ground. It is the most valuable of your many valuable books."

Prof. N. S. Townsend, of Ohio University, writes: "I am greatly pleased with this work. I hav loaned it to some of my pupils, who express delight with it. I hope every thoughtful young man and woman will read it."

Notes and Clippings.

PROF. ROBINSON, of Brown University, says that increasing skepticism is decreasing church attendance.

A WINSTED, Conn., man says that "whist-playing is just now claiming more attention than the prayer-meeting by those who profess to be followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene."

FORTY thousand acres of land in Arkansas hav been secured for an Italian colony. The immigrants are to come from the Tyrol principallv, and will be agriculturists. About a thousand Italians hav already settled in that region.

A CHARGE of immorality against the Rev. Prince Wright was before the Chillicothe, Mo., Methodist Conference the other day. The charge was sustained. In spite of a whipping at the hands of a mob, in 1879, he had not reformed.

THE Rev. Dr. Fowler of the Methodist church is a firm believer in the old-fashioned kind of hell. In a recent speech he said he believed that more men from the Methodist church would go to hell for the sin of covetousness than for all other sins put together. Right you are, doctor, if you except seduction, and prove your hell!

GEO. MILN'S lectures in Chicago crowd the largest theater on Sundays, and he is about organizing a congregation from this numerous following. About half the membership of Unity Universalist church, of which he was pastor for a few months after his withdrawal from Congregationalism, are counted on to stand by him.

THE Rev. Dr. Willits lectured to a Cincinnati audience of unbelievers on a Sunday afternoon, on the subject of "Sunshine." The question whether he desecrated the Christian Sabbath has been raised by several ministers, and may come before a church tribunal for settlement, inasmuch as he announces that he will repeat the act.

GERMANS and English swear by God, the Latin races by the Virgin, Danes by the devil. For the Swede one devil is not enough. "A thousand devils take me," is his usual oath, or if the emergency demand, ten thousand. In moments of great excitement he rises to the occasion and swears, "Ten thousand tons of devils take me."

DR. NEWMAN SMYTH, who has been elected to the chair of Christian theology in Andover Theological Seminary, an institution regarded as a bulwark of orthodoxy, is an outspoken disbeliever in the doctrin of endless punishment for the wicked. The selection is yet to be confirmed by the Board of Visitors, whose action is awaited with much interest by all concerned.

MR. BARING-GOULD represents the religious condition of Germany as very encouraging. He says that of the 150,000 inhabitants of Hamburg but 3,000 attend worship, and there are only five parish churches. In Berlin there are 600,000 Protestants, but only 11,900 attend church on Sundays. The church attendance in Darmstadt is only three per cent. Throughout Germany only fourteen of one hundred persons attend any kind of religious service.

AN evangelical brother, who criticised Bob Ingersoll to a small audience while Bob was addressing a large one, found fault with the Infidel orator for saying that Christianity sends the victim of a murderer to hell while giving the murderer a chance to invite people to join him in heaven. "Let me ask Colonel Ingersoll," he demands, "how he knows the victim goes to hell?" In this Mr. Germond is too "fresh." Bob doesn't know anything of the kind, and does not pretend to. If we remember rightly, he does nor believe in hell. It is the men of the Germond stripe who teach that the unregenerate victim of a murder drops into hell, while the slayer, who sings "Jesus, lover of my soul," is wafted from the gallows to the golden streets of the New Jerusalem.—Truth.

NELSON HUTCHINS, of Brockton, Mass., read in his Sunday morning newspaper a prediction of a rain-storm before night. Part of his roof had been removed for repairs, and he immediately set about replacing it. An attempt was made to punish him under an old blue law against Sabbath breaking. But the judge decided that his work was of necessity, and discharged him.

THE Eastern Railway Company of France has just made a new essay in the application of electricity A train equipped with the most recent and improved electrical apparatus proceeded from Paris to Gretz. The carriages were connected by electric communications, the brakes acted by electricity, and all the compartments of the thirteen carriages composing the train were lighted by electric lamps. The results of the experiments were completely satisfactory.

WHATEVER may be the feeling of the women of Vermont regarding their complete enfranchisment, a correspondent of the Boston Advertiser holds that they do not care for the partial right of suffrage which enables them to vote for school commissioners. The statute has been in force two years. At the first election six of all the women in Burlington voted, and at the second only five. In the latter instance, Lucy Stone and other agitators had industriously stumped the state.

ELKANAH P. STEDMAN, of Cincinnati, heard that his daughter had appeared in a charity entertainment at Leominster, Mass., dressed in male costume. In his will, just admitted to probate, is found the following clause: "I hav heretofore intrusted to her a larger share of my property than prudence justified. I shall not leave her anything. I heard she appeared before promiscuous assemblies dressed in men's clothing to excite the admiration of the audience, trying to raise money to pay a church debt. I cannot devote any more to such purposes."

A MINISTER is assigned every year by the Conference to the Methodist church at Troy, Ohio, and is invariably locked out by the trustees. This is the result of an old disagreement, in which the edifice was, by order of a court, left in the trustees' hands. The last appointee, the Rev. Geo. Edgar, announced that he would break the door and hold services. The trustees put on new locks and bars to prevent an entrance. While they were at work the pastor appeared on the scene. An altercation ensued. Trustee James brandished a hatchet aud the clergyman drew a pistol, for which act he was arrested and put under bonds.

TUCKER'S Liberty, a Nihilistic organ, discusses the Chinese question thus: "That able journalist, Prentice Mulford, thus puts the Chinese question in a nutshell: 'John Chinaman must be banished so that William Crœsus shall giv higher wages to Patrick Mahoney. As if William Crœsus could not devise means and had not the power and inclination to squeeze by other methods Patrick Mahoney's day's pay down to just sufficient to keep body and soul together!' There you hav it, Kearneyites, political fuglers, proscriptionists, and deluded working people! There you hav it, and the whole of it! It could not hav been said better. The Chinese question is of no moment as a part of the labor question. Given land and money monopoly, it makes but very little difference whether laborers are few or many, or to what nationality they belong; under such conditions they will not get much more than they must hav. Destroy land and money monopoly, the difference is still as small; for then, no matter how numerous the laborers, each will get his due, that is, the whole of his product. Where there are free land and free money, the supply of work will always exceed the supply of workers, capital will be at the disposal of all men of moderate ability and good credit, and no one will find himself under the necessity of working for wages too small to satisfy him. This the capitalists and their political tools well know, and because they know it they are willing to humor and even foster the delusion of the laborers and grant their short-sighted demand for the exclusion of the Chinese. By this means they hope to postpone the inevitable exposure of their own villainy, obscure the true causes of misery and crime, and prolong for a few more years their opportunities for plunder. But the crash will be only the more terrible when it comes."

THE Christian Home in Brooklyn proves, on thorough investigation, to hav in it so little of the elements of common decency, that there is a loud cry for the abolition of the place. As a house of entertainment it has been the resort of exceedingly low characters. If these had been taken in with a view to reform them, or even to cleanse the dirt them, the neighbors would hav been more leniently disposed toward the institution. But when the same tramps and other unclean persons came time after time, and continued as dirty and depraved as at first, it was evident that the influence of the Home was bad. About one hundred and twenty men were huddled together in this unsavory place in a condition of indecency and disorder which would hardly be expected in any of the islands of the Pacific Ocean. Had this state of affairs been found in some village in Abyssinia, the first movement on the part of the public would hav been to express a desire that missionaries should go there and clean out the place Present indications are that the Brooklyn department of public health will do the missionary work for the benighted Christian concern.

THE number of new journals which hav appeared during the past year, and to which additions are being constantly added, and all warring against the "popular superstition of the day," as they term Christianity, is an intellectual phenomenon of the times. Man, the organ of the National Liberal League, came into the full possession of that great organization on the first of last month. It wars vigorously for a thorough and absolute divorcement of church and state, and shows that the bonds still existing in the United States between them strongly favors Christianity as a semi-state religion. The Agnostic, published at Dallas, Tex., the Kansas Liberal, published at Valley Falls, Kan., This World, of Boston, and the Iconoclast, of Nobles-ville, Ind., are each and all carrying the Liberal crusade into the very heart of the enemy. The latest and among the ablest journals of this type is the Sanborn Cycle, published at Sanborn, Iowa. A new Liberal journal has also made its appearance in Maine, and two in Canada, one in Toronto, and the other in Halifax. These, with such old veterans as the New York TRUTH SEEKER, Boston Investigator, and the Freidenker, of Milwaukee, make a strong array of aggressiv opponents to "the popular superstition."—Jewish Times.

THE Kremlin of Moscow, with its ancient and modern palace and its four cathedrals, has been ruined before now, and the Nihilists would willingly ruin it again, with the czar inside. There is a subterranean passage leading from the heart of the Kremlin to the edge of the river Moskva, intended, apparently, when it was first constructed, for the escape, in case of investment, of a czar surrounded by foreign or domestic enemies. This passage is doubtless well watched. But the eminence on which the Kremlin stands migh be bored in various direction, especially from the side looking upon the river or from the Kremlin gardens at the foot of its steepest slope. The preparations for the coronation will doubtless include a careful inspection of the weak places, in an engineering sense, presented by the ground adjoining the Kremlin and by the sides of the Kremlin itself. Besides taking all kinds of precautions in the personal interest of the czar, the authorities of Moscow will be required, as the day for the great celebration approaches, to see that the streets are properly paved, and to keep them clean; to hav the fronts and roofs of the houses painted; and to catch and confine the beggars who would otherwise annoy distinguished visitors, besides giving the city a discreditable add poverty-stricken look.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Something About Phœnicia.

ON BOARD THE STEAMER MARS,
ON THE MEDITERRANEAN, Dec. 10, 1881.

DEAR FRIENDS: Having now finished with the Land of Yahweh, we will, with your permission, drop the faint attempt at Bible style and resume our normal condition. We were detained one day at Jaffa by the non-arrival of the steamer, and we did not embark till to-day. Jaffa has no harbor, and the sea is often so rough that it is impossible to land or take on passengers. To-day the sea was considered very smooth, but there was still so much swell—so much of the up-and-down motion to the boat which took us out to the steamer—that your humble servant was ten times as seasick while riding less than a mile out to the steamer than he was while crossing the Atlantic. I do not feel quite right yet. It is doubtless very foolish for my stomach to act in that manner, but it is one of its freaks; and, as it usually acquits itself so well, and has for many long years been such a faithful friend, and performed so much valuable service, I do not feel like being too censorious with it because it acts a little foolish now and then; though I must say that mine was the only stomach in the company that seemed so disturbed.

Before leaving this coast it will be proper to have a little to say about ancient Phœnicia, which once was a populous, wealthy, and active little country, lying along on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean. It would not be treating it with due respect to pass it in silence because it has ceased to be a nation, and its glory is all departed. So here goes.

The name of Phœnicia, or Phœnice, was derived from the Greek word Phœnix, who, they claimed, was its second king. The Hebrews pretended that it was a translation of the word Edom, the Edomites having fled to that country in the days of David. Like many other Hebrew claims, however, this was unquestionably false, for there are the best of reasons for believing the Phœnicians an older people, and having existed a long time before David. Sanchoniathon, who inquired into their antiquity, traced their history from what he regarded as the beginning of the world. Its people seemed to have mixed in early times considerably with the Canaanites, who were their near neighbors. Their language had an alphabet, and is perhaps the oldest alphabetical language in the world. There was not a little resemblance between it and the Hebrew.

They were famous for their fine arts, sciences, and manufactures, as well as their knowledge of navigation and great commercial enterprise. Tyre was noted for its purple fabrics and fine linen, while Sidon was celebrated for its manufacture of glass. Their knowledge of the ocean and their commercial enterprise induced them to convey their merchandise to all known countries, and they presented the most marked instance in ancient history of the great prosperity of a small nation from its commerce and peaceful system of colonization.

According to Sanchoniathon, the first man and woman in Phœnicia were Protogonus and Æon, both begotten of Colpias by his wife Baau. Of Æon it is said she was the first to discover the mode of taking food from trees, though it does not appear that the food or fruit was forbidden. The children of the first pair were called Genus and Genea, who adored the sun under the name of Baal or Baal Samen; they named their children Phos, Phur, and Phlox—that is, light, fire, and flame. The next generation were giants, and lived on the mountains and high grounds. The women were of loose morals and did not insist upon the marriage ceremony.

In the fifth generation Hypsuranus was born, who made a raft of plows and started with it out upon the sea, while his brother Usoüs made the original boat from the trunk of a tree. This was the beginning of the art of navigation, which grew rapidly with them, and by the twelfth generation a complete ship was perfected; this was in the time of the Cabiri, the children of Sydyk. They also had hunters, fishermen, iron-workers, brick-makers, builders, as well as husbandmen and herdsmen. Their first great farmers or patrons of farmers was King Agrouerus, and those who followed agricultural pursuits took his name, which rather curiously corresponds with Agoori, a word meaning the same thing in use among the ancient Hindoos.

Mythology is so mixed up with the early history of this people that it is not easy to decide which is myth and which is history. In the tenth generation Uranus, son of Eluin, was born; and Misor in the eleventh, who taught the use of salt, and who was the father of Hermes, who invented letters. Cronus, the son of Uranus, rebelled against his father, drove him out of the kingdom, and usurped the throne. One of the brothers, Dagon, discovered bread-corn; two others were Betylus and Atlas. At the same period lived Pontus and Typhon, with whom Cronus, made war. He also built Byblus, the first city of the country. With his consent his wife Astarte reigned over the whole country; and in his voyages over the world he distributed the countries just as though they belonged to him, giving to his daughter Athena the kingdom of Attica in Greece, and to his friend Taautus, or Hermes, the whole of Egypt. In subsequent centuries these stories were allegorized, and these first kings of Phœnicia came to be gods, which shows how easy it is to get up gods when a little material is on hand which can be utilized for the purpose.

As narrated by the Greeks, Agenor, the son of Neptune, was the first king, and his son Phœnix succeeded him. After a long interval Phalis came to be king; he flourished in the time of the Trojan war, and assisted the Greeks. It seems that the country was not united under one king, but that it was divided into small states, Tyre being the most important, with Sidon, Aradus, etc., as confederates; this at all events was the case a portion of the time.

The width of the country was but about twenty miles, and its length one hundred and twenty, exclusive of the mountains of Lebanon, which for a portion of the time, particularly when Hiram was king, belonged to it. There are some rocky portions on the coast, but the country is chiefly fertile, the plain of Sharon forming a considerable share of its arable land.

While the early history of the country is somewhat dim, there are two features in its very ancient story to which attention is called, the first already mentioned, the legend of first parents of the race in their country; and there is but little doubt that this legend is quite as old as one of the same character of the Hebrews. In fact, several of the old countries, China, Assyria, Egypt, etc., had similar legends of their own. The second is that, notwithstanding the great antiquity of the country, they have no legend with respect to a flood ever submerging the nations of the earth. This omission has disturbed not a little the equanimity of those who attach great importance to Bible tales, and various ingenious expedients have been resorted to to account for the omission. It is very clear that the ancient Phœnicians knew nothing about Noah's flood; it certainly never troubled them. It is not likely that the Hebrews would have known anything about the flood had they not passed half a century of captivity in Babylon, where they first learned the story, took it back to their own country with them, and incorporated it into their sacred writings. That the Babylonians, nearly four thousand years ago, had a legend of such a flood is proved by their cuneiform inscriptions on tablets found among the ruins of ths city some twenty years ago, which are now in the British Museum. It is equally important to remember also that the Egyptians, many centuries more ancient than the Hebrews, had no knowledge or legend of a general flood which drowned the world.

It seems that the Phœnicians took the alphabet of letters to Greece fifteen hundred years before the Christian era, and they also gave the same information to other European nations, among which they established flourishing colonies in very early times. They had colonies on the island of Cyprus, in Italy, on the northern coast of Africa, in Iberia, or Spain, and in Gaul; and northward their trade extended to the North Sea. Their enterprise and learning were as conspicuous as those of the ancient nations. Among the remarkable voyages of its early navigators was one around the continent of Africa, made in the service of Necho II. of Egypt.

The products of all Asia came to them, and they distributed them by their ships and commerce to all the European countries. But they betrayed little thirst for conquest. They rather avoided contests with other powers, preferring the profits arising from their extensive trade to political and military glory. They retired from the Ægean Sea and from Sicily before the Greeks, choosing to risk the opprobrium of weakness and cowardice rather than to entangle themselves in fruitless quarrels, to the detriment of their commercial relations. Probably no nation did greater service in spreading civilization over the world.

In 962 B.C., Ithobal, the chief priest of Astarte, was raised to the throne. He ruled over both Tyre and Sidon. After two other reigns, Pygmalion came into power by causing the death of the husband of his sister Dido, who, to prevent the rapacious brother from seizing her great wealth, emigrated to northern Africa, where she founded the city of Carthage, which became a flourishing city, and prospered for several centuries, being a source of much wealth to the parent country.

In the reign of Elulæus, in 717 B.C., Tyre became involved in a war with the Assyrians. It was besieged, and held out for five years, after which the siege was raised. Nebuchadnezzar again laid siege to the city in 585 B.C., and took it after thirteen years. When foiled in his attempt to possess himself of the great wealth of the Tyrians, he razed their city to the ground. For several years after this Tyre was governed by judges, and when again kings were restored, they were tributary to Assyria, and, after them, to the Persians. The people of Tyre, in the mean time, applied themselves vigorously to the building of a new city in the place of the one destroyed, and the new one enjoyed a prolonged era of peace. In the reign of Azelmic, in 333 B.C., the new city was besieged by Alexander the Great, upon his being refused admittance into it. He took it in seven months, and burnt it to the ground. The inhabitants were either destroyed or enslaved.

Originally Tyre was a double city, of which one part stood on the main-land, and the other on an island. The portion on the main-land was much the older; but the island, before a city was built upon it, as well as afterward, was used as a sanctuary in times of danger. Shalmaneser was an enemy to it, and besieged it a hundred and thirty years before Nebuchadnezzar did the same. The greatest glory attached to it when rebuilt after the destruction by Nebuchadnezzar. Accounts of the new city say its circumference was nineteen miles, and it was protected by double and triple walls, built of large blocks of stone and cemented with plaster. The principal buildings of the city were temples dedicated respectively to Jupiter, Melcarth, or Hercules and Astarte. There were also spacious palaces, lofty towers, and the residences of merchant princes. The decorations of the buildings were said to be gorgeous. Herodotus describes a pillar of emerald shining with great brilliance at night; this was attached to the temple of Melcarth. It is claimed that at that time it was one of the richest cities on the globe.

But Alexander's ambition and desire for revenge were too much for it. The Tyrians had voluntarily offered submission to the hero after his victory at Issus, but he wanted also to take possession of their capital and fleet, which they would not give up. The result was that they lost everything. To reduce it effectually, Alexander converted the island into a peninsula, by joining it to the main-land by a mole, which was afterward so completely covered with sand and mud as to look like a natural isthmus.

After treating Tyre in that most atrocious manner, Alexander exhibited his magnanimity by rebuilding the city, probably that future generations might award him the glory of being its founder. But its career was a brief one; for within eighteen years Tyre was besieged again by Antigonus, who reduced it in fifteen months. From that time till it was taken by the Romans it became the servant of many masters. But through all these vicissitudes of fortune the city maintained its commercial position, though it hardly recovered from the terrible blow which Alexander dealt it. It went down steadily; it lost all that had made it great; its position was no longer of advantage, and it became poor and desolate.

For a long time the site of Tyre was deserted and barren. The ruins furnished the building material for Beyrout and Acre. In fact, little was left save the heavy blocks of marble, granite, and porphyry which could not be removed. Of the island city nothing remains. A modern village has sprung up on the peninsula, which is said to have a population of five thousand, but the ancient glory is no longer there. The city was once famous for its two harbors, one of which was nine hundred by seven hundred feet. This has now almost entirely filled up with sand, and the smaller harbor is no better.

Carthage, the daughter of Tyre, rose to great wealth and magnificence, which doubtless largely contributed to its final fall. It was greatly enriched at first by the downfall of Tyre, as many of the wealthy citizens of the latter town fled to it for safety. For six centuries she enjoyed great trade and wielded rule over northern Africa, Sicily, Spain, etc. Rome had good reason to be jealous of her. For a hundred years a struggle for supremacy continued between them. But the degeneracy from excessive wealth and extravagance was really as great an enemy to Carthage as was the Roman army.

The hights of Bryså were stormed by Scipio Æmilianus in 147 B.C., and Carthage was burned to the ground. Scipio wished to spare the city, but he had imperative orders from Rome to destroy it and its fortresses in such a manner that no trace would remain. In compliance with these orders, all its walls, ramparts, and towers were leveled to the ground, and the remaining edifices were set on fire, and continued to burn for seventeen days. Thus in ancient times proud cities, one after another, were brought to utter ruin. No vestige of Carthage can now be traced.

The antiquity of Sidon is thought to be about equal to that of Tyre, though it never had the same political importance. It was important only in a commercial way, having nearly all the advantages which belonged to Tyre. Sidon still exists in a modern form; it is surrounded on the east by luxuriant orchards and gardens, the soil of which is very fertile. It seems to have been reserved for Phœnicia to pass under the dominion of the sultan of Turkey, under which miserable rule there is little chance for much improvement. With an enterprising people and a liberal, honest government there would still be great hopes for the little land of Phœnicia.

THE LAND OF EGYPT.

Port Said, Sunday, Dec. 11th.—We did not leave opposite Jaffa till eleven o'clock last night, and our condition on the steamer was rendered decidedly unpleasant by the presence of a regiment of Turkish soldiers, who were on the two upper decks as thick as they could be packed; and there they did the munching of their food, looking and smelling in a manner to please neither the eyes nor the nose. They are en route to the vicinity of Mecca, where, probably, the poor sultan feels the need of strengthening his power. The men are fine-looking soldiers, but I do not like them for traveling companions.

Our passage south to this port was very smooth and pleasant; we arrived here to-day at 12:30. The Turks were transferred to a steamer going through the canal and down the Red Sea, and we were transferred to a pretty good hotel on shore. And here we are, sure enough, in the land of Egypt, the land of the Pharaohs, the land of great antiquity, reaching back not less than five thousand years; the land of the pyramids and the obelisks, the land of great achievements, a land of very great civilization, great progress, and a great fall. We are on the continent of Africa, having now visited the four quarters of the globe.

The air is balmy and genial, the sun shines very warm, and a soft, dreamy, luxuriance pervades the atmosphere. Five or six iron steamers are lying at anchor in the commodicus harbor, probably some of them to soon pass through the canal to the Red Sea, for the town stands at the entrance to the great Suez Canal. The country is as flat as Holland, with no eminence or mound in sight. The place is sandy, but by virtue of irrigation there are some very pretty gardens of shrubbery and flowers, and some date-palm trees. To see it you would not question its being Egypt.

Port Said (the latter pronounced as if spelt side) is a new town, dating from the construction of the Suez Canal, some sixteen years ago. It is well laid off in straight, wide streets, and has much the appearance of a flourishing young American town, in great contrast to the miserable town of Palestine and Syria. It boasts twenty thousand inhabitants, many of whom are Greeks and others Europeans, with a filling in of Arabs. The markets and stores are in full blast, though it is Sunday, and the display of fruits and vegetables is quite good.

The water used is from the Nile—Egypt has no other fresh water—brought nearly forty miles in pipes from Ismalia, to which point it is conveyed by canal from the river. A three-days' supply is kept in reserve here. The town was chosen as the head of the canal because of the nearness of deep waters to the shore. The port comprises a quay, a basin of 137 acres, and a dry dock nearly 450 feet in length. The roadstead lies outside these, between two breakwaters, stretching out, one 7,000 and the other 6,000 feet. These moles are 4,800 feet apart at the shore ends, and the ends out in the sea are 2,400 feet apart. The moles are seventeen feet wide at the top and are formed of an artificial concrete composed of dredgings from the canal, lime from France, and salt water. In the town is a beautiful little park, or more properly garden, with a beautiful growth of tropical plants and shrubs. It is named after M. de Lesseps, the able engineer of the canal, who is now thinking of engaging in another still greater enterprise at the American Isthmus of Panama.

This Suez Canal is indeed a great institution; it has done and is doing much, not only for Europe, but for the world. De Lesseps devoted his life to the project of constructing this canal. In 1854 Said Pasha invited him to Egypt and granted certain rights. After incessant labor with governments and commissions and functionaries, and obstacles without number, a company was started in 1858 in which four thousand Frenchmen, headed by Prince Jerome, took shares. In two months the whole capital of 200,000,000 francs was subscribed, and in 1859 the work commenced. On November 18, 1862, Lake Tismah was flooded with the waters of the Mediterranean in the presence of a diplomatic gathering. In August, 1865, communication was opened between the two seas by the passage of boats to Ismalia, and thence by the fresh-water canal to Suez. In the spring of 1869 the canal was opened with great festivities under the auspices of the Empress Eugenia, the emperor of Austria, the crown-prince of Prussia, and many other illustrious guests of the khedive. I have not statistics of a late date to offer you better than the following from the London Globe of a not long ago: "Year by year a vast climatic change is gradually more and more observable in eastern Egypt, or rather, to be more precise, in that belt of land ninety miles long by some thirty broad, which, extending between Suez and Port Said, is directly influenced by the water of the Suez Canal. Before the canal was opened up there was scarcely a blade of grass in the region except on the borders of the Bitter Lakes and around about the oasis of Ismalia. But now the whole face of the ceuntry is becoming changed. Everywhere along the line of the canal herbage of various kinds is springing up. It is of course known to every one that the water of the canal is salt; but as it filtrates through the sand it becomes capable of affording nourishment to vegetation. Then the large influx of water into the desert has affected the atmosphere. The rapid evaporation which ascends through the day descends in thick dews at night. Captains of Suez Canal steamers declare that even in the case of such a rarity as rain the rainfall is every year markedly increasing. The new verdure of portions of the desert itself attracts the clouds according to a well-known natural phenomenon. It is also asserted that more and more each year the climate of the northern portion of the gulf Suez is becoming assimilated to that of the Mediterranean. This is owing to that very steady though gentle current which is known to flow through the canal in the direction of the Red Sea, where, as is natural, evaporation goes on at a greater pace than in the Mediterranean. It has been tested and found true that the water of the canal at the Suez mouth, notwithstanding it has passed through ninety miles of burning desert, is cooler than that of the Red Sea ten miles or so south of Suez. Since the canal was opened there has been threefold more water in the Bitter Lakes."

The number of ships passing through the canal amounts to about 1,800 per year, with an aggregate tonnage of three million tons, and the tolls reach the large figures $6,250,000. The vessels of all nations pass through the canal, but those bearing the English flag are about two-thirds of the whole number. The canal was largely constructed with French capital, but the capitalists of Great Britain have purchased fully two-hundred of the four hundred proprietary shares. The work of digging the canal was principally performed by the native Arabs, and the sand was carried upon the banks in baskets, that being found the cheaper way to move it.

Ismalia, Dec. 12th.—At midnight we took a small canal steamer for this point, a distance of about fifty miles from Port Said. The night was pleasant, though cool. The little cabin below being pretty full, two or three of us mounted to the deck. I prostrated myself upon it, and sought sleep; the air was uncomfortably cold, and I almost suffered with the chilliness; but at length the morning came, and with it the warmth of the sun. The canal is perhaps one hundred and fifty to two hundred feet in width, so that steamers can pass easily. A considerable part of the way salt lakes existed, where there were natural depressions, and large bodies of water are now constant. Near Port Said is Lake Menzaleh, twenty-five miles or more in length, and as we neared Ismalia we entered Lake Ballah, five or six miles long. Our little steamer is perhaps one hundred and fifty feet long, ten or more in width, and runs about seven or eight miles an hour. We arrived here at about 7 this morning, and immediately repaired to a fair French hotel, where we took breakfast and lunch later on. We passed several hours here, waiting for the train for Cairo, the point of destination.

Ismalia is a very pretty town for one surrounded by a desert, and is a regular oasis, its beautiful gardens and little parks in striking contrast with the eternal desert all around. The place has some 6,000 inhabitants of Greeks, French, and Arabs, the latter predominating. They occupy quarters by themselves. The streets are wide and straight, presenting the appearance of a minature city on a grand scale. The khedive has a palace here, but scarcely ever occupies it. It is now empty and going to decay. A few years ago no animal could live here, but now it is a very healthy place. The town has been likened to a hot-house without the glass. All the life in it is exotic. The Nile water is brought here by canal. There are engines for pumping it, affording fountains and cascades. From here the Nile water, as before mentioned, is conveyed to Port Said in pipes.

I walked half a mile or so out into the desert, and as I looked over the apparently boundless waste of sand, I had a realizing sense of what a desert is—thousands upon thousands of acres of sand, nothing but sand. I said, "If one only had the lime and water to match, he could make mortar forever." The sand does not lie as smooth as the sea, but has elevations and depressions, and is more undulating in fact than some prairies. This town was probably once covered with the ocean. I picked up, away out here nearly fifty miles from the sea, numerous sea-shells, which say plainly that at one time the ocean was there.

ON TO CAIRO.

About 12 M. the train was ready for us, and we were ready for the train, and were soon rolling along westward over the desert. It is not much work to grade for a railroad in this country; the sand is about level enough and it is moved easily. But how dreary to travel mile after mile, and hour after hour, midst sand—dry and lifeless sand! We were nearly three hours in reaching Zagazig, a junction station, where we changed cars and road too, taking a branch running south. The town is of considerable size and importance having a population of 40,000. The country around occupying the eastern shoulder of the Nile delta, and watered by the Pelusian branch of that river, is one vast plain of cotton and corn (Indian)—now all harvested—intersected with canals, and interspersed with groves of the accacia, a species of the locust, above which wave the towering date palm-trees. The vicinity about Zagazig produced 250,000 bales of cotton during the war of our rebellion, and Egypt got rich from its culture. Zagazig has some thirty steam-power cleaning and pressing cotton mills, and the town has the appearance of a busy, thrifty place.

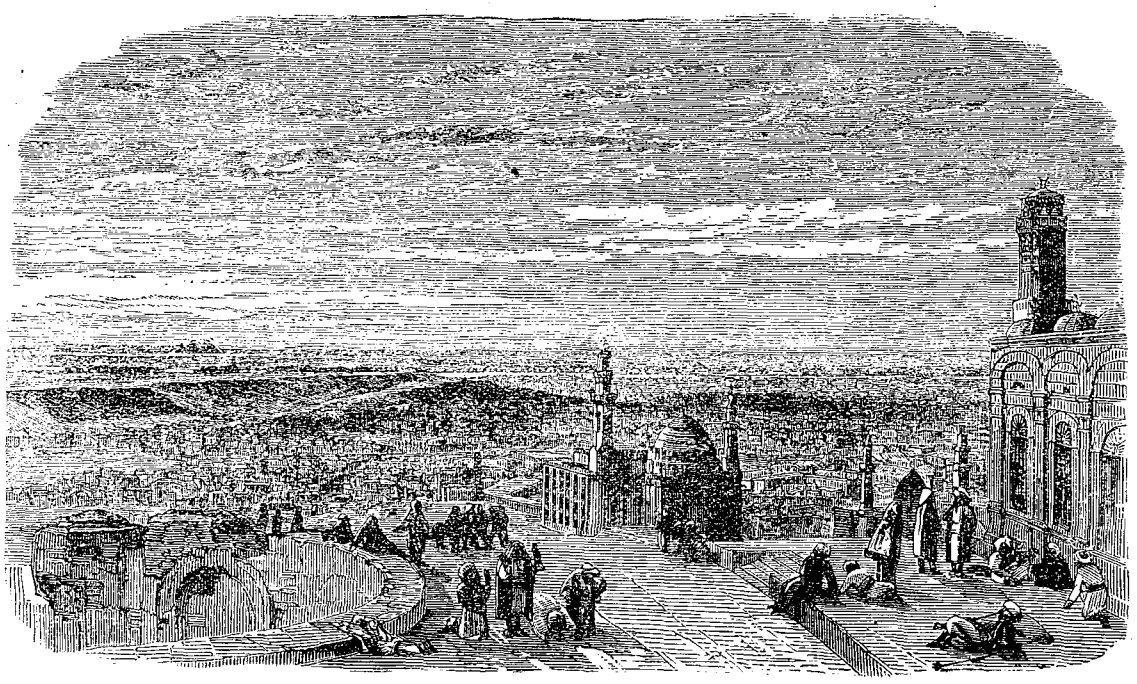
The station is large and commodious, having a dining room and lunch room, where one can get a snack for a dollar. I found oranges cheaper, and bought eight for half a franc. The place is amply supplied with venders of fruit, eatables, and antiquities, and bootblacks, who, like the same characters in all the those Arab towns, annoy strangers nearly to desperation; the same half naked ragamuffins will ask you forty-nine times over to buy what they have to sell, or to have your boots blacked, and it is of no more use to shake your head, or to yell, "NO!" than it would be to wink at a blind horse. They never understand no, and keep on importuning all the same.

We waited at Zagazig about an hour. The town is nearly on the boundary line between the desert and fertility, and from here to Cairo, a distance of nearly fifty miles, the country is most lovely, as level as a floor, the soil as rich as muck, and green with young wheat, barley, clover, beans, lentils, etc., and teeming with luxuriance; while thousands of palm-trees all along, mile after mile, stand nearly a hundred feet high, with their straight, branchless trunks, and a cluster of leaves only at the very top—all giving a peculiar tropical appearance to the landscape. It seemed that we must be in dream-land, the contrast was so great from those eternal rocky hills of Palestine. I thought, If Palistine is God's country, and Egypt the devil's, I prefer the devil's by a large majority; and if the taste of the two parties is to be measured by the two countries, I choose the devil's taste every time.

We were now on the broad delta of the Nile, where it spreads out many miles east and west—eighty-five miles at the widest place—bounded here on both sides by a range of rocks and gravel hills dividing the fertile plain from the Libyan desert on the west, and a part of the Arabian desert on the east. Between these two ranges of arid hills stretches for fifteen hundred miles south, into the very heart of Africa, the wonderful valley of the Nile. This is Egypt, in many respects the most wonderful country that ever existed, of which I propose to talk to you not a little.

Egypt proper extends no further than the First Cataract, 730 miles from the Mediterranean; above that is Nubia, and still further Soudan. Below Cairo the river divides into several branches, with as many mouths, spreading over, as they near the Mediterranean, a breadth of fifty miles or more. There were formerly seven of these branches and mouths, but some of them have become obstructed and closed. The valley of the Nile ranges from two to ten miles in width.

Irrigation has to be resorted to throughout the entire length of the Nile valley, as it seldom rains in this country. In Lower Egypt are numerous canals leading the waters of the Nile in various directions, and from them the water is raised by various expedients and allowed to flow over the land, which is well supplied with ditches and shallow trenches for the purpose. The most usual mode of raising the water is by the sakieh, which is a kind of wide well having an endless chain or rope with earthen pots or jars holding a gallon and a half fastened to it some three feet apart. This chain or rope runs over the drum of a wheel, which is operated by an ox or buffalo, walking around in a circle, drawing a lever after him, and turning the wheel, which raises the buckets; these empty into a reservoir, from which the water is conducted wherever wanted. One sees hundreds of these water-raisers as he passes along, the ox or the buffalo looking the very picture of patience and weariness combined. I will remark that the buffaloes of this eastern world are an entirely different animal from the American bison, being much more like the ox and cow; but they are an ill-looking beast. I thought the camel about the homeliest animal in the world, but the buffalo, with his horns lying back as though they had been stroked that way while in a plastic state, looks far worse.



Other modes of raising water are also resorted to. A very common way is the shadoof, much like an old-fashioned well-sweep in our country; a bucket made of a hoop and a piece of hide, holding five gallons of water or less, is attached by a pole to a sweep, with a weight on the lower end. These are operated by Arab power, and are made to work very lively, raising several thousand bucketfuls of water in a day. Another apparatus is a bucket operated by two men with ropes some ten feet long, on both sides of the well; the men hold the ropes, dipping the bucket into the water below, and by pulling on the ropes bringing it up to the proper level. It is wonderful to see how rapidly they manipulate the affair. This answers only where the water has to be raised but a short distance, say not over six feet. The shadoof raises it ten feet or more, and the sakieh often twenty feet. Water-raising is a big branch of business in this country, but it is indispensable; without water nothing can be grown. The fellows seem to have plenty of time to attend to it, and the weather being constantly good there is no lost time from rain and snow. Here a man can work out of doors every day in the year.

About ten miles south of Zagazig the station Bordein is passed. Near this are the ruins of the ancient city of Bubastis, once the capital of Egypt. It was situated on the west bank of the Pelusian mouth of the Nile, about forty miles north of Memphis. Herodotus visited it, and much admired the temple of the goddess Baste, Pesht, or Pasht, identical with the Artemis or Diana of Greece and Rome. He said, "Other temples may be grander, and may have cost more in the building, but there is none so pleasant to the eye as this of Bubastis." This temple was encircled by the city, which was built upon artificial mounds. The water of the Nile was led by a canal bordered by trees all around the building, and the inclosure was further surrounded by a sculptured wall. Only at one place a narrow passage led under a lofty gateway to the interior. From the explorations of Sir Gardner Wilkinson it appears that the ruins corroborate the statement of Herodotus. The building was of the finest red granite, brought from the Upper Nile, six hundred miles away.

The palmy days of Bubastis were long anterior to the time of Herodotus, when Shishak, having conquered Thebes, made his native town of Bubastis the capital of Egypt. The names of Rameses II., Osorkon I., and Amyræus are found sculptured on the ruins; also the name and emblem of the lion-headed goddess Pasht. The first mention of Bubastis in Egyptian annals is the statement of Manetho that under Boethos, the first king of the second dynasty, a chasm of the earth opened at Bubastis and many perished.

The country, notwithstanding its great fertility, has a shabby, thriftless appearance. The houses of the inhabitants are huts of sun-dried brick, with no windows; the door is a mere hole in the mud wall, and everything about looks slatternly and filthy. Men, cattle, camels, donkeys, pigs, and fowls seem to live together on terms of equality. I noticed men and women husking corn, and, although Egypt is such a fertile land, the corn does not begin to compare with our American corn. One of our big Western ears will weigh as much as four of theirs. We passed several modern towns and stations, with names hard to remember, which I need not mention. They do not look much like American towns.

CAIRO, EGYPT.

CAIRO.

Just before sundown the train rolled up to the Cairo station, and in ten minutes we were in the omnibuses for the hotels. Mr. Bridges and myself decided to stop at Shepheard's hotel, where I had ordered letters to be addressed to me. We had no occasion to regret our choice, for it is about the best hotel I have patronized since leaving home. The building is not tall, being of but two stories, but it is commodious and comfortable. It is built of stone and plastered over. It is a quadrangle, built around a garden, or court, say one hundred and fifty or two hundred feet square, filled with a beautiful growth of palms, banana, orange, and many flowering and other ornamental trees. Immediately before our window is a splendid banyan-tree, with its score of auxiliary trunks. The branches send down shoots, thirty or forty feet high, which take root in the earth and increase rapidly in size, in a few years becoming about as large as the original trunk. Thus a tree with ten or twenty trunks, straight and smooth, fifty feet high, has a peculiar look. In India I presume we shall find them much larger. In front of the hotel are large grounds containing a profusion of beautiful exotic growths, while at the side of the hotel is almost a forest of palms. The whole place seems a veritable Elysium. Cairo is a far prettier town than I expected to find. This portion of it has wide streets and numerous private grounds, replete with all the exotic growths alluded to, but a small portion of which I am able to name. More luxuriance of tropical plants is not to be seen anywhere. Bananas at this time are about half-grown.

One of the most cheering features of our arrival here was the generous supply of letters and papers from home which we found awaiting us. It kept me pretty busy till midnight to read my share and THE TRUTH SEEKERS. It is such a treat to see that paper after a fast of a few weeks that I am unable to see how so many people can get along without it. I presume I went to bed about the happiest man in Cairo.

SEEING THE SIGHTS IN CAIRO.

Tuesday, Dec. 13th.—This day we spent in seeing the sights about the old town of Cairo. Two carriages were chartered, and we "lay back and took it easy." Let me first mention a prominent feature or two of the town. Upon emerging from the hotel you meet about fifty—more or less—of the dusky sons of the desert, who are extremely anxious to serve you and to put a few francs into their own pockets at the same time. Abut a dozen of these irrepressible fellows will run up to you at the first dash; they get right in front of you, and even into your very face, and begin their clatter, which never stops for a moment until you get back into the hotel again. "Mister, you want a donkey? I got very good donkey; carry you very nice. You very nice man; you must have nice donkey." Another, taking you for an Englishman, says: "Mr. Gladstone. you want donkey? Try my donkey, Mr. Gladstone, Me speak Englees. My donkey speak Englees too. He very good donkey—carry you very nice." Another, perceiving you are an American, takes a slightly different course. He says: "Good morning, sir; you want a Yankee Doodle this morning?" (Yankee Doodle is only another name for a donkey.) "I got very nice Yankee Doodle. You like him very much; he carry you every place very nice; try my Yankee Doodle." A third will go on in the same way about his "Flying Dutchman," meaning donkey all the time, and most particularly desirous to handle a few of your francs. It is no sort of use to tell these fellows that you want no donkey; they run on before you rod after rod, getting their faces close to yours, lauding constantly the good qualities of their donkey, and telling you what a good man you are. It is the best way to walk stolidly forward, not appearing to hear them, and taking not the slightest notice of their importunities. After a time they give up the struggle, and leave you to go your way in peace.

But then a new class of pests beset you—the venders of all sorts of wares, particularly bogus antiquities, showing you some manufactured idol, miniature mummy, scarabeus (a charm in the form of a beetle), and various other things of the same species, which they thrust into your face, saying in their most insinuating manner: "You want nice antique? Very good—nice antique; very cheap. Only ten franc." Perhaps you will shake your head. That makes no difference except to make the monger the more determined, and he sticks to you closer than before, repeating the word "antique" in stronger and louder tones to give you the assurance that there can be no doubt about his ware being of great age; and perhaps, as an additional inducement, he will drop to five francs, then to three, then to two, and finally to one, when he will never take any more nor any less. It you take the slightest notice of his wares, you are lost; you cannot get rid of him for half an hour. He will show you one article after another, and every three seconds pronounce the word "antique" with painful shrillness. But all afflictions have an end, and so has this fellow's; you finally tire him out, and he turns back. But two or three others, still more persistent, take his place, and they, in their turn, are succeeded by a tribe of dirty vagabonds crying "Backsheesh, backsheesh." They see at once that you are a stranger, and they try to fulfill the scripture injunction to "take you in." But all these are mere trifles when you get used to them. These people and the flies are just alike—they are in your face every moment, and you can't keep them out. It is hard to decide which are the worse.

But we rode in our carriage in fine style, I assure you. We had our runners before us, and I must tell you a little about them. They are called seis; they are tall, spare young fellows, clad in a long white shirt reaching to the knees, with a belt around the waist; bare-legged, and with a scarf over the shoulders and a cap on the head. They carry a wand like a billiard cue in the hand. A pair of these lithe, straight, agile young fellows run side by side in the middle of the street or road, from five to ten rods ahead of the carriage, and clear the way of all obstructions, compelling carts, donkeys, and pedestrians to give place. They can keep up a steady trot or run for hours ahead of a traveling team. It is strange that they can do this, but, though spare, these sons of the desert are muscular. There is no surplus flesh about them, but what flesh they have is of the useful kind. They look pretty running on in advance, with their graceful gait; and one feels a little bit grander riding in a carriage preceded by such couriers. They are said to fail under such exertion after a few years; they stimulate pretty freely with hackshish, or the Indian hemp, and their career is short. Every person who keeps a pleasure carriage also keeps his brace of seis.

The donkey boys are also an institution here. Every donkey has a boy or young man to go with him; the rider is not expected to carry a whip, or to do anything to make the donkey hasten his gait; the boy follows at the donkey's heels, and does all the beating, and causes the animal to make all the speed desired. It matters not whether the donkey takes his customary fast walk, or a trot, or a gallop, the boy keeps along all the same, close to the heels, and will continue the gait hour after hour, and all day long, though the mercury indicates 130° in the sun. The Arabs can endure a great amount both of heat and continued exertion.

The women of Cairo, or many of them whom I see on the street, wear upright between the eyes what looks like a metal tube, three inches or thereabouts in length, by nearly an inch in diameter, which connects the cloth worn over the head with that covering the lower part of the face, leaving only a strip across the eyes uncovered. I am told it is the married women only who wear these. Some appear to be made of wood or bamboo stalk. They look as though they would be a nuisance, and certainly they are not ornamental. Fashions do not change as often here as in New York, and I presume this queer affair will remain in use many years. Many medals, or metallic pieces looking like coins, are worn in strings around the necks and on the heads of the women.

A class of women are engaged here at gathering up the dung dropped on the street and elsewhere by camels, donkeys, horses, etc., and drying it for fuel to cook by, etc. I often see them dodging around the streets, between the carriages and vehicles, prosecuting their honest line of industry. The same is done all through this eastern world, including the deserts. I sometimes wonder how our American women would like to have to follow such a business as that.

Snake-charmers, jugglers, men with performing monkeys and baboons, are frequently seen on the street and in front of the hotels, where, for moderate compensation, they will amuse those sitting there. The splendid garden or park, called the Esbēkeyeh, standing for the Champs Elysées in Paris, containing some ten acres, well supplied with beautiful trees, rare plants, etc., with fine avenues and cafés, is much resorted to in the evening. Here dancing girls, flower girls, musicians, snake-charmers, and jugglers, find their best patronage, which is kept up till midnight.

Cairo (always pronounced here Kiro) is not all alike. The new part of the town is laid off with wide, straight streets, with a plenty of shade-trees, fine residences, and large and rich private grounds filled with luxuriant vegetation; but the old part of the town is made up of miserable huts and houses of sun-dried brick, the same tumbling down, and for squares together in complete ruins. The new is very nice, but the old is horrible.

At or near the present site of Cairo a city has existed from time immemorial. Babliou, said to have been a colony from Babylon, built on the site of a yet more ancient Latopolis, existed here four hundred years before our era. In the same vicinity history tells of the Egyptian town Loui-Tkeshromi, and at a later date of the Arab towns of El Niaks and El Kuttaëea. When Amer-ebn-el-As, the victorious general of the Caliph Omar, subdued Egypt in 638 he built on the site of his camp a city called Fostàt (meaning a tent). The suburb of old Cairo marks the site of Fostat and the western part of Babliou.

In the tenth century the Fatimites, who had been ruling at Kayrawan in the state now known as Tunis, invaded Egypt, and Djauhar, or Gowher, their general, built a city as a capital for the new dynasty. Five years were required to build it, which was done with due astrological observances, and the city placed ununder the protection of the planet Kahir or Mars. Hence the town was called El Kahera (the victorious), known to Europeans as Cairo.

Saladin, in 1176, replaced the original brick walls of Kaherah with stone ones, considerably extended the city, built the citadel and aqueduct, and permitted Christians to settle in the city. Cairo became simply the capital of a Turkish province. Nothing of particular importance occurred till the capture of the city by the French after the battle of the Pyramids The army of Napoleon entered the city in July 1798. A few months afterward three hundred French were massacred in a revolt. Napoleon suppressed the revolt with characteristic promptness and severity, taking more than tenfold revenge. He caused four thousand of the Arab insurgents to be slain. The French occupancy, however, was of short duration. In the troublous times that followed Mahomed Ali rose to power. Under that prince and his successors Cairo has increased and flourished, and now ranks next to Constantinople, as the second city in the Moslem world. Its population is from 375,000 to 400,000.

It is situated about twenty miles from the delta, on the east bank of the Nile, and while far less an oriental city than Damascus, it is less European than Alexandria; it possesses a character of its own, and at every step one is entertained by the aspect of the streets he passes through and the wonderful medley of human life pouring along the thoroughfares, mostly narrow. Cairo, however, is still the city of Arabian Nights, and all who are well up in those veracious chronicles will find themselves frequently localizing the scenes and individualizing the characters of which Scheherezade chattered so well and to such good purpose.

Marilhat, a charming French writer, gives this glowing description of it: "The city lies before you, like the thousand little turrets of a Gothic edifice, at the foot of a steep, whitish mountain, flanked by a citadel of towers and white domes in the Turkish taste. On one side, toward the mountain, is the desert, in all its aridity and desolation—its loneliness increased by the City of the Tombs, with its streets, and houses, and quarters, and palaces, but no living inhabitants, except reptiles and solitary birds—immense vultures perching in the minarets, like vedettes of this melancholy population. On the other side, toward the Nile, are fields covered with brilliant verdure, and at certain periods with charming pieces of water, the remains of the annual inundation, sparkling like mirrors in the midst of the greenness. Between these two contrasting scenes the city, perfectly in harmony with this singular landscape, an immense assemblage of edifice of flat, untiled roofs, blackened by smoke and covered with dust; here and there a new edifice, white and sparkling, upsprings amids the mass of green houses and the narrow streets, where the dirty, though brilliant and many-hued, crowd are ceaselessly stirring. From the dust and the blue smoke a thousand minarets rise to the free air, like the palm-trees from the gardens, covered with airy Arabic ornaments, and encircled by three galleries. It is a fine spectacle, and one that may well excite a painter's admiration."

Cairo is a walled town, and has seventy-one gates; but it has so increased in size since the wall was built by Saladin that many of the gates are far in the city, and a person visiting the newer portions of the town, which are not within the walls, might not have an idea that the city had walls. The population is made up of Arabs, Copts, Turks, and Levantines, principally Greeks. The Arabs are the descendants of the followers of Amer in 640, or those who crowded into Egypt after the conquest, attracted by the fertility and beauty of the country. To a large extent a rapid fusion took place between the new element and the indigenous population. But the Arab element has maintained its ascendency. The Arabs, by the constant admixture with their Abyssinian slaves, and the adoption of a settled life, have lost most of their primitive characteristics; while the Arabs of Cairo and other towns are a mixed race called fellahs. The nomad Arabs of the wilderness outside the Nile valley, numbering some 400,000, are still true children of the desert. The Copts, from the ancient Coptos, now Kobt, are the descendants and sole representatives of the ancient Egyptians, the builders of the pyramids and the ancient temples. They are Christians, and, of course, a settled hostility exists between them and their Moslem oppressors. They marry only among themselves, and by the constant warfare kept up between the two races, the Copts preserve their race and name intact. They are usually of the mercantile class, clerks in the public offices, etc. The Turks are not numerous in Egypt, and number but about twelve thousand in the entire country. They despise the other elements of the population, by whom they are despised in return. The Levantines, besides being Greeks, are Syrians and Armenians. They are usually merchants and bankers. There is also quite a sprinking of Jews in the city, seven thousand being in the country in all, with somewhat more of Franks and Europeans. These remarks of the population will also apply to the country at large, whose total population is between five and six millions. The Copts claim to number 200,000, but some say this is too much, and that 150,000 will include all.

In doing the sight-seeing of the town about the first thing of course is the mosques, though as for myself, I almost despise them, as I do expensive cathedrals and churches. They seem to me a foolish and useless expenditure of wealth. Like the cathedrals and fine churches, they have an odor of sanctity about them that is absolutely oppressive. Allah, or any other being, has no more use for them than an eagle would have for a pair of patent-leather boots, or a turkey-buzzard for an overcoat. It is the same with all gods—if they are of any account in the world they have no use for cathedrals and churches. The glorious expanse of the universe is large enough for the dwelling-place and resting-place of any number of gods, and it is the hight of absurdity to suppose they can be in the least degree benefited by a pile of brick or stone or wood for a residence! They do not need to be afraid of the weather. Besides, the universe itself is the proper place to worship the higher powers in, and it is only a crude, narrow, and false notion that any god should have a temple, a mosque, a cathedral, or a church to be worshiped in. I sometimes think if there really is a god worth the sum of ten cents, he would, out of sheer disgust, strike every cathedral, every mosque, and every church flat to the earth, and let the material be used for buildings for some practical uses, instead of shops for the propagation of the most absurd and baneful falsehoods.

Still we had to visit the mosques all the same, for the guides always take sight-seers there the very first place.

There are nearly five hundred mosques in Cairo, and I am thankful beyond expression that I am not compelled to visit all of them, for I am almost sure I would rather drown in the Jordan. Half a dozen is a plenty, and before I had even visited that many my disgust was aroused to such a degree that only the motion of a ship in a rough sea would be sufficient to induce vomiting. Thanks to some good power, the mosques of Cairo, or many of them, are crumbling away and tumbling down, and I rejoice it is so, for I have got so that when I see a tall, graceful, worthless minaret, I feel like doing a bit of cursing if there would be the slightest use in it. I grieve that men have not more sense than to spend their labor, time, and wealth for the gods. I am decidedly in favor of letting the gods take care of themselves; if they want houses to dwell in, let them build them themselves. If they possess the hundredth part of the power which their worshipers claim for them, they are quite able to build their own houses and to raise their own fineries, and to attend to their own business generally. It has for thousands of years been a very serious tax upon poor humanity to take care of the gods, to build houses for them, to feed their myriads of priests, and to build houses for them also. Why, it is tremendous to think of! If all the money, all the labor, all the efforts that have been wasted for the gods in the past five thousand years could have been used for the improvement, education, and real benefit for men and women, the world would be vastly better off to-day. This god business is all wrong. My vote is decidedly in favor of men letting the gods go to the wall and to attend to their own little affairs, and I do not care how fully the gods and their worshipers understand this. These remarks may be applied to churches and cathedrals just so far as they seem fitted, as well as to mosques.

Still, as I said, they showed us the mosques all the same; and I must of course tell you something about them. The first was the Mosque el Hakim (I believe "el" means god); it was built by the Fatimite caliph of that name, who asserted a divine mission (these fellows always have "divine missions"). The minarets of this mosque were fortified during the French occupancy. But it is not worth looking at.

The mosque of Sultan Hassan, dating from 1557, is stately and in some respects the finest in the city. Here we of course had to take off our boots and shoes, for the place is too holy for shoe leather. The architecture is graceful, elegant, and grand, and the ornamentation is all that any worshiper of Allah ought to ask for. It cost $1,800 a day for three years to rear this building, and it is stated for a fact that the architect's hands were cut off by the sultan's orders to keep the edifice unique; though how that monstrous cruelty could have that effect I could not understand. This expensive mosque is vaulted, being ninety feet in hight inside. Whether Allah can stand up straight in it I cannot tell you; but I claim to know as much about him as anybody does.

We next drove to the Citadel, or El Kalah, which is an elevation some there hundred feet high, and is like a little walled town inclosed by a larger one. It is said to occupy the site of the acropolis of ancient Bablioun. It is built on the flank of a hill overlooking the town, though it is now itself commanded by the fort of Mount Mokattam, built by Mahomed Ali, when Khoorshid Pasha held the town against him. There are two entrances to the citadel. One is by the magnificent specimen of Saracenic architecture known as the Bab-el-Azah. This gate is in the form of an elliptical arch, with two enormous brick-work towers, built in alternate bands of red and white. Hence a narrow winding path leads to the highest part of the citadel. In this defile a shocking tragedy was once performed—the slaughter of the Mamelukes—in 1881. Only one escaped, and he by leaping his horse from the terrace on the eastern platform, called La Saut du Mameluke. Here is an account of the horrible affair:

"The beys came mounted on their finest horses, in magnificent uniform, forming the most superb cavalry in the world. After a very flattering reception by the pasha, they were requested to parade in the court of the citadel. They entered the fortifications unsuspectingly; the portcullis fell behind the last of the proud procession. A moment's glance revealed to them their doom. They dashed forward. In vain; before, behind, around them, nothing was visible but black, pitiless walls, and barred windows; the only opening was toward the bright blue sky, and even that was soon darkened by their funeral pile of smoke as volley after volley flashed from a thousand muskets behind the ramparts upon their defenseless and devoted bands. Startling and fearful as was their death, they met it as became their fearless character—some with arms crossed upon their mailed bosoms, and turbaned heads devoutly bowed in prayer; some with flashing swords and fierce curses, alike unavailing against their dastard and ruthless foe. All that chivalrous and splendid throng, save one, sank rapidly beneath the deadly fire into a red and writhing mass—that one was Emir Bey. He spurred his charger over a heap of his slaughtered comrades and sprang upon the battlements. It was a dizzy hight, but in the next moment he was in the air; another, and he was disengaging himself from his crushed and dying horse, amidst a shower of bullets. He escaped, and found shelter in the sanctuary of a mosque and ultimately in the deserts of the Thebaid" (Warburton).

On that occasion four hundred and fifty of the Mamelukes, with their leader, Ibrahim Bey, were killed in the citadel and nearly eight hundred more in the city. I saw the place where Emir Bey leaped down from the dizzy hight on his charger, and judge it to be fully one hundred and fifty feet. It is a marvel that he was not dashed to a jelly; but it was the horse that saved him, that broke the force of the terrible jar, and enabled him to escape.

The citadel is built in three portions, each having its walls and towers. The fortifications were commenced by Saladin in 1166, the materials beings brought from some small demolished pyramids at Gizeh, some eight or ten miles to the southwest. This prince also built a mosque and palace here, which were, however, destroyed by a gunpowder explosion in 1823. New ones were erected by Mahomed Ali. This mosque called by his name was built in 1829, after the Constantinople model; so that, according to the opinion of many, although of very costly materials, it is less interesting than the Saracenic mosques of Cairo. Its ceiling is a vas cupola, surrounded by four demi-cupolas, and four small domes at the corners. There are two elongated minarets, a spacious court, and rich cloister. The whole of the interior is lined with oriental alabaster, except the upper part of the columns, which are painted to imitate alabaster. The decorations of the interior are not in the best taste; the lanterns and lusters have a tawdry effect. But probably it is all the same to Allah.

On the left of the entry a golden grill incloses the tomb of Mahomed Ali, with numerous lamps perpetually burning. In the court there is a pavilion in the gallery facing the Fountain of Ablutions, containing a clock presented to Mahomed Ali by Louise Philippe. From above this pavilion a splendid view of the city and surrounding country is to be had. It has been called the finest view in the world. First there is the extensive city itself, with its innumerable domes and minarets; beyond stretches the verdant delta; on the right are seen the tombs of the murdered Mamelukes, and a few miles to the west the obelisk of Helopolis, claimed to be the oldest obelisk in the world; on the left are Old Cairo, and the green-looking island Roda, more domes, minarets, and palaces, the grand aqueduct, and the glorious river Nile stretching away north and away south like a bright thread of silver; and beyond the river and near the Libyan mountains on the west stand the grand and almost eternal pyramids of Gizeh and Sakarah and the great desert of Libya. Turning to the south, Mount Mokattam is seen, with its rugged steeps, its quarries, and its ruins. No, there is not in the whole world another view where such grand works of ancient days with the beauties of natural scenery are so charmingly combined.

From this we descended to a subterranean curiosity in the citadel. It is called Joseph's Well. It is a square shaft, laid with masonry, fifteen feet in diameter and two hundred and ninety feet in depth, descending to the level of the Nile, thus affording always an abundant supply of water. A long, winding staircase leads to the bottom, where the donkeys are at work raising the water to the top by means of an endless chain and buckets attached to it. This work was constructed by Saladin for the purpose of providing the citadel with water. But the pious liars make the silly dupes believe that it was built by Joseph the son of Jacob, whom his brethren sold into Egypt, where he became the greatest man in the nation. It is marvelous how easy it is for religious people to get up lies; the conviction often presents itself that religion and lies go hand in hand. Just below the citadel is a miserable looking old house, which is piously asserted to be the very place where the Virgin Mary took refuge at the time Joseph and herself made a forced march from Bethlehem, on account of the penchant which Herod suddenly took to kill off twenty thousand new-born infants. Why it was that Jesus, or his daddy (though, by the bye, he was his own daddy), did not have prescience enough to see Herod's bloody game a day or two before the slaughtering was performed, and just turn off his wind, and thus save the little innocents; and also the Virgin, who had not yet got strong enough to leave her bed to make such a wearisome journey, is hard to be explained except by the priests and monks who knew all about God's purposes, plans, and projects. I refer you to them. It is my opinion, however, that if Luke, or the man who wrote in his name, could be consulted about this Egypt journey of Joseph and the Virgin, he would pronounce it a falsehood. In fact, he would have to do so or confess himself a liar, for at the very time when Matthew said the little family were off here in Egypt, he (Luke) insists they were quietly taking a rest away up in Nazareth. I don't believe that the Virgin ever saw Egypt, nor do I believe that either of the Josephs saw it. I am getting to be a poor hand at believing lies, no matter how pious they are, or how strongly the priests swear that they are truths.

There are more mosques to be described, but please excuse me. Let them pass, do. I no not wish to enter another mosque in the course of my life, and I also do not wish to describe any more of them. The best you can make of them is that they are great gilded, hollow shells of miserable pretenses, absurdities, and lies. If they could all be wiped out within the next sixty minutes the loss to the world would be extremely light.

We were later driven through a series of narrow, crooked, dirty streets to the tombs of the Mamelukes, who were so basely murdered. They occupy not a little space. Some of them are in an extensive building for the purpose, many of which are rich with gilding and gewgaws to show respect for departed worth. I am glad to be able to think that those brave, ill-used fellows are now very quiet and that nothing is disturbing their serenity and tranquillity.

The day was finished up by taking a ride to the bazars and looking around among them for a couple of hours, some making such purchases of oriental curiosities as their taste and their purse dictated. Among other things, I bought a Turkish fez to wear in my office when I get home again, and possibly I may conclude to turn Turk.

THE PYRAMIDS.

Wednesday, Dec. 14th.—This I count one of the grandest days of my life—a visit to the pyramids. Two carriages were chartered for the purpose, and a drive of ninety minutes over a beautiful road, through long, straight avenues of the beautiful accacia-tree, with a profusion of palm-trees in various directions, brought us to the foot of the pyramid of Gizeh, the largest of many brethren, and the grandest monument of human toil ever constructed. The route is through the new and beautiful quarter of Cairo called Ismaileeyah, to the splendid bridge over the Nile, called by the Arab name Kasr-el-Nil. I felt no small degree of reverence, while crossing the Nile, for the grand old river, the grandest and most extraordinary river in the world. Its length is nearly five thousand miles, its sources being away up beyond the equator in Africa, some of which have never yet been traced. It is the only river in the world that flows so long a distance from the south to the north, the only one that for 1,350 miles has no accessory—no tributary emptying into it—the only river that is larger fifteen hundred miles from its mouth than at its mouth. The thousands of places where water is taken from it, and the great evaporation without any additions, of course diminish its volume not a little. Still it is a large river here, having an average width of two thousand feet, and an average current of three miles an hour. It is nearly as large as the grand Mississippi itself, and considerably longer—as long as the Missouri and Mississippi combined. The water is also about as turbid as the same rivers. Probably in July and August, when it overflows the country, it is considerably more turbid than now.

This is the immortal stream which for not less than a hundred thousand years has been bearing from the mountains of central Africa the mud and alluvial deposit of which the land of Egypt is composed. It has been the source of life and prosperity in this remarkable country, and it is not strange that the ancients revered it and worshiped it a god. It is a million times more worthy of worship than many of the conceptions which have been bowed down to. Without it Egypt must have ever remained a desolate, uninhabited waste; by it hundreds of millions of human beings have been supplied with life and sustenance. Where is there another of the boasted gods of which the same can be said? But since I have seen it, and looked upon its great volume and great beauty, I am more than ever convinced that Moses never turned it into blood. I will for the present say nothing about his frog feat, his locust exploit, his murrain distemper, his manufacture of lice, his getting up thunder, lightning, and hail, his killing the poor cattle of the country the third time over—most unwarranted cruelty—and all the rest that is claimed he performed. You may believe it all if you like, but I will insist that I do not believe that he ever converted the river Nile into blood. Nor do I believe he could do it if he had both Yahweh and Allah to help him, and all the rest of the gods thrown in. It might be easy enough for some liar a thousand years afterward to say that he did it, but I am firmly convinced in my own mind that he did not. The story says he converted all the water in Egypt into blood, and as the Nile is all the water there is, he had to try his experiment upon that only. No, he never did it, and there is not the slightest merit in believing such absurdities.

The rise of the Nile begins away up in the mountains of Africa, in latitude 5°, in February, at Kartoom in March, at Dongola in May. It commences in Egypt at the end of June and reaches its greatest hight in September, remaining about fifteen days at the average hight of twenty-four feet above low water mark, after which it gradually sub-ides. If the hight of thirty feet is reached great damage is done; if less than eighteen feet is reached famine results in many parts. On the Island of Roda, which we passed, the Nileometer, a stone column, is erected, on which the hight of the river is indicated in times of flood. Thousands of years ago an upright piece, with another piece attached to it horizontally, was used to mark the altitude which the water reached. These were kept standing from year to year, and the people came to entertain great reverence for these Nile crosses. This was more than a thousand years before Christians had the slightest reverence for the same construction or before they existed.

The rising of the Nile must be a grand sight to witness, and were it not in the extremely hot portion of the year, when the mercury often marks 120° in the shade and 180° in the sun, I would like to be here when that natural phenomenon takes place. Day by day and night by-night its turbid tide sweeps onward majestically over the parched sands of the howling desert. Almost hourly may be heard the thud or crash of some high mud-bank, when perhaps a new channel is opened for the life-giving water to rush into the parched, arid desert, and all animated nature in the locality—men, women, children, and buffaloes—gambol in the refreshing waters and rejoice in the overflow. All nature shouts with joy; the thirsty earth laughs with glee; the promise of life appears, where before all was sterility. The sand becomes moistened by the visitation of the fertilizing waters, and hope takes the place of despair, and life takes the place of death.

Immediately after the inundation crops are planted, and in four months or less are harvested. In the summer season artificial irrigation is resorted to, as described, particularly for Indian corn, cotton, doura, onions, henna, sugar-cane, coffee, indigo, and madder. Much fruit is also produced in Egypt. Grapes are abundant, also dates, pomegranates, figs, apricots, peaches, oranges, lemons, citrons, bananas, mulberries, and olives. The mandarin orange is a new variety to me. It is engrafted on pomegranate stock, modifying the flavor, as well as the appearance, and giving the fruit somewhat the flavor of red raspberries.

It is right here, near where we crossed the Nile, that is located the fable about Pharaoh's daughter and her maid finding Moses in the bulrushes, and all that. But since seeing the Nile, with its strong rapid current of four miles an hour, with no bulrushes or anything of the kind growing in it (and which probably never did grow there), I realize more than ever the improbability, the utter absurdity, of the old fable. It is not probable that the person who wrote the tale ever saw the Nile or Egypt. There is no place along the Nile anywhere in this vicinity, where it would be suitable, or ever was, for princesses to go in bathing, or where a babe could be left to float on the strong current. It would be just as sensible to talk about Queen Victoria and her daughters going bathing in the river Thames in the city of London, or the president's wife or daughters in the Potomac at Washington. If the king of Egypt's daughter wished to take a bath, it is quite likely he had private baths for the purpose, and she surely would not be under the necessity of going into the rapid, dangerous Nile in a public manner. Nor is it very likely that any little Moses would be deposited by its mother in the princess's bathing-place. And more than that, if the Hebrews were slaves and worked for the Egyptians, it would not be likely that the king would wish to kill them off. And the claim that when the Hebrews left the land, they had 600,000 fighting men, probably about the age of Moses, proves that they had not been killed off to an alarming extent. I don't believe that Moses ever floated on the Nile in his little cradle, or that the daughter of the king of Egypt ever went in swimming there and found him and adopted him. It is only an old fable copied from another silly fable still older.

But we must leave Moses and the Nile and hurry on to the pyramids—the grandest work of man. The fine road over which we pass was constructed in 1858 by the khedive for the use of the Prince of Wales and party, who (graciously of course) paid a visit to the pyramids. A fine palace—a summer residence of the khedive—was also passed. By the bye, he is magnificently supplied with palaces, having half a dozen or so in this vicinity. When people who never performed a day's work in their lives are able to build palaces with the money earned by others, they are sometimes strongly disposed in that direction.

Gizeh is the name of the locality where the larger pyramids are located. It was once a fortified place, a busy city, with markets, gay places, and perhaps mosques. But all that glory has departed, and only scattered ruins tell of former populousness and prosperity. There is, however, one establishment here worthy of mention—an egg-hatching institution. It appears that the hens of Egypt, unlike their sisters in nearly all other parts of the world, don't like to sit—had rather not attend to the tedious process of hatching (it is a dull, montonous sort of a job, it is true), and so artificial hatching has to be resorted to, hence, this one. For every two eggs brought, a live chicken is returned. It strikes me as a fortunate circumstance that, though the hens refuse to hatch, they are willing to lay. If they entered into a combination that they would lay no more eggs, I fear the situation would be a trifle embarrassing, for no factory has yet been gotten up that has succeeded in turning out good hens' eggs. The man who accomplishes the feat of making good fresh eggs from some cheap material ought to realize a handsome fortune.

We could see the pyramids, of course, a long way off, and compared with a mountain they did not seem so very large. Even when but a quarter of a mile away, a feeling of disappointment inevitably creeps over the beholder, and he thinks—if he does not speak it—"Why, they do not look so wonderfully large, after all!" It is not until one gets up close to them, stands by their majestic proportions, and casts his eyes up to the summit, that he takes a full realizing sense of their immensity, their grandeur; and then he becomes overwhelmed with wonder that human beings ever piled up such a mass of mason work. In this way the eye travels over all the courses of stone, from the very base to its apex, which appears literally to pierce the blue vault of heaven, for the vast pile is nearly five hundred feet high. Sir Gardner Wilkinson gives the dimensions of the Great Pyramid, or Pyramid of Cheops, as follows: Base-line, formerly 756 feet, at present, 732 feet; perpendicular hight, formerly 480 feet, at present, 460 feet; area, formerly 571,536 square feet, at present, 535,824.

The difference between the former and present size comes from the covering of fine stone having been removed by the vandals, who have committed fearful sacrilege in the whole length of this country.

From Gizeh the road runs straight to the pyramids on a broad, firm embankment, crossing the bright-green cultivated fields. On the right and left the half-naked peasants are seen working with their primitive implements. At length the line of vegetation is passed, and the great desert ocean of sand is reached, by the shores of which, on a rocky plateau of limestone, forty feet above the level of the plain, stand the three great pyramids, several smaller ones, many ancient tombs, and near by the celebrated colossal sphinx.

I feel justified in this connection in making some quotations from Mariette-Bey's work on Egypt, "The Monuments of Upper Egypt," translated by his brother Alphonse Mariette, professor in King's College, London, so far at least as to give the facts with regard to this subject, for there is no better authority on the antiquities of Egypt; no man has devoted more attention to the subject; no man who has studied the subject has possessed greater intelligence or honesty. A Frenchman by birth, he spent some thirty years in this country, exploring and making excavations; and what stands to his credit is the fact that, though in the position he occupied he could have made large sums of money, he died about twelve months ago a poor man. He says: "The admiration in which the pyramids have been held for so many centuries, and which has gained for them a place among the seven wonders of the world, is indeed well deserved. It must be confessed, however, that this admiration is not generally felt when the visitor first reaches the foot of these far-famed monuments. The fact is, the immensity of the surrounding desert and the want of some point of comparison effectually diminish the apparent size of the pyramids, and prevent their being at first sight appreciated. But they soon grow upon one and assume their true proportions. And then one experiences a feeling of amazement at the immensity of those constructions. One sees in them the most lofty, the most durable, the most stupendous monuments under heaven that have ever been erected by the hand of man. The pyramids are already six or seven thousand years old, but there is no reason why one hundred thousand years hence they should not be in the same state as we see them at the present day, provided no ignorant or profane hand be laid against them.

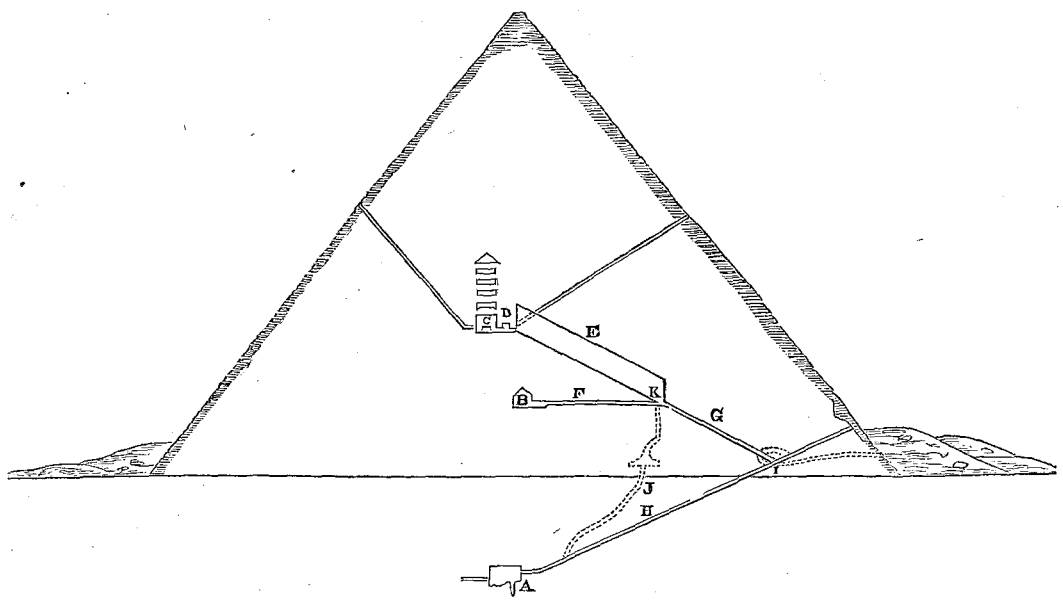
"The three great pyramids are the tombs of Cheops, of Chephren, and of Mycerinus; the smaller ones are the tombs of members of the families of those kings. The Great Pyramid was formerly 146 meters (479 English feet) high, but in its present state it measures only 138 meters (about 453 English feet); its cube is of no less than 2,562,576 meters, and it covers an area of more than eleven English acres. All the stories which in accordance with Herodotus have been told about the hatred these kings had brought upon themselves in consequence of the drudgery inflicted upon the Egyptians who worked in the construction of the pyramids, may now be considered mere idle tales. The contemporaneous monuments—witnesses for more worthy of belief than Herodotus—tell us, in fact, that during their lifetimes, and after their death, Cheops and Chephren, equally with all other kings, were even honored with a special worship. As for Mycerinus, he was so pious a king that he is quoted in the ritual as the author of one of the most renowned works in the religious literature of Egypt.

"As to the special purpose for which the pyramids were intended, it is doing violence to all we know of Egypt, to all that archæology has taught us on the subject of the monumental habits of the country, to imagine for a moment that they could ever have been intended for aught else than tombs. The pyramids are tombs, massive, entire, everywhere hermetically sealed, even in their most carefully constructed passages; without windows, without doors, without external openings of any kind. They are the gigantic and ever impenetrable sepulcher of a mummy, and even had one existed in its interior an accessible passage from whence, as from the bottom of a well, astronomical observations could have been made, that pyramid would not have been in accordance with its purpose. In vain shall it be said that the four sides turned to the different points of the compass denote an astronomical intention; the four sides are thus set because they are dedicated for mythological reasons to the four cardinal points, and in a monument so carefully constructed as a pyramid, a side dedicated to the north, for example, could not by any possibility be turned to any other point but the north: The pyramids, then, are nothing but tombs, and their enormous bulk could not be held as an argument against this theory, since there are some which are scarcely eighteen feet high. Moreover, there does not exist in Egypt a single pyramid that is not the center of a necropolis, a fact which confirms in the most emphatic manner the character of these monuments.



"What remains now of the pyramids is only the nucleus. Originally they were covered with a smooth casing which has entirely disappeared, and they terminated in a sharp point. Being tombs hermetically sealed, each one of the pyramids, or at least each of those which served as the sepulcher of a king, possessed an exterior temple which was built within a few yards of the eastern façade. The king, deified as a sort of incarnation of the divinity, was here worshiped. The great pyramids of Gizeh possess, like all other pyramids, an exterior temple.

"What proves that pyramids were monuments hermetically sealed is that, when Amron wanted to penetrate into the great pyramid, he was only able to succeed by perforating the northern side by force, very nearly in the axis, which caused him accidentally to come upon the ascending passage of the interior. As at that time the outer covering was still perfect, and consequently there was no accumulation of rubbish at its base, it may safely be inferred that the entrance itself was not visible from the outside."

The interior of the Great Pyramid was forcibly opened to view by the Caliph-el-Mamoon in 820. He was the son of the great and brilliant Haroun-el-Raschid, and was incited by the hope of discovering treasure. The passage made by his workmen through the solid masonry, and leading to the true entrance to the pyramid, is now choked up by rubbish. The present entrance is on the north side, forty or fifty feet above the base. It descends by a massive vaulted gallery to a subterranean chamber 347 feet from the entrance, and about ninety feet below the base of the pyramid. This chamber measures forty-six by twenty-seven feet, and is eleven feet high. Mariette-Bey believed that the builders of the pyramid intended the chamber to be mistaken for the principal chamber of the pyramid, and so serve to conceal the real resting-place of the royal mummy.

At rather more than sixty feet from the entrance an upward passage, once carefully closed with an immense block of stone, leads toward the center of the pyramid. At a distance of 125 feet it reaches the Great Gallery. At this point is the opening to what is called the Well, 191 feet deep, communicating with the subterranean chamber already described, which is thought to hav been used as a means of communication with the various parts for the workmen employed in its construction. Before ascending the Great Gallery a horizontal passage is seen, 110 feet in length, leading to a chamber 18x17 feet, and 20 feet high, known as the Queen's chamber. Mariette-Bey supposed, as shown, that the entrance to the Great Gallery was once hermetically sealed; so that if successful in reaching this chamber, explorers might suppose that the whole secret of the pyramid was revealed. But the Great Gallery, 151 feet long, 7 feet wide, and 28 feet high, with a surface of smooth polished stone, leads upward to a vestibule once closed with immense granite portcullises. Beyond this is the King's Chamber, the chief chamber of the pyramid, 34 feet 3 inches long, 17 feet 1 inch wide, and 19 feet 1 inch high, the inner surface of the walls being square hewn stone. This room contains a sarcophagus of red granite, without a lid. The mummy that probably once rested there has been removed.

To giv you a correct idea of these inner passages and chambers, I will send with this a sketch of the same as made by Mariette-Bey, which will be reproduced and appear with this description. A is the subterranean chamber, at present inaccessible; B, the Queen's Chamber; D, a sort of landing intersected by two grooves, into which glided the two massive blocks which were to close to all eternity the entrance to the chamber. E, F, G, and H are the communicating passages. I is the landing-place into which leads the forced passage of the Caliph Amrou. J is the mysterious well which has long put the sagacity of discoverers to a severe test. Such is the interior of the pyramid.

THE PYRAMID OF CHEOPS.

Mariette-Bey was clearly of the opinion that the passages were constructed as they are to elude the search of any explorer, and to mislead them as to the large chamber, and a regal mummy within it. He closes his theory of the matter thus: "During the construction of the pyramid, blocks of granite of the same dimensions as corridor G were deposited in the correllated corridor E. The pyramid being finished, and the mummy laid in its place, these blocks would be allowed to slide by their own weight down to corridor G; the landing-place K would then be blocked up, and the workmen would descend by the well and return to the open air by the corridor H, which in its turn would be obstructed by blocks introduced through the external entrance of the monument. Let us add that experience in excavations authorizes this explanation to a certain extent. Indeed, it is no uncommon thing to find tombs where a false scent has intentionally diverted the attention of the would-be violators of the pit in which the mummy is reposing." It may throw some light upon the subject to state that the ancient inhabitants of Egypt believed they would be immortal so long as their bodies existed. But it is claimed, again, that no religious superstition had any place in the erection of the pyramids, since no religious symbol nor allusion to any god or religious ceremony appears on any part of the structure; though as to what inscriptions were on the outward course of marble—taken away for building purposes to Cairo—of course cannot be known.

To a large extent, this pyramid is a great riddle, and various theories and claims have been set up as to the object of its construction, which are of the most diverse character. One claim is that it is of an astronomical and geometrical character, portraying not only the points the of compass, the length of the axis of the earth, the number of days in the terrestrial year, but the length of the great year of the Pleiades, 25,867 years. Another theory is that the object was to give correct mensuration to the standard of measurements of distance, weight, time, and bulk. Another theory is of a hieroglyphic character. A strong effort has been made to show that the Hebrews were the builders, and the very absurd claim that Joseph had it constructed as a storehouse for the grain of Egypt has been advanced. Another class finds in it a wonderful prophecy respecting Christianity and its continuance in the world. But to my mind, Mariette-Bey's theory that it is the tomb of a king is far the most reasonable. The numerous other pyramids—some seventy in the Nile valley—many of which were clearly for tombs, strengthen the claim. It is quite probable that the builders were scientific men, and acquainted with astronomy, geometry, etc.

Much diversity of opinion also exists as to the age of the structure. Mariette-Bey thinks it between six and seven thousand years old, while others wish to bring it down to less than four thousand years. My confidence in Mariette-Bey's judgment is great; for he spent more time in this country in studying up Egyptian antiquities than any other man, and he seems free from religious prejudices, which sadly warp the minds of many who have written upon the subject, and whose great wish is to make everything bend to the statements made in the Jewish scriptures.

But, after all that can be said upon the subject, the pyramid of Cheops is the grandest structure that has been executed by human hands. It nearly equals the hight of the Palisades on the Hudson, is two hundred feet higher than the dome of the capitol at Washington, and covers four times as much ground. The material of which it was built was brought a distance of nearly fifty miles, and across the Nile. It has stood longer than any other work of man's hands, and is likely to remain a hundred thousand years more. Prof. Denslow speaks of it in this way: "At some very early period, while Jerusalem, Athens, and Rome were still lairs of wolves, and Babylon and Nineveh were jungles, when probably the black race had not retired from the south of Asia, or the Fins and Exquimaux from central Europe, there arose in Egypt a red race of wonderful persistency, despotic determination, and iron-handed will, who were determined to enshrine themselves and their ideas in imperishable stone. They were slave-holders and despots, for no free people would ever have built the monuments of Egypt in any form. Here in this despotism civilization was cradled, and science began. . . Seventy feet below the level of the Nile we find the relics of a people who had not yet obtained metallic implements, but at the rate of the deposit of the Nile they ought to have dwelt there 20,000 years ago. . . . As to the motives, some have guessed that the reason that the pyramids were built was because their builders feared that if the body was suffered to decay the soul would not be immortal. But people who could build the Great Pyramid and inscribe on it no recognition of deity, no prayer, no altar of worship, no sign of a priesthood, no superstition or sacrifice whatever, and nothing but geometric facts and metrological standards, were not thinking of rescuing their souls from any religious terrors, either of punishment or annihilation. Every fact about the pyramids negatives all religious meaning. Was the pyramid built by the Egyptians at all, or by some previous race? Where else in history does the first experiment in any art stand forth as its most perfect achievement, and all that follow exhibit only servile imitation and decline? Yet the Grand Pyramid, so solitary in its wonders, is not only the largest, but to an almost equal certainty, is the very oldest structure ever built by man. What were the ideas that caused it to be built? We don't know. No theory that has been presented concerning them is more than barely plausible. The pyramid, therefore, is good stamping-ground on which, in this age of universal pretense, to learn how to say, 'We don't know, and we can't find out!' But the intelligence required to build it is such that we can easily assure ourselves those who did build it well knew the wondrous 'Why?' The ignorance in this case belongs wholly to the last fifty centuries."

Several of our party made the ascent of the great pyramid, but I did not. While exploring the sacred wonders in the church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem, and when descending the flight of very smooth marble steps leading down into the cavern where the Empress Helena, by digging and blasting, discovered the three true crosses, I slipped on the smooth stone, and fell with my right leg under me in such a manner as to strain my knee, since which time it has not performed duty with quite its usual elasticity. It rather hurts to step up with it on anything more than eight inches high; so that I concluded that stepping up from one layer of rock to another, from two and one-half to four feet in hight, would be tasking it most too severely; though the Arabs called "fellahs," who were around us in great numbers, were quite wliling to pull before and boost behind from step to step. The over-exercise for the lame knee was what I feared. But I watched the others making the ascent and was much interested thereby. Two of the fellahs were ahead, each holding a hand of the climbers, and absolutely pulled them up; while two more follow in the rear, and, boosting vigorously, and in the most approved manner, made the ascent decidedly amusing. Four of the men and two of the women went to the top, and, to look up at them, they appeared like pigmies, the distance is so great. The dusky fellahs urged me strongly to go up; I was not afraid, and would have gone but for the knee.

I made a journey to the interior, and found it all the exercise I wished. Two of the Arabs accompanied me, holding me by the hand on the inclined planes, where the marble was so smooth and steep that I feared a fall, boosting me when boosting was in order, and even taking me on their shoulders and carrying me outright in places where I could not find foothold. They were barefooted, and it would have been better had I also been without shoes, as slipping would be nearly out of the question. It was amusing to hear the palavering fellows talk as we were poking along those dark and silent avenues, where the stillness is almost painful:

"Me takee good care of you;" "No be afraid;" "Lean on me;" "You very good man;" "Me takee you out safe;" "There, put your foot right there;" "Now, get on my back;" "Me carry you good;" "No be afraid;" "Me carry plenty men—old men, too; likee you;" "You thinkee me good man?"

"Oh yes," I answered; "you are first-rate. I know you will see me through all right; but it is terrible warm and close in here, and I cannot see where to put my feet."

"Me hold your feet; there, put your feet right against me;" "How is that?" "You thinkee me good man now?"

I was very complimentary in my praise, and had they been very sensitive they might have thought I was flattering a trifle; but they cared more for the backsheesh than for my praise—"You thinkee I do good by you, you give me something what you like;" "Some mens give much, cause I be very goodee man."

I said I would see about the backsheesh when we got out, as I had about all I wished to attend to for the moment; but probably I should find it in my heart to give them something

"Whatee you givee us, no let the sheik outside see, for he no allow us to ask for backsheesh; you givee us when he not see."

"Oh, yes, we will fix that all right when the time comes; but let us drop the subject now; I wish to attend to this little matter I have in hand; let the backsheesh rest for the present."

"All right, all right, mister; we know you goodee man, and will be good to us, cause we take you so safee."

It took about half an hour to make the tour, and it was so warm, the air so stifling, and the exercise so active, that I perspired very freely, and was glad to see daylight once more, and to breathe the good air of the outside world. One of the natives made a descent into the well-hole for my special benefit, and brought me a piece of granite from the bottom, while the other held a candle for me to look down into the nearly two hundred feet of blackness. They also lit up the king's chamber with a magnesian light; so I had a good view of it and found it all according to the programme. The sarcophagus was there, but no mummy; and the sarcophagus must have been put in while the pyramid was being constructed, as it is too large and too long to be carried through the passages. It took about four francs to settle with my attendants for their efforts and all the extras, and I think they felt as though they had done well, for they persisted that I was "very goodee man."

There appear to be two or more sheiks who have the pyramid under charge, and it is their duty to see that visitors have proper assistance in making the ascent to the top or an ingress into the interior, so there is no lack of guides; and nearly every man of them is so importunate in his demands that their wares should be bought that one has to be extremely good natured not to be vexed with them. They never will let a person have a moment's rest, but they are constantly poking something under your nose, with "antique," "very good," "I sell you cheap," "good antiques," etc.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 8, 1882.

Round the World.

By the time this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches its readers we shall hav mailed the first volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" to the subscribers to the fund. We are glad to announce that the first edition has nearly all been subscribed for, and that we shall hav to issue a second shortly. Since the list of names was stereotyped we hav received many new ones. They all wished to be enrolled, but it was too late for the first edition, and to accommodate them and many others we hav concluded to put them in the second edition of the first volume, and also open a list of subscribers to appear in the second volume. This will giv all an opportunity who may wish it, and also aid in paying expenses. The volumes will be sold separately for $2 per volume, and the three for $5 if taken before the volumes are completed. We would very much like a larger list to greet the traveler with on his return home. The books will be very cheap at $5—much cheaper than any other publisher would get them out.

The "Chronicles" were completed last week, and this week Mr. Bennett commences, in natural style, a description of what he saw in Egypt.

The following is the list of subscribers who hav sent in the $5, and the amount will be acknowledged in the dedication of the second volume. We shall see the list grow with great pleasure:

Mr. Bradlaugh and his Enemies.

In the court of queen's bench on March 30th, Clarke, the plaintiff in the case against Mr. Bradlaugh, applied for judgment against the defendant, notwithstanding Mr. Bradlaugh's appeal to the House of Lords is still pending. Justices Grove and Huddlestone gave judgment against Mr. Bradlaugh for $2,000 in respect to the first occasion in which he voted illegally. The question of costs stands over, pending the result of the appeal to the House of Lords.

The law in England provides that a property test shall be required of every member of Parliament. British subjects not possessing a specified amount of property are ineligible. This first judgment will not bankrupt Mr. Bradlaugh, but there are others to follow, to say nothing of the costs of court. We are unable to state how many times Mr. Bradlaugh voted in the House of Commons, but a fine is attached to each exercise of the right which his constituents conferred upon him, and this may, in the hands of the unscrupulous Clarke, with the aid of every Christian justice in all torydom, prove the effectiv means of preventing Mr. Bradlaugh from occupying his seat. There is no reason for him to hope for a reversal of the decision in the House of Lords. Every pauper lord in Great Britain is his enemy, and would giv his vote eagerly to increase the judgment rather than to reverse it.

The outlook is indeed discouraging. But Mr. Bradlaugh is a man of wonderful resources. He knows his rights. He knows how to enforce them; and if, in the struggle which their enforcement may bring about, Tories and Conservativs find themselvs confronted by armed men coming to arbitrate their claims with the musket; if they see the revolution that freed France from the oppression of fanatics and despots like themselvs repeated in their own country; if they see England a republic and Charles Bradlaugh its president, they will experience what would seem to be but a natural result of their present stupid policy. Stranger things hav happened in the history of nations, and it is not outside the nature of events that they should occur again.

To defeat the ends of justice, and to deprive an honest man of the position which his merits alone hav won for him, the judiciary of England has made itself the ally of rascality, and the legislature has become the paramour of that harlot of harlots—the established church of England. What the final outcome will be, we cannot even surmise; but if the above result is reached, and if the persecutors of Mr. Bradlaugh feel grateful for it, they will certainly hav the satisfaction of thanking no one but themselvs.

That Comstock Lecture.

A remark Mr. Wakeman made in his recent lecture on Comstock has aroused Mr. B. F. Underwood's ire. The sentence to which he takes exception was that "he [Mr. Wakeman] was astounded that such a paper as the Boston Index should repeat these slanders and steadfastly refuse to publish the corrections he had repeatedly sent." Mr Underwood now sends us this card:

OFFICE OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON, March 31, 1882.

SIR: I sent you two weeks ago a brief note in correction of a statement which occurred in a speech you published from Wakeman—a statement which refers to the Index; a statement which is false; a statement which Wakeman even has modified by omission and additions in TRUTH SEEKER report which he has sent to other papers. Did THE TRUTH SEEKER falsely report Wakeman? Do you decline to allow correction in TRUTH SEEKER? B. F. UNDERWOOD.

We did not receive Mr. Underwood's brief note, otherwise we would hav published it. We made the report ourselvs, and made it correctly, as Mr. Wakeman says in another column. The words "repeatedly sent," Mr. Wakeman has since informed us, were intended to refer to the time when F. E. Abbot edited the Index, and the charge that the same paper repeats the slanders is true of it now, as he has conclusivly shown in this number of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Ever since Abbot bolted from the League at Syracuse the Index, whenever it mentioned the League, has slurred and slandered it, and thrown the mud of obscenity upon all its adherents and workers. It takes especial pains to quote approvingly the lies of the church, and the beastly utterances of a Chicago roué. It misrepresents the great body of Liberals, distorting their words, perverting their aims, and slandering their characters. It is in no sense a Liberal paper. It is simply the organ of a coterie of would-be literary men and women who find its columns a vehicle for weak thoughts which would obtain no expression in respectable journals except at the regular rate per inch. The only good that ever comes out of that Nazareth is an accidental contribution. Its home talent (aside from Mr. Underwood, who is only malicious, not weak) is very thin milk and water.

Its course toward the League and Liberals in general is well shown up by Mr. Wakeman. The miserable insinuations it copies about the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER are, owing to their source, unworthy of notice. One noteworthy fact in the matter is that during the absence of Mr. Bennett is the only time they indulge in them. Volumes of commentary could not say more.

We trust Mr. Underwood is satisfied with the correction made this week in THE TRUTH SEEKER. If he is not, some more will be furnished him on application to either Mr. Wakeman or ourselvs.

A Fanciful Explanation.

M. M. Paddock incloses the following from some pious paper, and wants to know if it is true:

The passage from the New Testament, "It is easier for a camel," etc., has perplexed many good men who hav read it literally. In oriental cities there are in the large gates small and very low apertures, called metaphorically "needles' eyes," just as we talk of windows on shipboard as "bull's eyes." These entrances are too narrow for a camel to pass through them in the ordinary manner, or even if loaded. When a loaded camel has to pass through one of these entrances, it kneels down, its load is removed, and then it shuffles through on its knees. "Yesterday," writes Lady Duff Gordon, from Cairo, "I saw a camel go through the eye of a needle, that is, the low, arched door of an inclosure. He must kneel, and bow his head, to creep through; and thus the rich man must humble himself."

This is a fanciful explanation of the difficulty it gets the churches in by shutting out of heaven rich men, who are very much desired by the followers of him who had not where to lay his head. But it is not the correct one. From the context Jesus evidently meant to impress upon his hearers that a rich man could not get to heaven. In some ancient copies the Bible says cable-rope, which is a much better simile than camel, the one now in use in King James's version. There is no respectable authority for the statement.

A Mistaken Superintendent.

TAUNTON, MASS., March 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Is there any place of education that you know of that is supported or founded by Freethinkers? Has any Freethinker left any sum of money for any such purpose? If so, please oblige me by giving name and place. The superintendent of the Episcopal church Sunday-school states that there are no such institutions. You will greatly oblige me by answering the above. This superintendent would not read the "Age of Reason." He said he did not dare to.

Yours respectfully, G. W. PEPPER.

The bequests of Liberals to education and science hav been in greater proportion to their number and means than similar good works on the part of Christians. James Lick, of California, gave very liberally to science. The largest educational institution founded by an Infidel is the Girard College in Philadelphia, for the erection and endowment of which Stephen Girard left two million dollars. The college is for the education of poor orphan children. Girard required that they be instructed in the purest principles of morality, that they be taught benevolence, love of truth, sobriety, and industry. And that they might hav a chance to know the truth in regard to religion, he strictly forbade the entrance to the college or even the grounds of any minister or other ecclesiastic on any pretense whatever.

Girard's fortune at his death was seven and a half millions of dollars. After the specific legacy of two millions of dollars for the erection of the college, he left $140,000 to his relativs, $300,000 to the state of Pennsylvania for internal improvements, $500,000 to Philadelphia to improve its eastern front, $116,000 to public charities, and various annuities and legacies, he left the residue of his estate to the city, mainly for the improvement and maintenance of the college.

Mr. Pepper will please tell this to the superintendent.

A Fraud.

A few weeks ago we spoke a good word for ex-Rev. George B. Clarke, who professed to hav seen the error of his way and renounced Christianity. We did this on the strength of a letter he showed us from George Chainey, and with the same letter he imposed upon the League and various members in this city, borrowing as much money from each as he could. He has been found out now, and Mr. Chainey publishes the following letter in This World. We helped Clark when we thought him honest, and expose him now we know him to be a fraud. Chainey says:

"George B. Clarke, the ex-Unitarian minister, whom I commended in this column some time since, has forfeited all right to my letter of introduction and to the confidence of Liberals at large. He came to me last summer well recommended and entirely destitute. I found him a situation with some friends, and helped him in various ways. As he was anxious to go into the lecture field, and seemed to hav some ability, I sent him out at a cost to myself of thirty dollars, and to a friend who fitted him all through with new clothes of fifty dollars. When he left here his plan was to go West. Instead of doing so, he has been staying in New York. As he wrote me that he was at work for Mr. Leland, I had for some time no suspicion that anything was wrong. I hav just learned that, in the place of going to work like a man, he has been abusing both my friends and my confidence by raising money from our friends on false pretenses. If there is any sin against the Holy Spirit of Humanity that is unpardonable it is ingratitude. I hope that all Liberal papers will copy this, so as to save others from being victimized by so despicable a dead-beat as he has proved himself to be. GEORGE CHAINEY."

Relativ to their engagements in Philadelphia, Mind and Matter says that "Mrs. Colby will lecture morning and evening of each Sunday in April at Academy Hall, corner of Eighth and Spring Garden streets. On next Sunday she will deliver two discourses at that place appropriate to the commemoration of the thirty-fourth anniversary of modern Spiritualism. Those who desire to hear the ablest and most thorough exposition of the most advanced teachings of Spiritualistic thought and experience will do well to lose no convenient opportunity of attending Mrs. Colby's lectures. A Correction.

In giving an answer to J. W. Watkins, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 18th, the types substituted Numbers for Deuteronomy. The godly command is in the thirteenth chapter of the latter book.

WE hav several orders for planchettes on our books, and are sorry to hav to say that Mr. Bliss is so driven with business that he has been unable to manufacture them as fast as he and we would like. As soon as they arrive we shall fill the orders now waiting. In the mean time, if any who hav sent the fifty cents for them wish to take it out in anything else they can do so.

WE hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three representativ Freethinkers of America—Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll. With a frame, which can be purchased at slight expense from any picture-frame maker, they form an ornament that would adorn the walls of any home. The three together cost $2; singly, Paine, $1; Bennett and Ingersoll, 50 cents each.

WE would call attention to the advertisment in another column of a new work which we hav just published—"Deity Analyzed and the Devil's Defense"—by Col. John R. Kelso, of California. It is one of the most thorough treatises on the Bible God and devil ever written. Price, $1.50.

MR. BENNETT'S address is 615 Kearney street, San Francisco, California, care of Byron Adonis.

Some Correspondents' Opinions of Mr. Scholes.

A DOUBTFUL CONVERSION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I want to apologize for the backsliding of William W. Scholes (who was a few years ago one of my correspondents) upon the plea that he was never a real Atheist. True, he fancied himself one, and glibly ran over, parrot-like, phrases that he read in Liberal books and papers and heard from his father and other Infidel friends and relativs, and he "distributed thousands of tracts, etc.," because he thought it bold, brave, and daring to attack the popular mythology. But it is evident he was only born into Infidelity—was an Infidel because his father was, just as thousands are Republican or Democratic for the same reason. He was Infidel from precisely the same causes that millions of young and old are Christians—birth, education, and environment. Why, I know of hundreds of good church-members who could not recite the simple legend of Adam and Eve or tell how it happened that the whale swallowed Jonah. And all over our land young Infidels are growing up in precisely the same ignorance of what they profess to believe. And when one of these comes under the influence of determined devotees, especially if they are attractiv young ladies aided by a Christ-like reverend, and he "keeps no other society," it is no marvel if he slowly and gradually allows his reason to lie dormant and accepts the pretty stories of gods, and ghosts, and angels, and Christs that they feed him upon. But, mark my words, if this young man has a real thinking and reflectiv mind (and it is doubtful if he has) it will be he and not Ingersoll who will "renounce his present belief." Those who hav studied themselvs out of myths and creeds never can by any possibility take them up again, or well expect the Christian of to-day to believe the old legends upon which our Bible legends are founded.

Let me relate a few for the benefit of Bible believers like Mr. Scholes and those nice young ladies. Now, these legends are the originals from which the Bible tales are derived; they are only older or different versions.

"Joshua marched with his army against Jericho, took the city, and slew all the men therein; they were giants, and it took a hundred men to cut off the head of each giant . . Joshua ordered all the plunderof Jericho to be burnt with fire. It was heaped up, but the fire would not consume it, and he then knew that something was wanting, and on inquiry found that Achan had concealed a portion of the booty for his own use; when this was added to the heap the flames leaped up and devoured the whole." Our good friend Mr. Bennett tells us of seeing one of the stones that "would hav cried out" while he was in the Holy Land; but there is a pious legend of David that exceeds this one. "As he passed over a pebbly strip of soil a stone cried to him, 'Pick me up and take me unto thee.' He stooped and picked up the stone and placed it in his pouch; and when he had taken a few paces another stone cried out to him, 'Pick me up and take me unto thee.' He did so, and a third stone cried out in like manner and was taken up by David. The first stone was that wherewith Abraham had driven away Satan when he sought to dissuade the patriarch from offering up his son; the second stone was that on which the foot of Gabriel rested when he opened the fountain in the desert for Hagar and Ishmael; and the third stone was that wherewith Jacob strove against the angel whom his brother Esau had sent against him." With one of these crying stones David slew Goliath, with another he routed the right wing of an army of the Philistines, and with the third he smote the left wing, and all the host fled before him. Perhaps if friend Scholes will order the book of pious legends of true tales concerning the patriarchs and prophets in whom he now so devoutly believes, he and those charming young ladies may find thereiu some new miracles and wonders upon which to feed their hungry credulity. Respectfully, ELMINA.

A FRAUD AND A CRANK.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Hav just been reading while on the train a letter from W. W. Scholes, of Barnesville, O., in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I know this Scholes. He is a fraud of the first water, a "crank," or lunatic, and the next thing you will read of is a murder or some other devilish crime committed by this cuss of cusses under his inspiration. He is a follower of Guiteau, Freeman, and the more ancient Abraham. And there is no doubt in my mind but that that letter was dictated by the Methodist preacher of that place who assisted in his so-called conversion. JOHN RICHARDS.

SMALL GAME.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is an old maxim that we should never "waste ammunition on small game;" but as you hav seen proper to giv Mr. Scholes a hearing in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I do hope you will cultivate a better acquaintance with this man of large belief—this man who believes so much and knows so little; let us hear from the credulous gentleman again before he bursts with holy belief and passes to the sweet "by and by." Now, I believe that Mr. Wm. W. Scholes is a "man of straw;" there is no such man, there never has been such a man, and there never will be such a man. No Atheist, Deist, or Materialist ever yet retrograded to the extent he claims he has; no Infidel ever yet renounced and ignored reason, logic, and common sense. The Christian church has been striving for the last eighteen hundred years to accomplish this one thing, yet they hav failed in every instance. They begged, they hav prayed, they hav threatened, they hav oppressed, they hav imprisoned, they hav tortured, they hav murdered, in order to accomplish the very thing Mr. Scholes says has happened to him. Mr. Scholes may hav once professed to be an Atheist or Freethinker, but that did not make him one, and he never was one. It is utterly impossible for a well-established, well-informed Atheist ever to become a Christian; he could never be one if he tried all his life. He might, through policy, speak dishonestly, and say he was a Christian, but that would not make him one. Reason has never been dethroned until the mind has been wrecked. Reason, once enthroned, holds the fort until the brain is destroyed or injured. Mr. Scholes says he was a subscriber and a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER some four or five years, yet he quit it about three years ago. I do wish you would examin the records and see if he is correct and truthful. Mr. Scholes forgot to giv the name of that gospel pedler in Barnesville who was once an Infidel. I guess it slipped his memory; and I fear he is even mistaken about his own name; I think his real name is Hoax, and whole affair a put-up job of the church. She has lied so long and repeatedly about death-bed recantations that the old hobby is about to fail her, and she now turns her lying interest in another direction, and gets up, in the person of Mr. Scholes, a real, simon-pure proselyte from the Infidel ranks. It is all too thin, my Christian friends; you must bring your man of large belief to the front, and hav him cross examined. The little capital you make out of this falsehood will hardly pay you. But, even admitting that the whole story is true, and Mr. Scholes has really been metamorphosed from a man of sense to a silly fool, still the cause of Freethought loses nothing.

Mr. Bennett as Seen by Indian Eyes.

The Philosophic Inquirer, published in Madras, India, and printed in two tongues—English and another language in characters which we hav never before encountered—in its issue of Feb. 19th, contains the following:

Wednesday in the week has been an important day to us, for on that day noon, our esteemed American brother, and the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, honored our poor self with an interview with us, and greeted us, as a friend and follow-laborer in the field of thought. But better it would be if he did not content himself with mere seeing and conversing with us, at a quarter where he witnessed our status something akin to slavery—for what does dependence upon one for the necessaries of life, mean other than bondage, while the very thought there that "preferment" invariably goes on earth "by letter and affection," mortifies all reasonable hopes and expectations of principles, and seekers after justice and truth. While, however, there has been some consolation to us by our noble brother's converse with us, for the shortest time of an hour on that whole day, our many earnest friends who were day after day anxiously expecting his arrival on the Madras shores from Calcutta, had to be disappointed in their hopes of gaining a sight of this highly cultured and noble being. Mr. Bennett is one of the very best men we hav ever seen, read, or heard of. His graceful looks, his grave, serene forehead, his affectionate talk, his good will to his friends, his inimitable modesty, and his hearty recognition of the services done to him in Bombay by Madame Blavatsky and Col. H. S. Alcott, in the dishonorable and cowardly Joseph Cook's affair, hav been marked by us as characteristics of the good and valuable man, who has proved himself a hero, a martyr of the Freethought cause in America, where the Christian law is as unrighteous and despicable as is now witnessed in the Bradlaugh affair, and where Christian charity and greatness in persecuting and slandering heretics is as rampant as in the boasted "free" England. Mr. Bennett during his conversation with us was seen with a copy of the Philosophic Inquirer in one hand, the other hand almost touching our shoulders as an emblem of his real fraternal love. For Madame Blavatsky and Olcott he had deservedly high regards, and he joyfully told us they were "good people." Mr. Bradlaugh, he remarked, "is a great man and works very hard for the cause." Mr. Bennett gave us a fine photo of his, which brings each moment his valuable person to our affectionate memory, and took leave of us on the evening of the same date; and he had his own reasons to be on board on that day, for unfortunately his vessel was not to stay in Madras the next day. While solely regretting for the loss our city friends had of his sight, and while regretting more particularly on behalf of the Hindoo Freethought Union, which had high hopes of securing the some special services of his fine, eloquent tongue at the Union's hall, we wish our excellent brother Bennett reaches the Atlantic shores safe, in sound and robust health.

Not a False Statement.

AN OPEN LETTER TO B. F. UNDERWOOD, ASSOCIATE EDITOR OF THE "INDEX."

DEAR SIR: Your peremptory letters, printed below, gave me no little pleasure. I was delighted, as a physician would be to discover some returning signs of sensitivness in a comatose patient. It was the first sign since the League Congress of 1878 of a return to moral consciousness, and the possibility of understanding the enormity of the false position ever since taken by you and your Index.

If you can feel for yourself, you may learn to respect the feelings and to state fairly the motivs and purposes of others.

These are your letters:

I.

BOSTON, March 20, 1882.

T. B. WAKEMAN, ESQ., Dear Sir: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 18th, in a report of a speech by you, I find the following:

"Anybody who said he was in favor of obscenity was a liar, and he was astounded that such a paper as the Boston Index should repeat these slanders and steadfastly refuse to publish the corrections he had repeatedly sent."

Will you hav the kindness to inform me whether these words correctly report what you said? If they do, will you mention the number of the Index on which your charge is founded? Has any such statement as you refer to appeared in the Index since I hav been connected with it editorially? Hav you sent any letters of correction to the office since I hav been one of the editors of the Index?

If the words quoted do not report correctly what you said, will you cause a correction of the same to be made in the paper in which they hav been published? I remain, Very truly yours,

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

From the Boston Investigator.

A FALSE STATEMENT.

BOSTON, March 24, 1882

MR. EDITOR: I notice a paragraph in the Investigator this week, stating that you will present Mr. T. B. Wakeman's recent speech in New York in your next issue. As that speech contains a statement in regard to the Index that is incorrect, I will thank you for space in the same number for a denial of the statement. In his speech, as reported in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. Wakeman said he "was astounded that such a paper as the Boston Index should repeat these slanders (that he 'was in favor of obscenity') and steadfastly refuse to publish the corrections he had repeatedly sent."

So far as this statement refers to the Index since I hav been connected with that paper editorially, it is utterly untrue. To the best of my knowledge and belief, nothing during this time has been published in the Index editorially, or from correspondents, justifying Mr. Wakeman's accusation, and I hav never received a letter of correction from him since I hav been on the paper. Further, Mr Potter informs me that he assumed control of the Index in July, 1880, and has received but one letter from Mr. Wakeman in reply to what had appeared in the Index, and that letter he published. What may hav been sent to the Index previous to that date, I cannot state. Mr. Wakeman's statement was evidently intended to reflect upon the Index under its present editorial management, and so far, at least, it is unjust and untrue. Respectfully, B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Certainly, you shall hav all the correction justice will permit, as you request, in THE TRUTH SEEKER. You ask, Did I use the words quoted in your letter? I answer, Not exactly, yet, I think, substantially, but with other words which showed that I was speaking, not of myself personally, but as a member and officer of the National Liberal League. The lecture was not written, and I think that the report in the Investigator givs the passage more correctly thus:

"Anybody who said that he [I] was in favor of obscenity was a liar, and he was astounded that such a paper as the Boston Index should uphold these slanders and steadfastly refuse to publish a correct statement of the motivs and purposes of the League and its officers."

Both reports are condensations. A lecture of over an hour in length was compressed into a column. I never saw the report nor knew it was to be made. The reporter, as usual, caught at the strongest words and phrases, and let the modifying context go, and the exact words cannot now be recalled. But I think the report was substantially correct as given at first. And, what is to your point, I am convinced that I was substantially correct and perfectly justifiable in using the language I did.

You ask me to name the number of the Index upon which the charge is founded. I will; but one number of the Index will not suffice. If I had (as I hav not) a full file of that paper I could make your face burn with shame, unless I am mistaken as to your returning sensitivness.

Let us begin with the few last numbers I hav at hand and work back a little; and if you do not get enough, turn over and read the file of your paper since the year 1877 yourself.

My last lecture was on "Comstockism the Subversion of the Four Cornerstones of American Liberty." Just before its delivery I read the following result of your last attack on the League, the joint work of yourself and your much-admired compeer, Bundy:

1. "Mr. B. F. Underwood, editor of the Index and an able Liberalist lecturer, has been making a successful lecture tour of the West In a letter to the Seymour Times he says: 'The Leagues everywhere, so far as I hav seen, are dead. I hav not seen even one League that pretends to hold meetings regularly or irregularly in all my travels from Boston to Kansas, and I hav met nobody who feels any interest whatever in them. And we hav representativs of over two hundred Leagues.' This is a verification of what we said last fall when the Wakeman-Bennett management gathered its squad of cranks in this city under the pretentious name of the 'National Liberal League Congress,' made up largely of outcasts from decent society, with a small sprinkling of respectable people who allowed their zeal to outrun their discretion and sense of propriety. When the Religio-Philosophical Journal, seconded by the Index, exposed the true character of Bennett, the chief of the gang, it struck the dying knell of the party arrayed in DEFENSE OF OBSCENITY, immorality, and blatant Materialism."

Here I am arrayed personally in defense of obscenity. It is difficult to conceive of a more atrocious mixture of falsehood and libel than the above. Will you seek to escape because this was Bundy's libel—not yours? The receiver is as bad as the thief; the applauder is worse than the libeler. Did you hav sufficient sense of justice to correct, expose, or disown this libel caused by you in your next Index? No! you gave in your next issue your hearty indorsement of the outrage in a return notice in your usual elegant, non-committal, but assassin-like style, thus:

2. "The Religio-Philosophical Journal of Chicago comes to us in a new dress—its 'spring dress,' it says—and it is bright and cheery enough in appearance to belong to that season. Colonel Bundy has our best wishes for the continued success of his journal, which he has always held up to a high moral level, even when by his determination to do so at all hazards he has been misappreciated and maligned by those who should hav thanked him rather for his unselfish and manly course in exposing fraud, dishonesty, and immorality under whatever name they sought to hide."

So you regard the publication of such libels as the above as "always holding a paper up to a high moral level!"

And for fear your readers may forget it you insert the following half false and wholly cowardly innuendo in your next Index by way of a continuous reminder:

3. "Why does the Religio-Philosophical Journal refer to the National Liberal League as an organization arrayed in defense of 'blatant Materialism,' when it is made up in part of Spiritualists, and when among its acknowledged leaders and representativs are men and women like D. M. Bennett, 'Prof.' Toohey, George Lynn, Mrs. Severance, and Mrs. Lake, who are avowed Spiritualists?"

You are the master of innuendo, but it is the weapon of a coward, of the assassin who reaches the heart of his victim by insinuation from a safe ambush.

You dare not say that all the Leagues are dead, because that would be a brazen falsehood, so you imply it thus by innuendo: "In ALL my travels from Boston to Kansas the Leagues everywhere, so far as I hav seen, are dead. I hav met nobody who feels any interest whatever in them. And we hav representativs of over two hundred Leagues!"

No one is so silly as not to see that your conscience was haunted by these Leagues you had outraged. Your wish to hav them out of existence was the father to the thought. So you inspired your "Colonel" Bundy to continue your prophecy, and left it to your and his "always moral level." But the following resolutions show that when you wrote the Leagues were dead you had the best reason to know to the contrary:

4. At the regular meeting of the Chicago Liberal League held March 5th, the following resolution, which is self-explanatory, was unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, Mr. B. F. Underwood, editor of the Index, who has been making a lecture tour of the West, in a letter to the Seymour Times, says: "The Leagues everywhere, so far as I hav seen, are dead. I hav not seen even one League that pretends to hold meetings regularly or irregularly, in all my travels from Boston to Kansas, and I hav met nobody who feels any interest whatever in them."

Resolved, That the members of the Chicago Liberal League deem it their duty to refute the above unwarrantable statement, and further declare that Mr. Underwood (though taking no trouble to ascertain by personal attendance) was, while in this city, informed by members of the League of its existence, regular Sunday evening meetings, and audiences averaging over 300 persons; . . .

Indeed, you must hav known Bundy's whole article to be false and slanderous, yet you deliberately indorsed and approved it. You are the father who begot, and the accomplice after the fact by your adoption of, this libel as your own.

You knew that there was no "Wakeman-Bennett management," who gathered a "squad of cranks" at the last League Congress. Mr. Bennett had no more to do with that congress than you had. He was not there, had no representativ there, not even a reporter. If one of the delegates had not voluntarily furnished his paper with a report it would hav had no report whatever. Mr. Bennett has practically had nothing to do with the League or its management since his trial. It is no "gang" at all, and has no chief or leaders except its chosen officers. It has its organ Man and its management, who never suffer a moment's dictation from Mr. Bennett or any one else. But why follow the low malice of this libel, which is plain in every word? It is enough to make a devil blush. But it is "seconded by the Index," and thus you advertise the League as a "gang," a "party arrayed in DEFENSE OF OBSCENITY, immorality, and blatant Materialism."

Now, I correctly described in my lecture those who sav such things, and those who cause, second, and approve them, and no correction of the language I used is possible. It was indeed far below the truth. No language can describe the ineffable falsehood, treachery, and meanness of that libel, twice gloated over by you, and never corrected. Of course I was astounded and indignant.

But you take especial pains to attract attention to the libel by the allusion to the expression in it that it is arrayed in defense, not only of obscenity and immorality, but of "blatant Materialism." This you pretend to take exception to in your second article above quoted, evidently so that by excepting "Materialism" you may, as you do, by innuendo, include and approve the charge that the League is "a gang," "a party arrayed in defense of obscenity and immorality." The exclusion of one is, under the ordinary rule of interpretation, the inclusion and approval of the other charges. Thus you go out of your way to formally "second" this slander you had not the courage to make directly.

But you evidently thought by your innuendo to add new force to the libel. You thought to insinuate something against the League by associating together a few names out of hundreds, with Mr. Bennett, as Spiritualists and prominent members of the League. But as far as I know of Mr. Bennett, he is a "Materialist" as "crude" and "blatant" as yourself, and neither he nor either of the other persons named, excepting Mr. Lynn and Mrs. Lake, are acknowledged leaders and representativs of the League more than hundreds of others. But why associate these names with Mr. Bennett? Your intention was evidently to cast some slur upon them as Spiritualists, or upon their characters as individuals. Nothing could be meaner on your part. If they are Spiritualists they are certainly to be honored for it if their convictions lead thitherward. As individuals I have never heard their character questioned, as I hav yours. Not one of them has ever been compelled to arbitrate charges of adultery, as you hav done. I assure you that you are the last person in the world who can afford to throw stones or slurs at either of the persons you name. If you had done as much for Liberty or Humanity as they, still your sneers and invidious mention of their names would not cease to be cowardly and atrocious.

But Bundy is in no wise original. He is merely a scavenger for the Index. The Index has since 1877 been saying his worst things for him, and before him. Take, for instance, the following, which is perhaps the original of Bundy's libel, and which justifies every word I said in my lecture:

From the Index of April 28, 1881.

5. The National Liberal League, it is true, has become the "open defender" of the right of the persons mentioned [obscenists] to use the mails for their vile traffic, unhindered by any law, and has thereby brought disgrace upon the Liberal cause For this action the League should not be spared any blows from the aroused conscience of the country.

In the sentence preceding the above, the expression of Scribner's Monthly that "the Liberals are the only professed and open defenders of dirt," is quoted approvingly in the Index, and applied by it to the League! It was simply an echo of the Index in Scribner's.

It has always seemed to me that hanging would be too good for the wretch who wrote the above words: "The National Liberal League, it is true, has become the OPEN DEFENDER of THE RIGHT [of obscenists] to use the mails for their vile traffic, UNHINDERED BY ANY LAW."

More falsehood could not be put in the same number of words. Every League congress has held, and has resolved, just exactly to the contrary, and the League has repeatedly pointed out how the laws should be applied and executed to effectivly, and without danger to liberty or to the rights of the people, put a stop to the whole nuisance.

If the "blows" this wretch invokes for the League could fall in lashes upon his bare back he would only begin to get his deserts. Who can measure the injury that such villainy, repeated almost constantly since 1877 by the Index and its Christian and other echoes, has done to the Liberal cause?

6. Or take the following: In the Index of May 5, 1881, Mr. F. E. Abbot is resuscitated and allowed to giv a long editorial in praise of Anthony Comstock's infamous book-libel on the Liberals and the League. "The positiv duty of the national government to provide every possible protection," etc., without regard to consequences, is dwelt upon. And "the attempts made by 'FREELOVERS' to break down the existing laws" for this purpose are condemned with great gusto.

Comstock's "exposure" of "repealers" is lauded, and the long editorial winds up with an approval of Anthony thus: "I cannot withhold the expression of my own respect for the fundamentally sound, upright, and honest motivs which actuate Mr. Comstock," etc. The Index may well praise Comstock and his book, for he does little more than to repeat its libels and insinuations always using it as his main witness.

7. Or the following: In the Index of July 14, 1881, editorial, Mr. Underwood quotes Abbot without reproof thus:

"The vicious and sensual type of Liberalism contrived most absurdly to identify itself in myriad credulous minds with the love of liberty."

Here I and my co-managers of the League are classed as the "vicious and sensual type of Liberalism!"

And,

"The National Liberal League was suffered to fall into the hands of the Freelove ring."

There never has been any Freelove ring in or about the League in any way whatever.

The charge of "unscrupulous falsification" is there repeated and charged upon the League by the Index.

8. Or this from the Index of August 25, 1881: The call of the League issued by the "venerable President Wright" for its Congress on September 30, 1881, was never printed, but is made the occasion of these words:

"But it is to be regretted that it adopted resolutions at its convention last year which virtually exclude from participation in its proceedings men who, like Hurlbut, Abbot, Ingersoll, and Julian, believe in the total separation of church and state, but are unconvinced of the wisdom of demanding the repeal of all postal laws against the transmission of obscene literature through the mails."

The League has only opposed such United States postal laws as created a censorship and espionage over the mails and made them traps for Comstockism.

9. In the Index of September 8, 1881, Dr. Howard Crosby's societies for the "Prevention of Crime," which involve all of the principle of "state Comstockism," are approved, and the organization in each community of a society for the prevention of crime" is a measure quoted with approval.

What becomes of the separation of church and state under such societies was shown in my lecture.

10. Or this (Index, Oct. 12, 1881): Before the meeting of the last League Congress on September 30, 1881 at Chicago, Mr. Underwood had declared the League a "wreck," and so did all he could to prevent delegates from attending. But they did attend largely. The Index then (October 13th) devoted three articles to destroy its influence, and winds up thus, "B. F. U." writing: "Let nobody suppose that this organization represents the Liberals of the United States. The policy it has adopted and the course it has pursued hav repelled thousands who would hav been glad to work in the organization; and it is now controled wholly by those with whom the repeal of postal laws against obscenity is an object to which every other object is secondary. The sincerity of the leaders of the League is not questioned, and the personal worthiness of many who still cling to it may be fully recognized."

11. Or this (Index of November 24, 1881): "B. F. U." comes out in favor of "Unorganized Liberalism." He had tried the Liberal League and seceded, then the Liberal League of America, then the Secular Association, and the Free Religious Association, and had found it impossible to organize Liberals against liberty. Then, with amusing naivete, he informs Liberals that they do not need organization. Like the tailless fox, he thinks tails are useless because his has been clipped off by the Comstock trap. But the plain object of the article is to prove that Liberal Leagues, which he is careful not to mention, are superfluous and useless.

12. In the Index, Dec. 29, 1881 there is a carefully-guarded article which well illustrates the use of innuendo in implying a reproach it does not express. The New York Independent had confounded the Free Religious Association with the National Liberal League in its usual indiscriminate Christian charges against all Liberals, and which was simply the result of the Index's efforts to foul the Liberal nest in times past.

But the Index jumps up horrified at being confounded with the League, and calls it "calumnious." In its former article of December 15th it declares that the association of its favorits with the League is a "grossly calumnious" charge, and "puts them in the pillory as indecent people," but thus implies that it is all right for the Independent to charge the League with defense of obscenity. It simply drags out its own immaculate skirts, and throws the filth on its League neighbor as a thing all right, of course.

Nay, it goes further, and tries to recant for Mr. Frothingham his former advocacy of liberty, in this amusing style:

"Only one of the persons named was ever prominent in the counsels of the Free Religious Association, and several of them were never members. Mr. Frothingham, of course, was prominent. But of him we are sure it cannot be truly said that he ever 'earnestly urged' the repeal of those laws. There was a time, as the Independent relates, when, impelled by his chivalrous impulses to defend imperiled liberty, he questioned the constitutionality of the laws, and manifested his sympathy for the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, whom he believed to be unjustly arraigned under them. But this was before the corruption of Bennett's character was so thoroughly exposed as it has been since. Mr. Frothingham's eyes were sure to open, as the Independent itself suggests, so that he soon saw that he was wasting his generous chivalry on a worthless cause When the split came in the Liberal League on the repeal or reform of those postal laws, and the League fell into the hands of the repeal party, Mr. Frothingham withdrew his name as a vice-president of the League."

This is a different story from that which Mr. Frothingham told his friends in New York. He said repeatedly that he resigned from the League when and just as he did from the Free Religious Association, and from all other bodies of every kind, and for the same reason, viz., that he had determined to retire from every such membership, and to take a real vacation in Europe.

We hav heard very much of Mr. Frothingham's "recantations" lately, but find that they have little or no foundation. When he wishes to recant his love of liberty we hope that the Index will let him use his own words. Until he does we shall believe him to be the noble man we knew him to be. Nothing but his own words can destroy the ideal he left among us as the champion of liberty, and they will be the saddest words he can ever speak. But the League has always stood invincibly for Purity as well as Liberty, just as Mr. Frothingham has stood, and there it stands to-day, invincible. Any innuendoes or insinuations to the contrary are "calumnious."

The above dozen extracts, all within a year, prove all I said and far more. Need I go further and open up the infamy of the Abbot period? And yet they bring us to the most serious charge against the Index. That is, that it has been since 1878 the most persistent, unscrupulous, and effectiv opponent and traitor to liberty and Liberalism on the American continent.

1. It has steadfastly suppressed the truth, and refused to let its readers know the position of the League, and has kept them in ignorance of the liberty-issues involved. They only know of the League as "a worthless cause," as if it was only concerned about Mr. Bennett and the repeal of some postal law in the interests of obscenity. About the vital and far-reaching importance of the questions involved the ordinary Index reader knows no more than if the only business of life was to discuss transcendentalism and "free religion" in the moon. It has conducted a "conspiracy of silence." Everything relating to the League has been under taboo except when it could do it an injury

The statements formerly sent to it by me were sometimes printed and sometimes not, but always with comments insinuating that we were substantially working for obscenity and immorality. The resolutions of the Congress in 1880 expressly stating the grounds taken by the League on these subjects were sent to the Index and were not printed! Verbal messages met with no better fate, and a personal interview with you in July, 1881, had no better consequences.

2. What has been the result? The church influences hav gone very far toward subverting the foundations of liberty, as stated in my lecture, and the Index has been one of the chief instruments by which they hav succeeded. At Albany, at Washington, in every Comstock lecture and meeting, the Index and its editors are paraded as in favor of Comstock and opposed to Liberty and the League. Its outrageous charges against Libcrals are quoted as evidence that all that the remonstrants want is freedom for obscenity. It is largely by the Index's treason and slanders that the net-work of Comstock and other amateur societies, subversiv of liberty, are spreading over the country, from state to state, placing the laws and their execution in church hands and under church control.

It is by this means that all equality and impartiality in the enforcement of the laws is being lost. It is by this means that the United States postal laws, uuder the Jackson decision, and the discrimination-rates of postage, hav made the post-office a practical censorship, and also a detectiv trap and bureau of Comstock, to get his victims into United States Courts in violation of the Constitution and of republican government.

By this means the trial by jury has become a farce in the United States courts, and largely, also, in the state courts. For the court is placed under cast iron "tests" and rulings which make it decide both law and fact.

This passing of the state and United States laws and the post-offices over to incorporated church coteries for enforcement and their guardianship strikes down in substance all of the rights and liberties of American citizens. My lecture could only enter upon the subject. It is a vast net-work of iniquities, and they all follow from the violation of the fundamental principles of the League.

Well might Mr. Frothingham, in his chivalry, champion the efforts of the League to preserve the sum and substance of our liberties.

But was it not, is it not, a burning shame for the Index to speak of this as "a worthless cause?" How wicked to make its readers believe year after year that Hon. Elizur Wright, James Parton, Courtlandt Palmer, T. C. Leland, George Lynn, Mrs. Lake, and myself, who hav been lately the managers of the League, deserve the "blows of an outraged public conscience," etc.!

What has been the pretext of the Index for such language? Simply because in 1878 it could not force the Liberals to consent to a censorship and an espionage of the mails! But the League has always taken the position that laws at both ends of the mail route could and would protect the mails just as they would an express or ship or canal boat. They saw, just as Daniel Webster said, that a discrimination as to "the meaning of inclosed mailed matter" would be fatal to American liberties. As the Boston Investigator repeats in the same number from which I cut your letter (March 29, 1882), "Such is the true doctrin on this subject—the same doctrin that was maiutained by those eminent men, Henry Clay and John C. Calhoun, during the great Antislavery campaign, when 'incendiary documents' were numerous."

Who ever dared to say that "Calhoun and Clay were in favor of the free circulation of incendiary" documents? Yet they took on that subject exactly the position that the League does as to improper literature now. They would not consent to a censorship within the post-office; neither will the League. But the League has always opposed the use of the mails for improper objects and purposes, and advocated proper laws to prevent it. It has claimed that if there was no improper matter in the states there could be none in the mails, and that punishment at both ends of the route, aud not a censorship within the post-office, was the remedy, just as Clay and Calhoun said. Yet the Index has constantly charged and reiterated that the object of the League was not liberty, but objects too vile to name. What no slave-driver was mean enough to say of Clay or Calhoun it has said of its Liberal brethren. Is it not an unclean bird that fouls its own nest?

3. But it has done still worse. To giv color to this vile slander it has done all it could to dig up records of long past offenses against two or three persons who had some connection with the League, for no good purpose whatever, and only to injure the League. It published, for instance, 5,000 extra copies of Mr. Bennett's old, improper, but repented of, letters, bought up for that purpose, and then tried to pollute by its own vile insinuations every home it could reach with them! It was a clear instance of malice and of useless wickedness. It did only injury—and good to no one. This was in violation of the very Comstock laws the Index was advocating. For this traitorous and cowardly act, while Mr. Bennett was in prison, the editor of the Index deserved the penitentiary far more than Mr. Bennett ever did. Even the Index was compelled to admit that the pamphlet which Mr. Bennett sold, and sold only to vindicate liberty, was not, in fact, obscene, and not within the law at all.

Yet, while he was thus admittedly innocent of the offense charged, the Index dug up these letters and cast them broadcast over the land. Did it reform Mr. Bennett or anybody? Did it do any good to the public? Was it anything but a traitorous malignant act? And you went hundreds of miles out of your way to testify to the genuinne s of those letters! For what good? There are those who believe that, if Mr. Bennett had shown an equal zeal as to the adultery charges against you, you would not now be editor of the Index.

How strange the Index logic! Because Bennett wrote improper letters, therefore the Liberals must give up the defense of the Liberties and hand the post-offices over to Comstock.

It was charged that Mr. Rawson once stole a coat (which he did not) in New Jersey, or kept a housekeeper many years ago in his theological days; therefore let us pass the execution of the laws over to church societies.

There were said to be "Freelovers" in the League; therefore let us abandon it and do nothing to prevent the churches from taking possession of the government.

This stripped of its disguises is the logic of the Index and just what the Index has done. Its pretense of "reform" of those laws has been only a sham and a fraud. Nothing has ever been done by the Index to that end. It has simply gone over to the enemies of liberty. It has done just what Benedict Arnold did after his treason. It has given aid and comfort to the enemies of Liberalism. It has slandered, abused, and beaten down those who have stood for it, and the League its principal defender. It has been put forward by the advocates of bigotry, oppression, and theocracy, as their witness, shield, and defense. It has turned away in scorn from the presidents of the League. It has shaken hands with Comstock. In a word, by its acts, its influence, and its words, it has placed itself on record as the BENEDICT ARNOLD of American Liberalism—the last, but the most venomous and perfidious traitor that ever struck at the heart of Liberty.

This is the only correction, because the only conclusion, that truth will permit, and it remains with you to determin whether it shall continue to be the only one possible in the future. I am,

Yours truly, T. B. WAKEMAN.

New York, March 30, 1882.

Why I Object to the Bible in the Common School.

The children attending the common school are generally young, and their minds are untrained to judge between right and wrong, are very susceptible, are as liable to learn that which is wrong as easily as that which is right; and as they cannot think that they would be sent to school to learn that which is wrong, they consequently think that whatever their teacher says or does is right; and if the teacher reads the Bible and prays in school they, as a matter of course, think it is right without question, as they never hav the other side of the subject brought up before them in school. They are taught that which comes from the Bible is absolute truth, while in reality it is not true and has no foundation in fact.

As this last proposition or assertion will lead to an examination of some of the dogmas taught from the Bible, it will be necessary that I should review the history of the Bible, which I will do briefly.

The Old Testament can only be traced back about four hundred and fifty years before Christ to the time of Ezra after the Babylonish captivity, when he, with his assistant priests, wrote up the traditions of the Jews, and to their writings were added some books of history and some poetical books, which combination made what was to the Jews their Bible; and that, with the New Testament added, makes what is the Bible of the present time.

As the four gospels are the basis of the teachings of the present time, I will only review their history. In the first place the writers of the four gospels are not known, consequently they are anonymous works, and as such are of no authority. The headings of the books, "According to Matthew," "According to Luke," etc., were added later, probably not before the whole collection of gospels was made. "Toward the close of the fourth century no single manuscript was known that comprised the whole New Testament" (American Encyclopedia, Bible). A. J. Davis in "Penetralia," p. 27, S. J. Finney in "Bible," p. 25, and Rev. R. Taylor in "Diegesis," p. 114, say: "Bishop Faustus, an eminent Christian minister of the fourth century, declares that it is certain the New Testament was not written by Christ himself, nor by his apostles, but a long while after them by some unknown persons, who, lest they should not be credited when they wrote of affairs they were little acquainted with, affixed to their works the names of apostles or of such as were supposed to hav been their companions, asserting that what they had written themselvs was written according to those persons to whom they ascribed it." The gospels cannot be traced farther back than to within about one hundred and fifty years after the time that Christ was said to hav been crucified, and they rest on the word of one writer alone, Irenæus, who wrote in the year 182.

The gospels attained their position as canonical books in the New Testament by election in the councils of the Roman Catholic church, being selected from many gospels that were extant in the early days of the church, all of which were considered of authority in those days. The book of Luke is said to hav been elected by one vote majority, and the book of Tobias rejected by three votes. The Bible, as a whole, is a book of the cloisters, none but the priests being allowed to read it until about the year 1543, when, in a quarrel between two men, in which a woman of bad character was involved, the Bible was given to the public, consequently all we know of the Bible is what the priests tell us, as for fifteen hundred years it was in their hands alone. The Bible canon was not settled until the council of Trent in 1545, it having been bandied back and forth between the previous councils, books being accepted and rejected at different times until then, since which time it has come to us as we now find it. The Bible, in being elected into authority as an inspired book, carries with it the characters which it describes, consequently God, Christ, Holy Ghost, heaven, hell, devil, etc., etc., hold their position simply by election by the Roman Catholic church—the same church that elected infallibility to the pope; consequently they stand on the same level and authority as the infallibility of the pope. Not only did the councils pass on these matters in a general way as embodied in the books of the Bible, but some of them specially, viz., the Council of Nice in 325 elected deity to Christ, and the Council of Chalcedon, 451, asserted the doctrin of the union of the divine with the human nature of Christ. The council of Constantinople in 381 passed on the doctrin regarding the Holy Ghost (Zell's Encyclopedia, Œcumenical Councils). Hayden's Dictionary of Dates says of Jesus Christ: "The divinity of Christ was affirmed by the Council of Nice in 325." The council at Lyons in 1274 decreed the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and Son (Romanism As It Is. Barnum, p. 209). Draper in his "Intellectual Development of Europe," p. 222, says, "Thus of the four œcumenical councils, that of Nicea determined the Son to be of the same substance with the Father; that of Constantinople, that the Son and Holy Spirit are equal to the Father; that of Ephesus, that the two natures of Christ make but one person; and that of Chalcedon, that these natures remain two notwithstanding their personal union." It is said that the Old Testament does not teach of future life, but long previous to the time of Christ or the New Testament Plato and the other Grecian philosophers taught the doctrin. M. B. Craven, in his criticism on the "Theological Idea of Deity," p. 47, says, "Even the Christian church, according to Dr. Hagenbach, professor of theology in the University at Basle, did not universally believe in the doctrin of immortality previous to the dawn of the Protestant Reformation." In criticising the different religious views of Plato and Aristotle, he says, "At last the council of Lateran, held A.D. 1513, under Pope Leo X., pronounced the natural immortality of the soul to be an article of faith."

Then, if the Bible and dogmas it contains, and which are taught from it, rest only on their election by the priests of a church, without any proof whatever, and only for the purpose of keeping their ascendancy over the people, I hav a right as an intelligent citizen of the United States to reject it, and protest against its use in the common school where my children attend. It is also contrary to the fundamental doctrin of liberty, of conscience, and of equity that I should be taxed to hav my children taught, as absolute truth, that which I not believe is true, and for which there is no proof. The law does not contemplate the use of public money, raised by a tax, to support any religious teachings, and as every one has a right to their own views of religion, no one has a right to force on them or their children in a public school, supported by public money, raised by taxation, such religious teachings and exercises as are obnoxious to them. L. L. DAWSON.

The Sunday Law in California.

From the San Francisco Argonaut.

The Sunday law agitation has finally crystallized. The Supreme Court has declared it constitutional, the chief of police has directed his officers to enforce it, and the Rev. Otis Gibson has wheeled his powerful mind into line. The Rev. Gibson, it may be well to premise, is the friend of humanity in general, of the Chinese in special, and of O. Gibson, Esq., in particular. He is also the foe of California. The Rev. Gibson is never so happy as when he is posturing as a new Horatius, defending Chinatown against the Etruscan hordes. We barbarians are meeker, however, than were the Etruscans of old, and Horatius Coccles Gibson is safe. His latest move, as we said, is directed toward the enforcement of the Sunday law. At a meeting of the Home Protection Society, held some days ago, the Rev. Gibson cried havoc, and let slip the dogs of war. He remarked that in this Sunday law business it was "about time to stop blowing and do something." No man, whatever may be his views upon the matter, will be inclined to differ with the Rev. Gibson touching the first clause of his proposal. The gentleman then proceeded—doubtless by way of impressing his auditors with the fact that he was a bad man from Bitter Creek—to relate an anecdote concerning his personal bravery when in China. It is the custom of all courageous men to dilate upon their deeds of daring. Napoleon and Wellington were fond of discussing their own coolness in moments of danger. So is the Rev. Gibson. This shows that great minds run in the same channel. The battle which Mr. Gibson fought over again for the delectation of the Home Protection Society was an account of how he forced his way through a band of soldiers in China, and rescued a prisoner. The only weapons the reverend and rash Gibson carried were his faith in God and an umbrella. "With an umbrella," said this muscular Christian, "I nearly ran a soldier through." This curdles one's blood. To "nearly" run a man through would imply that he was partially perforated, imperfectly impaled, slightly skewered, so to speak. This is horrible. The thought of this unhappy man with the Rev. Gibson's umbrella thrust partly through him, appals the stoutest heart. Nothing could add to the deep gloom of the picture unless it would be the opening of the umbrella while in the hapless victim's body. This, fortunately, the Rev. Gibson did not do. He is a brave man, and brave men do not open umbrellas in their foemen's bodies when they are down. Having duly impressed his auditors with a sense of his extreme ferocity, Mr. Gibson resumed his discussion of the Sunday law. "I can make a heap of trouble for the saloon men," he said; "I can bore them and worry them to death." Involuntary applause on the part of his hearers showed that they appreciated Mr. Gibson's powers of boredom. "The Cherokee Indians" continued the orator "tarred-and-feathered and beat the men who broke their laws; that is what I want to see done to the saloon men if they break the Sunday law." We very much fear Mr. Gibson will not hav that pleasure. If the town were populated with Gibsons, he might; unfortunately it is not. There is in the Argonaut office a copy of "The Revised Version of the New Testament of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." Mr. Gibson is ostensibly a follower of the meek and lowly Nazarene. We hav looked to see how closely he follows in his master's footsteps. The savior said: "Ye hav heard that it was said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy; but I say unto you, Love your enemies and pray for them that persecute you. For if ye love them that love you, what reward hav ye? Do not even the publicans the same?" When Mr. Gibson issues his revised version it will probably run on this wise: "Tar-and-feather your enemies, and beat them that persecute you. And if ye break the law in doing so, what mattereth it? Do not even the saloon-keepers the same?"

Dr. Fulton as a Prophet.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Rev. Dr. Fulton says, "If Sindram (the convict) dies in his sins he will go to hell and stay there." When did God, if there is one, reveal to Fulton the secrets of his judgment day? Is the doctor just back from heaven or hell? Has God or the devil taken him into their confidence? The Universalists say, "God is too good to damn any one;" the Catholics, that "there is hope beyond the grave." Which is right, Fulton the Baptist, the Universalists, or the Catholics? All get their information from Jehovah. Can it be possible he is tricking one, or all? Sindram says he "cannot conceive of Fulton's God." Is that any fault of his? Does it not show Jehovah's work a failure? Would not an all-wise, all-just God hav left him in dust instead of giving him life to forever crack and snap in hell? If such is the justice of Fulton's God, who would not prefer the devil? Has not this devil surrendered all claims to every Tombs murderer previous to Sindram? Out of the scores hung there, has not every one of them said from the scaffold, substantially, Meet me in heaven? Dr. Fulton is welcome to his company; I reject it. By the way, I charge that Fulton's heaven was started with a thief, and challenge him to prove the contrary.

PALATKA, FLA., March 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Want of ready cash and the advice of prudent friends has kept me loitering on the way until the eleventh hour is about up, and just now one said to me, "As you hav them (the Round-the-World letters) all in the paper why do you wish the compilation?" Quick and sharp came the answer, I want the book; I would rather hav it in the house than the Bible. I repeat the quotation to you, and herewith inclose $5 to pay for it, and to help the veteran and veritable truth seeker to complete the circuit. Yours, MARY ANN VORE.

CHAMPLIN, MINN., March 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hasten to send you $5 for the books on the Round-the-World trip before the subscription list is closed. But, friend Macdonald, I cannot see a good reason for closing the subscriptions for the books before the completion of the second or third volume. It would be just as well to put our names in the last one as the first; and remember that Mr. Bennett's travels are growing more popular every day, and a little longer time will giv many an opportunity to subscribe that are now most anxious to hav the books, but, perhaps, hav limited means to furnish the cash. What say you? T. KINSER.

NESHANIC, N. J., March 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to bring the editor home. If I am too late, let me know, and I will be at your place soon and take some tracts, etc., and try to convert the heathen that dwell in these parts. I am the only Liberal here, and, of course, am quite a curiosity, and they are very anxious about my future welfare; but I tell them that if I lead a life directly the opposit of the teachings of their old Bible, I am prepared for all the good there is in the next world, providing there is one. I would like the books, if not too late. Some come at the eleventh hour, though I am afraid this is nearer the twelfth.

Yours truly, A. L. GARDNER.

WINNEMUCCA, NEV., March 20, 1882.

ME. EDITOR: I see an article in your paper of the 11th inst. in regard to subscribers to the Round-the-World fund about binding. I would like one set bound in leather, with red edges, and one set in morocco, with gilt edges. That is all I will call on you for out of the $20 I subscribed. I intended to hav subscribed more, but I hav not been able to. My means hav been so tied up the past eight months that I hav not been able to do more.

Please inform me whether the writings of "The Book of Chronicles in the Land of Yahweh," nd the articles by Mr. Bennett entitled, "What I Don't Believe" will be published in book form. [Yes.—ED.] I did not subscribe the $20 for Mr. Bennett to make anything out of selling what I would get, but simply to assist him on his trip, and I intended, as I said before, to hav subscribed more. W. F. STEVENS.

BERLIN, N. J., March 2, 1882.

BRO. EUGENE: I thank you very much for giving my poor thoughts a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER. They may serve to strengthen some weak one and do good, and most sincerely do I thank the kind friends (most of them strangers) who take an interest in our welfare, and for the gifts they hav sent us. It is rather humiliating to be under the necessity of receiving help without rendering compensation, but having been cheated out of the few hundred dollars we had saved for old age, by a blatant Methodist exhorter, we must consent to receive it or else put an end to life, for we will never go to a so-called Christian pauper-house, to be nursed and hav our eyes closed by thieves and harlots, so long as we hav strength to cut the thread that holds us here. We saw enough of that during the ten years that we made regular visits to the sick in an establishment of that kind. Yes. thanks to you all.

JUDGED BY THEIR OWN WORKS AND CREED.

"Lord, visit the widow," prayed old Deacon Shirk,
Then went to the bank with his gold.
"I'll visit the widow," said Infidel Work,
Taking bread, meat, potatoes, and coal.

CHORUS.

So the first became last, for prayer is a shirk,
And the last becomes first, for the gospel means work.

"Lord, visit the sick one," minced grand lady Shirk,
Then called on her fat, lazy priest;
"I'll visit the sick one," said Madam Work,
And then the poor soul had a feast.

CHORUS.

So the first becomes last, for prayer is a shirk,
And the last becomes first, for the gospel means work.

"Lord, visit the prison," prayed old Deacon Shirk,
Then went to a church feast and fray.
"I'll visit the prison," said good Mr. Work,
And stout hearts were melted that day.

CHORUS.

So the first becomes last, for prayer is a shirk,
And the last becomes first, for the gospel means work.

"Lord, keep me unspotted," minced grand Lady Shirk,
In diamonds, and velvets, and lace.
"I'll liv unspotted," said good Madam Work,
As soul-diamonds glowed on her face.

CHORUS.

When the "sheep and the goats" at the judgment appear,
Oh, who will appear on the right?
For the judge will be just in the judgment he givs,
And hypocrits brought to the light.

Yours truly, JEREMIAH HACKER.

BEDFORD STATION, MICH., March 23, 1882.

MR EDITOR: I am glad to learn that the old veteran iconoclast, Jeremiah Hacker, is still alive and battling for the right. I hope those who are blessed with abundance of this world's goods will see that he is made comfortable in his declining years. I was well acquainted with him when he published the Pleasure Boat. In his excursion boat from Portland he frequently stopped with us at Frankfort, Me., a day or two at a time. I was disowned from the society of Friends for reading and circulating his paper. It was called "pernicious" at that time by the Friends. I would be glad to subscribe to a fund for his comfort and happiness, but I am down to "hard pan," not being able to labor or earn much for eight years on account of injuries and sickness. I was burned out last September, which pretty well used me up financially. I hav four volumes of Mr. Hacker's paper which I prize highly. The world moves; let us move with it. F. WINGATE.

March 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for the noble TRUTH SEEKER until July 1st. I hope by that time we may be able to send you an "X" to procure Bro. Bennett's books of travel and some pamphlets to distribute. I would like to scatter twenty copies of the "Age of Reason" in our little town. I consider that the best work I ever read to draw people out of the old ruts in which they hav so long traveled. Of course to persons who hav dared launch out farther in the field of thought and study that work seems quite religious yet. It has done, and is yet doing, a great work. We hav been expecting Bro. Walker for the last week to call on us, but I am afraid he has taken some other route. We shall be really disappointed if he has. We are enjoying an extra Kansas breeze to-day. I don't think I ever saw such a dusty day in my life. If it continues this way long I think we will find other quarters before this time next year. How I long to visit the town of Liberal, Mo. I fancy a perfect paradise there, though I may draw the picture too fine; they may hav to take their bitter with their sweet as they do elsewhere. But I do fancy in such a settlement as that there would be no gossiping, backbiting, etc., but that all would dwell in perfect harmony. Well, I am talking too much, so will close by wishing Bro. Bennet a safe return, and kindest regards for sister Bennett.

As ever for truth, MARY E. R. WILSON.

FORT KEOGH, MON. TER., March 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Our League sends you this day an order for books. Our League is surpassing our most sanguin expectations. We hav labored under great difficulties, yet we can say at least the Liberal League of Fort Keogh is a fixed fact. Our president, C. W. Stephenson, addressed the Land League at Miles City, on the "Wrongs of Ireland." The address was pronounced by all to be a masterly effort. It made us many friends. Mr. Stephenson is truly an able speaker. His command of words is remarkable, as are also his sudden transitions from grave to gay, from lively to severe. He is eloquent, pathetic, and sarcastic. Last night the court-house was crowded to hear him, and he swayed his audience just to suit himself. At one time he would hav them wild with applause, then hissing at the treatment England had given Ireland, and in the very next breath he would convulse them with laughter. He held his audience spell-bound for an hour and a half. We are proud of our president, and I think we hav a right to be, for he organized us and has been the chain sufficient in keeping up our organization, so you can count on us for help in the grand army of liberty.

Yours for the right, JOHN BRIGGS.

GANANOQUE, March 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am a trial subscriber to your TRUTH SEEKER, which I think should be called Truth Finder, for I hav to acknowledge the fact that I hav found more truth in its pages from reading Mr. Bennett's book of Chronicles and the other articles published than is contained in all the so-called holy Bibles ever written by so-called inspired frauds, because it is now clear as the noon-day sun that the Christian Bible is a lie, both historically and scientifically, for it has been on trial, and competent witnesses hav proven that it is a foolish tale and a humbug, and consequently humanity, or at least that portion of it who avail themselvs of the privilege of hearing the evidence, will be rid of the horrible nightmare of an everlasting hell, which was to be the portion of ninety-five per cent. The black-coated, black-hearted priests do not take much stock in your paper, and no doubt will do all they can to frown down all attempts to spoil their easy living, but we Infidels feel it a duty we owe to our fellow-beings to tell them all we know, and make the papers do missionary work, and they generally make a strong impression.

Yours for the truth, I. GRANT.

DALLAS, TEX., March 9, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Perhaps it may interest some of your readers to know how a cowboy could get from under the thumbscrews of the church, and that, too, without much friendly assistance. For you must know that it has only been a few years since Liberal papers hav circulated in this great country, and, of course, it is up-hill business to ever think for yourself, after you hav been raised to employ some one to do your thinking for you who taught you that he was to direct you in all matters of a spiritual character, and that, too, when you, and you alone, would be responsible.

My conversion to Liberalism came about in this way: Brother —— came over to see me one day, in regard to some money matters. Said he: "I hav come over this morning to see if you will assist me out of my dilemma. I fear that some of our members will think that my discourses are not sprinkled sufficiently with thought. and it is impossible for me to think upon these spiritual matters, and hav my mind continually harassed in regard to money; and knowing you to be a 'cheerful giver,' I thought you would be willing to relieve me of my embarrassment." Said I, "Brother, come back to-morrow, and I will tell you what I think of the matter, and will make a proposition of some kind." But the fact of the business was, times were hard, and I had been considering the question of retrenchment. Then I began to think, and the more I thought, the more I believed that I could think a little. Then a sense of independence became perceptible, and something whispered: "Do your own thinking. Do your own thinking." All at once I broke out into a great sweat; frightened into a white heat at the bare idea, and I will wager that I did some of the hardest thinking from that time until I saw my minister the next day that ever was done by any little man in this world.

"Good-morning," said Brother ——, the next day, in a jocular manner. "Well, what do you think?" I had determined to tell him the truth. "Well," said I, "times are dull, and I hav concluded to do my own thinking, brother; I fear you will hav to go to work; for I feel certain that if there is a soul, it is the offspring of thought, and by thought and reason alone can it be reared. If there is a plan for man, it is that he is to nourish and raise his own offspring." "The devil will get you, certain, sir!" were his parting words. I hav prospered ever since, and am far happier than I ever was before, or ever expected to be; for I am now as free as the wind in the freest, greatest state in this Union, and, if we don't import bigots faster than they can be converted to a free and easy life in the West. I expect to die happy. Yours truly, D. C. MITCHELL.

COLUMBUS, KAN., March 23, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. I hav now been reading your paper about ten months, and I would not be without it. I do not think that it is read by any one else in my neighborhood, though we hav three or four Infidels, and several that are skeptical. Practically all are skeptical; for religion has but little to do with our society, which is first class. I am proud to liv in a community that is substantially free from the old pagan and Jewish customs. We are not bothered much with preachers, and hav had but two revivals in five years, and the last one is what I call a complete victory for common sense. It was commenced on the 24th ult. The first congregation numbered about one hundred, and continued to be about the same throughout the whole meeting. The first thing done was to claim the promis that "Where two or three are gathered together in my name there will I be in the midst." Having thus secured the immediate presence of the Omnipresent, the next thing was to call his attention to the promis that "Where two or three agree on earth as touching one point, it shall be done." Now, then, being favored by the presence and co-operation of the Omnipotent, it would seem, to any one but an Infidel, that success was absolutely certain; providing, of course, that the Christians held out faithful—and I am willing to vouch for that. The particular point to be reached at a revival, as all well know, is the conversion of souls. In view of this; a covenant was entered into by the leaders of the flock, and the good work systematically began. Night after night the covenant was renewed, and the prayers ascended entreating the Lord to hav mercy on the poor sinner who was wandering without the fold, amid sin and folly, preparing for himself a bed in the regions of torment, where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched. The minister told us that we might expect to see sinners converted before the meeting closed, and from the effort that was made on his part it looks like he should hav been favored; but it was not so, the many faithful and earnest prayers offered in tears and on the bended knee were not heard; or, if they were, they were unheeded; for not a single soul was brought to Jesus, though the work was continued up to the twelfth hour, when it quietly ended with a collection. I feel very thankful to the Rev. Mr. Funk, who conducted the meeting, for his remarks in our behalf. He said that (although he had failed to get a single convert) he never had preached at any place where he was favored with as good order and attention as at this, and promised to remember us in kindness, and speak of our courtesies wherever he went. It seems to me that all who attended this meeting hav had some striking proof that prayer is not answered, and that people can be moral without religion. It is certainly encouraging to a mind untrammeled with the dogmas and rites of superstition, to contrast a community of this kind with that of some of the Puritan fathers, not two hundred and fifty years ago, when it was a sin to eat mince pies on Sunday, or to be jovial, or even wear a smiling countenance.

Yours truly, L. N. WALLIS.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, March 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Perhaps nothing has transpired for a long time more interesting and more important to the public than Mr. Bennett's travels through those portions of the world claimed by many to be sacred, and from which the world derives its holy religion. But nothing can be more clear than that the numerous statements made by interested parties are false in every particular. It is quite evident that the foundation or the whole thing is fabulous, and no such persons ever existed. The world has been miserably imposed upon by the Roman Catholic church, who invented the whole of this gigantic deception, and forced it on the world by the most bloody, cruel, and revolting tyranny that ever cursed humanity. And what are those parts of the earth to-day? Why, the most dismal, wretched, and poverty-stricken that can be conceived; where little or nothing grows, where the people are sunk in the very depths of ignorance and squalor, and the black cloud of despair rests on the whole land. Such are some of the results growing out of this widespread fraud, which hangs on the necks of the nations of the earth a ponderous incubus, sinking the masses of humanity into the vortex of inextricable ruin. Behold the swarms of indolent priests who infest the whole earth, sponging on the credulous, and loading down their minds with the most absurd superstitions that double-distilled ignorance can possibly produce, causing the earth to be a wilderness and the people a blank. Oh, that this black pall of priestly darkness could be swept from the face of the earth; that this planet could be rescued and redeemed from the miserable drones and fanatics, and put upon a course of progress, that life in part might be largely benefited, and happiness prevail where misery is now the experience from the cradle to the grave. Religious superstition is the curse of the whole earth. The horrid falsehood which tells the people that this life is simply a time of probation to prepare for some other life, is the cause of untold wretchedness. It is a vale of tears, because the deceitful, lying clergy do all they can to make it so. They reap their harvest from the doleful gloom of the perverted mind. If every mind could only shake itself free from the dismalisms of superstition, then would the world brighten, and the human face be one of joy, instead of gloom. Hasten, hasten the happy time.

Yours truly, T. WINTER.

PARRISH, ILL., March 9, 1882.

MR. BENNETT: I am glad to see you are still safe and sound, notwithstanding your ducking in the "holy river." We Liberals are very thankful for your lucky escape and subsequent good health. We are very thankful, but we do not render our thanks to an imaginary being. We thank Mr. Bennett for his grit and perseverance in this as well as other things. This same grit and determination are what carried him through the trials he had to undergo at Albany, and are carrying him toward the top round in the ladder of liberty and intelligence. We Liberals of Parrish are getting ready to lend a helping hand to the brave hero who is fighting for our rights. We are going to organize a Liberal League as soon as we can procure the constitution, by-laws, instructions, etc. Please giv me the address of Mr. Leland, as we wish to order the outfit as soon as convenient. We can organize here with a commencing membership of thirty or forty, and I think we will be enabled to add a great many names to the subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER, besides the sale of a great many books and tracts. We want to establish a Liberal library here in the near future, so you see our little Liberal village is not dead to the interests of the cause of Freethought. I think we are doing extremely well, since it has only been four or five years since Liberalism began to make its appearance here. We hav fought hard for our victory, but I think the spoils will fully compensate us for our wounds financially and otherwise. Our spoils are forty or fifty souls loosed from the chains of superstition and the church, now to feed on the rich pastures of liberty and Freethought. My best wishes to Brother Bennett. Yours for truth, J. L. JONES.

[T. J. Leland's address is 144 Broadway.—ED. T. S.]

ST. JOSEPH, MO., March 19, 1882.

BRO. BENNETT: I hav been holding the inclosed $3 to pay subscription for the paper since the 1st inst. in order to get an opportunity of saying a few words to you by way of offering thanks to your courage and endurance which enabled divine providence to save you to us from the muddy current of the Jordan. This proves Buddha's declaration that man is only saved by man. I rejoice that your great journey will soon be ended in triumph, and the St. Joseph Liberal League desires to extend a most cordial invitation to you to stop with us and giv us a lecture or speech on your way home from San Francisco. There is one point in my opinion higher or more unanswerable than all the errors, falsehoods, cruelties, crimes, and blasphemies of the Bible and arguments that hav been arrayed against the book and its God or gods and the church, and that is the absolute helplessness and worthlessness of the book and all its God or gods, mother and mothers, virgins, son or sons of God, angels, ghosts, and grasshopper priesthood. Why none of them or all combined can not stay the flood, the misery, wo, wretchedness, ruin starvation, and death of the people in the valley of the lower Mississippi. There never was a better opportunity to aid Talmage to spike the guns of Col. Ingersoll and all the hosts of Infidels than for Jehovah, the mother Virgin Mary, or the son Jesus, or some angel, ghost, or spirit to come in a cloud of great glory and say to the waters, "Vanish," and to the people: "Return to your homes. You will find everything replaced, your animals refreshed, your dwellings and buildings restored, and ample supplies of food and clothing on hand for months to come." Let them do this and the colonel and his friends will "believe." I pause for their action. Can they, will they do it? Let us wait and see. R. V. WISE.

DOWAGIAC, MICH., March 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of Feb. 11th I notice an article headed "Prohibition," from S. R. Shepherd, of Kansas, and I am truly astonished that any man should present to the public such a lot of rambling nonsense in the place of argument while discussing this awfully important question. Such sophistry as even a child could answer; such heartless ridicule of human sorrows, and of humanity itself, can certainly win but very few of your readers. Ridicule can sometimes burnish logic, but when logic is absent it is a feeble weapon.

Let us review Mr. Shepherd's logic. He says, "Strong and vigorous manhood consists in resisting evil influences, like the sturdy oak, which bids defiance to the blasts and storms of heaven." Did Mr. Shepherd never tie a young and tender sapling to a stake to assist it in resisting the storms and blasts of heaven? And when the sapling was developed into a full-grown tree was it any less "sturdy" for having received this aid?

He admits that human nature is especially susceptible to temptation, yet he would not lend it any assistance by removing from the path of the young a dangerous enemy which has captured and slain millions of the best and noblest of the race. He says, "'Liberta's' solicitude for the weak ones is equal to that of the old lady for her son when she forbade him to go into the water until he had learned to swim." Now, I am acquainted with the old lady, and know that she told him not to go alone into the water until he had learned to swim, as he might get into trouble and need assistance.

Mr. Shepherd's satirical nonsense about the fall of man, horse-stealing, chicken-coops, if meant as argument, is intensely imbecil and inappropriate to the subject in hand. If horses were kept for the express purpose of furnishing thieves and robbers with something to ride on while they committed their depredations, and livery stables were instituted for the sole object of aiding and encouraging thieves, it would be the imperious duty of the government to abolish livery stables; and if horses were as vicious as alcohol, and of as little use to the world, it would be right to prohibit them.

If law is intended to protect the innocent, why should it not stretch forth its hand to protect those who are suffering from the curse of curses? Why should women and children be subjected to life-long misery and degradation when the law with its strong arm can easily remove the evil? We see how the saloon business is developing the manhood of our young nation, and we would remind Mr. Shepherd that it is not merely the weaklings of our race who fall victims to this mighty foe, but quite as often the brightest intellects, men of strong moral vertabra in other respects, men of kind and generous natures until this demon got possession of them. Many inherit from birth an ungovernable craving for stimulants, others hav acquired it, and you might as well try to make water run up hill as to reform such persons while the temptation is before them. You may teach and cultivate and fortify as much as you please, and they will weep and promis and try, but the demon is too strong for them, and they must perish unless you destroy him. And when these hav gone into their graves a new and immense army of recruits will take their places, moving on to the same horrid doom. The only hope of the world is a law "equal to the occasion," behind which the will of the people shall stand like a wall of adamant; and it is coming. Yours truly, MRS. E. HEDDON.

JAMESPORT, MO., March 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Believing it to be in the interest of Liberalism to know the condition of each neighborhood in which there are any Liberals, I submit a few disadvantages under which the Liberals of this place labor. Jamesport is a small country town of six or seven hundred inhabitants, with two churches—one north and one south Methodist—neither of which are very well supported.

B. F. Underwood delivered a lecture here about two years ago, which caused the commencement of a religious revolution, and in a few months, before the agitation had subsided, Mrs. Mattie H. Parry, whose unexcelled eloquence won the hearts of all whose moral consciousness was not buried so deep in theological quagmire as to destroy all reason, delivered a course of three lectures, since which time we hav not heard a Liberal lecture of any importance. There are about fifteen or twenty Liberals of good standing here; in fact, the leading business men of Jamesport are Liberals, but they are much inclined to be wrapped in the cloak of that arch-enemy of Liberalism, popularity; in fact, too much so to organize a League. But in the surrounding country there are quite a number who are not afraid to express their anti-religious sentiments, and whom the clergy are afraid to attack. Among them are Valentine Shuler, Milton Eads, myself, and others. But we need more lectures and an organization. Although all the above-named, including myself, liv from five to seven miles from town, we hav offered to do all we can to help those who liv in the town to organize or induce lecturers to visit us. We hope to hav E. C. Walker giv us a lift soon.

Yours respectfully, W. D. SHULER.

ITHACA, N. Y., March 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 4th that there is or ought to be a subscription gotten up for that poor old Liberal, Jeremiah Hacker, of Berlin, N. J., who is poor and needy, as it is said. I am unacquainted with the old gentleman, but my sympathy, as one who knows the wants of humanity, naturally goes out toward any Liberal who is exposed to a Christian county poorhouse. I therefore send in my mite, hoping others will do the same.

Yours truly, ZENAS KENT.

OAK POINT, WASH. TER., March 21, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Whenever the orphan asylum is to be started you can call upon me for $2.50 and I will giv $1 a year for its support, for I believe that is money put to proper use, and every reformer should be interested in such movements and show their creed by their actions. Yours truly, F. C. S.

Brown's Religion.

BY SUSAN H. WIXON.

A man named Brown—a very common name—
But Brown or Jones, I'm sure its all the same—
Was not a genius, neither rich nor learned,
And for great schemes had never cared nor yearned:
But was one of those easy-going men
Who make but little stir with tongue or pen;
Who keep the even tenor of their way
Through winter snows and sunny time of May,
And was known where'er his life-line fell
As an honest man, but an Infidel

He lived a quiet, upright, sober life,
Faithful and true to fellow-man and wife;
And most of folks who'd known him long and well
Had many tales of his good deeds to tell,
Of how, while other people preached and prayed,
He quite long journeys round the city made.
"The poor and sick I'm looking for," he said,
"For those who on dry straws and husks are fed."

He found in attics high and cellars dark,
Where poverty had set her chilling mark.
What you or I or any one may find
On any day, our own, our human kind!
In want and sorrow, and shivering with cold,
With trembling voices their story they told,
Of how they had struggled, essayed, and failed,
While the world most scornfully at them had railed.

On such occasions Brown would be very wroth,
And profanely utter many an oath.
Said he, "They preach of God in whom we hav breath,
While here are his children starving to death!
They pray for heathen in cannibal lands,
And pour out money to loosen their bands;
While the outcast at home, though sore he may plead,
Is left to die or for ravens to feed."

But while others asked God to pity the poor,
Great loads of oak wood Brown left at their door;
And also he left, whene'er he passed by,
Beans and beefsteak, bread and butter, and pie.
"'Tis my religion," said Brown to the deacon,
"And if I am faithful, I rather reckon,
I shall be square with the Infinit One
When my work on earth is finished and done."

"Your soul!" screamed the deacon, "think of your soul,
That works cannot save from the fiery roll
Of the hot, hissing flames down there in ——."
"Hold on," said Brown, "when this body, this shell,
To its first estate shall safely return,
Will there then be anything left for to burn?"

"You fool!" sneered the deacon, as to his store
He quickly retired and inwardly swore
That if he was God every Infidel
In torment and flame should be roasted well!
Then he thought, as over he counted his cash,
That soon there would come a financial crash;
And as times were hard and the gospel high,
He must raise some money somehow on the sly!

Soon after he failed for quite an amount,
But not until he had made a large count
Of assets of widows, and orphans, too,
Who thought that he to his promis was true,
To return to them before many suns
The interest due, as well as their funds.
He was so pious and talked with such zeal
That they could not think he would cheat and steal;
But he grasped their means though, nevertheless,
And soon they found themselvs quite penniless.

With tears they told their wrongs unto Brown,
Who said: "Now, this man is expecting a crown,
A robe, and a harp, and all that, you know,
Where rivers of bliss eternally flow!
Well, maybe he'll get them, but as for me,
In such company I'd rather not be!
The deacon was known as a 'pious old saint,'
While I—I—well, I hav made no complaint;
But which is the worse, my friends here may tell,
Such a pious fraud or an Infidel?"

H. L. Green's Lecture Trip.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

For the last two months I hav lectured often in the frontier towns in this state, where no other lecturer has ever been, and it appears to me that in these places I can do the most good. This experience has convinced me that nothing is needed so much as an established Liberal lecture bureau, with sufficient funds to keep a number of lecturers in the field, who, being compensated by the bureau, would be prepared to go as missionaries into these new places and educate the people in the school of Freethought before the church has fully taken possession of them. I hope before another year has passed such a bureau will be permanently established, with funds sufficient to keep at least five lecturers doing part of the time this kind of missionary work.

Since I wrote my last letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav lectured in Whitehall, Rixford, Saranac, Flint, Saginaw City, Clare, and Paris—all in northern and western Michigan. I expect to lecture next week in Holland, Dowagiac, Nirvana, and a few other places in this state; and then about the 10th of April I shall go to Bloomington, Wisconsin, where in that town and vicinity I hav a number of appointments already made. I shall remain in that state through April, and then return home through Indiana and Pennsylvania. I am engaged to lecture at Irwin Station, Pa, May 15th. Then I shall return to Salamanca in time to attend the meeting of ths Friends of Progress at Waterloo the first week in June. From that time on to August, when the Freethinkers' Association meets at Watkins Glen, I shall devote my whole time to the preparation for that convention and to lecturing in western and central New York. Friends who desire me to speak in Wisconsin in April will please address me care of Frank J. Schell, Bloomington, Grant Co., Wisconsin. The season is getting so advanced I shall hav to defer visiting my Liberal friends in Kansas and Missouri, as I intended when I left home.

But to return to my lecture trip. My Whitehall meeting was well attended considering the inclemency of the weather I enjoyed the hospitality of the European Hotel while there. This house is admirably kept by Mr. H. Harwood, who is the best posted on the Bible of any man I hav met in a long time. He has made it a great study, and therefore does not value it very highly. He very willingly subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I was invited these by N. F. Strong, Esq., an activ Freethinker, and a friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER. As he is a photographer, and therefore violates the second commandment every day, I fear it will go hard with him if it turns out orthodoxy is true. I should not be surprised to hear that a Liberal League had been organized in Whitehall. There is good material there for one. I spoke next at Rixford to the Spiritualists' and Liberalists' Association. Here I had a small but appreciativ audience. I was glad to find they had a commodious Liberal hall here in which they hold regular weekly meetings.

My next stopping place was at Saranac, where I found a town full of Freethinkers. I learned that there were but twenty-nine Christians in the town, and some seventy professed Freethinkers. They hav a good League here, of which Mr. S. L. Shaw is president, and Stephen Crawford secretary. I was invited to Saranac by Mr. Shaw, and greatly enjoyed my visit with him and his pleasant, intelligent wife. I also visited Mr. and Mrs. Crawford, as intelligent and interesting persons as I hav met in a long time. They read and admire THE TRUTH SEEKER. I likewise made the acquaintance of Mr. Fred Stow, the leading attorney of the village, and also one of your subscribers. Mr. Stow is a good speaker and an earnest Freethinker, and I wish he might be prevailed upon to take the lecture field. I am sure he would succeed. While stopping at Saranac I enjoyed a Liberal sociable that was held at Brother Shaw's. Among those present I remember the following persons: Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Olmstead, Mrs. Stephen Crawford, Mr. and Mrs. William Cahoon, Mr. Fred Stow, Henry Spencer, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Haskins. Mr. and Mrs. Holcolm, Mr. and Mrs. Dr. C. P. Jones, and Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Anderson. And allow me to say right here that nothing will help the Liberal movement more in any town than the holding of regular social gatherings. The church holds its coherents more by its social arrangements than by its theological tenets.

Near Saranac, in the town of Keene, resides Juliet Bowen, the young lady who gave three cheers for Col. Ingersoll from the top of a church steeple. The circumstances are these, as I learned by inquiry: Mr. and Mrs. Bowen, the parents of the young lady, are well-to-do, intelligent Freethinkers, and, of course, great admirers of the eloquent colonel. Their only daughter, Juliet, is an intelligent, well-educated, good-looking girl of nineteen years of age, who is highly respected by all who know her. Last fall, across the highway from Mr. Bowen's residence, the Methodist people were erecting a church edifice. At the time here referred to the frame of the church and of the steeple was up and partially inclosed, and was surrounded with scaffoldings. One afternoon a number of young ladies were visiting Miss Bowen, and her father remarked, more in jest than in seriousness, that he would giv ten dollars to any girl who would go to the top of that steeple and giv three cheers for Col. Ingersoll. A number of the girls started, but Juliet was the only one that reached the topmost scaffolding, some one hundred feet from the ground. Here she deliberately took off her hat, swung it three times in the air, and each time she cheered for Col. Ingersoll at the top of her voice. When she returned to the house, her father handed her a ten-dollar bill. Mr. E. A. a Chapman, a Freethinker and photographer, of Lowell, Mich., has fine photographs of this brave girl for sale. I hav no doubt that every young man of Freethought proclivities will, so soon as he reads this, order one of these photographs, if he has not before.

From Saranac I went to St. Johns, Mich., and had an interesting visit with Mr. and Mrs. M. Babcock, at their fine residence. Brother Babcock constantly makes it lively for the St. Johns school board and the orthodox ministers of that town. I ascertained that he is very popular with a large majority of the citizens of St. Johns, and that majority is composed of, first, the men and women of intelligence and thought, and, second, of the destitute poor. Brother Babcock allows no one to suffer for the necessaries of life when he knows of it. When I was there the whole town was in commotion over a fact that Brother Babcock had just brought to light, that the Congregational preacher was giving a poor old woman twenty cents a dozen for doing his family washing. He tried to get it done for twelve cents a dozen. From St. Johns I went to Flint, where I lectured Sunday evening to an audience of five or six hundred people in the Opera House. They listened attentivly for two and one-half hours to what I had to say. On Monday evening a number of Liberals met at the house of Thomas Wolcott and perfected the organization of a Liberal League by electing Thomas Wolcott, president, W. R. Alger secretary, and W. J. Cronk treasurer. The prospects are that this will be a live League.

At the invitation of Brother J. H. Burnham I visited Saginaw City, and lectured before the Saginaw City Liberal League on Sunday morning to as intelligent an audience as I was ever permitted to address. And for a week I enjoyed an admirable visit with Brother Burnham and his estimable wife. Mr. Burnham has had much to do since he left the Methodist pulpit in the spreading of Liberal views in Michigan. He has spoken in nearly every town in the state, and given courses of lectures in many of them. There are few abler lecturers in the lecture field, and he should hav constant and remunerativ employment.

At Clare I spoke to a good-sized audience in the Opera House. As my lecture was the first one of the kind ever delivered there, it of course created considerable excitement among "God's people."

At Paris I found another new town where the gospel of Freethought had never been delivered, and I gave them one "preach." There was but one "servant of God" there, a little, small-headed Methodist preacher, who, for a number of weeks, has been laboring with all his powers to induce Jesus to come and start a revival in Paris. But Jesus did not come. The reverend divine attended my lecture until I spoke a little disrepectfully of the fourth person in the godhead, the devil, when the young minister shot for the door. He could not sit still and hear his best friend maligned. I was invited to Paris by E. M. Stickney, a worthy man and an intelligent Freethinker. My visit at his home was most pleasant to me, and I remember with satisfaction the acquaintance I formed with his pretty, sweet little children, who, so soon as I went to the house, welcomed me as "Grandpa Green." What kind of a God can that be who would send two she bears to eat up forty-two innocent children?

It must be a pleasant thought to our Christian friends that they will be obliged to spend an eternity worshiping such a fiend. What a regeneration that must be that changes a natural person into that condition that he can love such a being! H. L. GREEN.

Book Notice.

THE BRAIN AND THE BIBLE; or, The Conflict between Mental Science and Theology. By Edgar C. Beall. With a Preface by Robert G. Ingersoll. Price $1.50. Sold by D M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street.

We hav given this excellent book a thorough reading, from the beautiful and appropriate Prefsce by our matchless orator, Ingersoll, to the author's grand and truthful closing "gems of thought," and we are very sure it is one of the most valuable of contributions that has ever been made to Liberal literature. I say "we," for Mr. Slenker read it aloud, and this is the compliment he pays to few books, for his busy life debars him from reading only a small portion of the floating literature of the age. But its phrenological basis was the charm for him. To the publications of Fowler & Wells he is indebted for the ground-work of his Liberal principles, and so eagerly did he purchase and read these works on phrenology and physiology that he went by the pseudonym of "Fowler" for many a year. And "we uns" in our home also read those same books and papers, and became likewise admirers of the science of phrenology. And as is generally the case with fearless and bold inquirers, we all went farther than our teachers, and reached the ground whereon our author, Edgar C. Beall, now stands. So when we claim to hav read, appreciated, and indorsed this book of his, we make no careless boast, but know whereof we speak. Few practical thinking phrenologists will fail to see and acknowledge his points, and those among them who hav seen gods, ghosts, and designs in nature will find them fading away like mists before the sun. When science and experimental knowledge giv the real cause of known effects we at once see the uselessness of any super natural "finger in the pie." Now, as we read this brainy book, we trace every act of human kind, and every thought of human will, to natural causes—to the development of the brain, and learn that what man is depends upon organization, education, and environment. We learn that it is not the gods that create moral, virtuous, wise, or talented men and women; but that these, as well as their opposits, are as they are by force of circumstances, and that consequently we should do all in our power to so mold and modify these circumstances as to generate better bodies, brains, and surroundings, and thus create stepping-stones whereby the coming generations may be glorified and blest.

The thought that a man or woman is born depraved—born with a brain that is abnormally developed in the "moral centers"—is so constituted that his animal passions and desires are stronger than his inclinations to do right—should make us very tender of blame or chastisment toward these hapless unfortunates.

This true science of phrenology as taught by our author is a strong plea for kindness toward criminals, towards the morally ill and the naturally depraved. It teaches us a beautiful charity that covereth a multitude of sins, and yet points to a way whereby many may be regenerated by better surroundings and better future teachings, And it also instructs us in the grandest truth of all—that on right generation depends ninety-nine-hundredths of what shall be the phrenological basis of the coming race.

"Work, dear friends, oh work and labor,
For a future grand and free,
Never yet hath gun or saber
Conquered such a victory."

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, in Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

EXTERNAL APPLICATION,

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had the disease, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others a step from the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

Gems of Thought.

It would be well if, in conjunction with the present crusade against the vending of liquor [On this delicate subject I do not care to enter; but I recommend to my readers a careful study of Milton's and Mill's words, which shall be given after I hav set down what I hav to say on the main drift of the paragraph.—Hylax.] if, I say, a few hundred reading-rooms were opened in this city of New York, where light and warmth could be obtained by the poorer classes; and as there is a certain expense connected with the opening of such reading-rooms, I would suggest that the churches, who are constantly preaching charity, would turn their buildings into reading-rooms during six days of the week, and thus remove the charge of being useless for the greater portion of the year.—Felix Adler's Radical Pulpit.

[NOTE —I can hardly bring myself to think that Mr. Prof. Adler—whom I hav long been accustomed to look upon as a practical philanthropist—is really serious in making the suggestion that the churches should establish reading-rooms for the use and comfort of the general public. If the churches would pay their own way, and not meanly evade contributing their fair share of taxation, we should be content. It is justice we call for, in the name of the people, and not charity. The people can establish reading-rooms for themselvs. They want no aid, and, least of all, such aid as the churches would bring them. Just think of the trash—the rot and rubbish—that they would foist and force on the public, if they only had the power. No workingman would be permitted to read a Liberal paper or scientific journal, and as to such authors as Carlyle and Emerson; Channing and Martineau; John S. Mill and Herbert Spencer; Huxley, Tyndall, Darwin, and Froude, and other congenial spirits, such as our own Chadwick and Savage, they would be summarily thrust aside to made room for "learned Thebans" like Moody and Spurgeon, Joe Cook and Talmage, and the other clerical clowns and mountebanks that are ever and anon rising—by their specific levity—to the surface of society, roaring and ranting, and scattering their fetid breath over all creation. As to English literature, in any wide and generous sense of the word, Bacon and Shakspere, Milton and Locke, Macintosh and Macaulay, all these would, if admitted to the church-library at all, be relegated to to the upper shelves; while Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," Baxter's "Saints' Everlasting Rest," Boston's "Fourfold State" and "Crook in the Lot," together with Watts's and Wesley,s "Divine Songs" and "Hymns," with many minor theological tadpoles, would be spread on the tables and crammed down the people's throats—willy-nilly. God help the "hungry sheep" that would, in that case, hav to look to the churches—that is, the priests, the ministers, the pastors, deacons, elders, etc —for their intellectual sustenance, not to speak of anything like effectiv moral guidance. No! no! a thousand times no, my dear and respected Professor! You are on a wrong tack, if, indeed, you are not "gamesome" and making fun of the "salt of the earth," as these people are taught to consider themselvs—a lesson that they learn early and never forget. Allow me to whisper in your ear words with which I doubt not you are already familiar:

"Non tali auxilio, nee defensoribus istis, Tempus eget."—Virgil.

For the benefit of our unlearned readers, I subjoin an English translation:

"'What rage,' she cried, 'has seized my husband's mind?
What arms are these, and to what use designed?
These times want other aids."—Dryden.

The churches are already very accommodating, and do their best to follow St. Paul's advice to be "all things to all men." They giv us lotteries and raffles, strawberry feasts and bun-fights, bazars and cooky-shines, besides carrying on a sort of variety show all the year round for the amusement of the babes and sucklings and "children of a larger growth," as well as "such as are of weaker capacity." e positivly want none of their charity. Selah. Let them weigh well and lay to heart the words of that eminent statesman, good man, and wise philosopher, Edmund Burke: "Justice is the great law of civil society, and any policy not founded on justice will, in the end, be found to be no policy at all."—Hylax.]

How great a virtue is temperance; how much of moment through the whole life of man! Yet God commits the managing of so great a trust without particular law or prescription wholly to the demeanor of every grown man. And therefore when he himself tolled the Jews from heaven, that omer which was every man's daily portion of manna is computed to hav been more than might hav well sufficed the heartiest feeder thrice as many meals. For these actions which enter into a man, rather than issue out of him, and therefore defile not, God uses not to captivate under a perpetual childhood of prescription, but trusts him with the gift of reason to be his own chooser. There were but little work left for preaching, if law and compulsion should grow so fast upon these things which heretofore were governed only by exhortation.—Milton's Areopagitica.

It seems to us quite clear that an inquirer who has no wish except to know the truth is more likely to arrive at the truth than any inquirer who knows that, if he decides one way, he shall be rewarded, and that, if he decides the other way, he shall be punished.—Macaulay.

HUMAN beings owe to each other help to distinguish the better from the worse, and encouragement to choose the former and avoid the latter. They should be forever stimulating each other to increased exercise of their higher faculties, and increased direction of their feelings and aims toward wise instead of foolish, elevating instead of degrading objects and contemplations. But neither one person, or any number of persons, are warranted in saying to another human creature of ripe years that he shall not do with his life for his own benefit what he chooses to do with it.—Mill's Liberty.

Odds and Ends.

A CHURCH of England missionary, who reproved one of his Indian converts for being drunk and disgracing his profession of Christianity, received the triumphant answer, "Me no Christian, me church of England man."

A SMART little boy being told in his Sunday-school how Samson had slain a thousand men with the jawbone of an ass, exclaimed, "Why didn't he catch the donkey by the hind leg; he would hav been able to slay far more."

THE people of Alaska, remarks the Chicago Tribune, who ought to be contented and happy, do not seem to know when they are well off. With whisky at fourteen cents a quart, and neither a city council nor a supreme court to worry them, these skin-clad aliens are clamoring for a government.

LORD CHAMBERLAIN'S office, St. James's palace: Notice is hereby given that the queen will hold a drawing-room at Buckingham Palace on Wednesday, the first of March, at 3 o'clock. The knights of the several orders are to appear in their collars at this drawing-room, it being Collar-day." This is rather alarming. It is to be hoped that the knights wore something else, if it were only an eye-glass.

A TERRIBLE BLOW.

"What ails that maid?" said Spilkins,
As he met a passing fair,
And saw her eyes, 'neath "wave" and "crimp,"
Which o'er her forehead dangled limp,
Giv forth a stony stare.
"Methinks," said Wilkins, scornfully,
As he tossed his head in air,
"She has no brains to cudgel,
And so she bangs her hair."

CHICAGO POETRY.

Over the meadows so fresh and green
Gallops the Lady Clare;
Out on the breeze, like a silvery sheen,
Floats her new back hair.

Fast goes her steed over hill and dale,
Wonderful are his jumps;
Look out, my lady, your horse grows pale,
Soon he will hav the thumps.

Little you're thinking, my lady proud—
Beautiful ladv Clare—
That soon in grief will your head be bowed,
Bluffing on two small pair.

Green grows the ivy on churchyard wall,
Soon will the flies be here;
Then will Lord Ronald, thy love, thy all,
Tackle the new bock beer.

THE following is a leaf from the czar's diary: Got up at 7 A. M. and ordered my bath. Found four gallons vitrol in it and did not take it. Went to breakfast. The Nihilists had placed two torpedoes on the stairs, but I did not step on them. The coffee smelled so strongly of prussic acid that I was afraid to drink it. Found a scorpion in my left slipper, but luckily shook it out before putting it on. Just before stepping into a carriage to go for my morning drive it was blown into the air, killing the coachman and the horse instantly. I did not drive. Took a light lunch off hermetically sealed American canned goods. They can't fool me there. Found a poisoned dagger in my favorit chair, with the point sticking out. Did not sit down on it. Had dinner at 6 P. M., and made Baron Laischounewonski taste every dish. He died before the soup was cleared away. Consumed some Baltimore oysters and some London stout that I had locked up for five years. Went to the theater and was shot at three times in the first act. Had the entire audience hanged. Went home to bed, and slept all night on the roof of the palace.

AN absent-minded young lady, having been duly married, started off on her bridal tour. The party stopped at a Western city. Some time in the night there came a succession of terrified shrieks from the room occupied by the bride and groom, and the clerks, porters, and employees generally rushed up stairs, only to meet a frantic female figure, clad in white, fleeing in desperate haste from her apartment, crying:

"Oh, there's a man in my room!"

The clerk rushed in and found the groom half disrobed, standing in the middle of the room, one boot on and the other in his hand, the picture of amazement. He explained that he had just come up stairs, and was in the act of undressing (his wife had previously retired), when she suddenly awoke with a shriek and fled.

"What was the matter?" asked the clerk.

"Damfino," said the husband.

Just then the bride, enveloped in a huge bedspread, procured for her by a chambermaid, came back, looking very red and foolish, and in half a minute she explained the mystery by saying:

"Oh, Fred, I forgot I was married, and when I woke I was so frightened."

"WHY?" said the professor, with a thoughtful air,
"Should orange blossoms always deck a bride?
Were it to be the blossom of the pear
A lesson might beneath the symbol hide."
The bald-headed boarder said with sullen spite,
"Perhaps its color won the flower its place,
A sort of misty, haggard, deadly white,
To match the trembling victim's ghastly face."
Up-spake the red-haired drummer with a smile,
Picking his teeth, his appetite appeased,
"Correct you are, this fruit of Hesperus Isle,
A perfect symbol—it is best when squeezed."
"For shame," the old maid said; "if I were you
I'd hang my head with shame, or leave the room;
The orange blossom blooms the whole year through Like woman's virtue, a perennial bloom."
"Or like her tongue," said Jones, "it never rests;
Or like spring strawberries, very scarce and high;"
"Or like the groom who his last cent invests,"
Thus did the similes around us fly.
"Well, well" said the professor, "none of these
The seeming mystery doth yet unfold;
'Tis this, the sweetest blossoms on the trees
Will soonest turn themselvs to fruit of gold."

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with forty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of the work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

There hav been mahy books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

The Home Journal, Boston, says: "We earnestly commend it to all. Its influence can be only beneficial. The author has a thorough mastery of his subject.

Demorest's Family Fashion Magazine says: "It contains enough sensible hints to set up a family."

The Alpha, edited by Dr. Winslow, says: "We like the book thoroughly." And adds: "Send for it, fathers and mothers, for your own good and for the sake of your children, who are to fill your places when you are called up higher."

The Buffalo Express says: "Whoever buys this book will find it a paying investment."

The Scientific American says: "Books on this subject are usually written by 'cranks,' but this is radically different; it is scientific, sober, clean, and worthy of conscientious consideration by every possible parent, and particularly by the young."

Dr. Dio Lewis of Boston, writes: "I hav read all of your works, and feel I must study this one. Your contributions to sanitary and social science hav all been imbued with the spirit of sound conservatism and earnest conscientiousness, all too rare among reformers. Whoever gods over this book will find himself on sacred ground. It is the most valuable of your many valuable books."

Prof. N. S. Townsend, of Ohio University, writes: "I am greatly pleased with this work. I hav loaned it to some of my pupils, who express delight with it. I hope every thoughtful young man and woman will read it."

Notes and Clippings.

THE editor of the Nineteenth Century has inserted two attacks upon Mr. Bradlaugh from the pen of Cardinal Manning. With a fine sense of Christian fairness, the editor excludes all reply.

THE St. Louis Medical Society has been considering the question of so amending their code as to permit consultation with homœopaths. The majority of the committee reported that the change ought to be made soon, but not just yet, and the minority favored immediate action.

AT the great Romford brewery, near London, five pints of ale are allowed to each of the four hundred men. They drink it all, and it seems to suit them. It is excellent ale, such as that described by Mr. Gladstone in his last budget as "the finest drink since nectar went out of fashion."

HENRY BIDGOOD, a short time ago, got confirmed in the parish church at Halberton, England. All the candidates adjourned to a public house after the holy rite, and a few days after, at the Tiverton petty sessions, Henry Bidgood was fined ten shillings and costs for being drunk and fighting the police.

MR. BENNETT happened to be in Bombay at the same time as Joe Cook. Joe tried his usual abusiv tactics, but without success. He was so well exposed that on his succeeding lecture he was received with hisses even from the polite Hindoos. The parsons will hav to learn that they cannot preach their superstitions in any part of the world without meeting Freethought opposition.—Freethinker.

IN order "to exclude Atheists from taking a part in legislation for this country," Lord Redesdale proposes a new test in his bill introduced in the House of Lords. The new formula which he has embodied is as follows: "I, A. B., do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm that I believe in an almighty God." Puck thinks it will be an awkward day for Lord Redesdale when a bill to exclude idiots is introduced in the British legislature.

EMPEROR WILLIAM of Germany says that the most important thing for the country is the fostering of a living religious spirit. The less Germany has of his "piety" the better. It is quite consistent with consiracy against freedom, and we all remember how, during the great war, pious William sang to his pious consort at home in dispatches from the seat of war:

Ten thousand Frenchmen sent below;
Praise God from whom all blessings flow!

THE English correspondent of one of our dailies is responsible for the statement that the Prince of Wales has thus remonstrated with the Marquis of Queensbury for expressing sympathy with the junior member for Northampton: "Look here, Queensbury, you hav sent £50 to Bradlaugh. Now, I don't care a d——n for his heresy or yours; I leave that to Canterbury (the archbishop) to look after; but Bradlaugh is a Republican, and I am to be king of England. You can't at the same time be Bradlaugh's friend and mine."

THE London Freethinker givs this item of disease and remedy: At Cavergno, in Italy, three young virgins wedded to the Lord hav taken the disease of inspiration very badly. After carrying on like maniacs in the parish church, they rushed off to a house at the end of the village, barred themselvs in, and swore never to touch food or drink again. As the local authorities were breaking into their castle the leader of the three married virgins cried out: "Back, ye children of the world! We are virgins and saints. Cursed be every one who lays a hand on us." They were, however, dragged away to their homes, and the Lord never put in an appearance to help them. What a disgusting church, to sanction such spiritual obscenity as the marriage of young virgins to the Lord! The only cure for these poor hysterical girls is a husband and two babies apiece.

A PROPOSITION has been made in the Virginia legislature that the state purchase an area of ground upon which all the duels of the commonwealth must be fought in future and to the death. Its advocate claims that the more the element of danger enters into the pastime, the less it will be resorted to by the average young man whose honor is as the breath of his nostrils. There is a big grain of common sense in the argument, and if prize-fighters were placed upon a similar footing and compelled to battle like the ancient gladiators until one was killed, there would be little or no desire to indulge in the brutalizing sport.

THE acquittal of David McMillan, who killed Father McCarthy at Greenfield, Mass., seems to hav stirred up religious feeling. Father Lynch, of North Adams, said in a sermon: "Things hav come to a pretty pass when a man can be murdered in his own doorway, and the jury find the assailant not guilty. This, however, is nothing more than any Catholic can expect. They can expect no justice in New England tribunals. The jury says, 'It matters not; he was a Catholic priest, and the murderer must go free.' There is no justice here for Catholics. A Catholic has no recourse to the law. He has no way of protection but his personal defense for himself or property, and cannot depend upon the law."

THE Benedictine Monastery at Solesmes, in France, has been closed by the authorities, the seven or eight inmates allowed to remain fifteen months ago as caretakers having gradually been augmented till the establishment was virtually reconstructed. A week's grace was allowed them for reducing their numbers to the assigned limit, but they flatly refused to do so. Several other monasteries are threatened with the like severity in case of recusancy. The dispersion of the Benedictines was effected by fifty gendarmes, a detachment of the line being stationed outside. The door had to be forced and the monks dragged from the chapel where they were chanting. The abbot was removed last and knelt outside the door, after which he informed the prefect that he had incurred excommunication.

AN incident illustrating the nonsense of religion occurred in the city of London court the other day during the hearing of a case in which a Parsee gentleman was called as a witness. He objected to being sworn either on the Old or New Testaments, and, not being a Mohammedan, he could not be sworn on the Koran. He mentioned, however, that he had a sacred relic about his person as a charm, and he thought by making a declaration, and holding the relic in his hand, and not concealing it, the act would be biuding on his conscience. Mr. Commissioner Kerr said, under the peculiar circumstances, he would be justified in taking the witness's declaration, if at the same time he held the charm unconcealed in his hand, and declared he would consider the act sufficiently binding upon him to bear true testimony in the matter at issue. He always understood, however, that a Parsee was usually sworn holding the tail of a cow, which was a sacred animal in India. Holding a cow's tail is nothing to kissing the dirty greasy Jew book which they offer to witnesses in English courts.

SIR HENRY TYLER, a blatant churchman, recently asked the House of Commons whether Dr. Edward B. Aveling and Mrs. Besant are still employed iu connection with the science and art department of the government. He was informed that the committee of the science classes held in the Hall of Science, Old street, hav again returned Dr. Aveling's name as one of their teachers. As he is qualified to teach according to the rules of the department no exception has been taken to his employment. The committee, who had also proposed to employ Mrs. Besant as a teacher, afterward withdrew her name. He then gave notice that he would on Thursday ask the home secretary whether his attention had been called to a series of articles recently published in the National Reformer, entitled, "The Christ of Dr. Aveling," and whether he would giv orders to hav the same referred to the public prosecutor with a view of prosecuting the junior member for Northampton [Bradlaugh] and Mrs. Besant, the editors of the National Reformer, for blasphemy.

IT is a terrible thing to edit a (politically) Liberal paper in Spain, says the Pall Mall Gazette. To say nothing of duels, imprisonment, and the other little trifles to which continental journalists are exposed, the Spanish Liberal editor stands in dread of the anathemas of the church. Here, for instance, is an extract from the comprehensiv malediction which the bishop of Santander has launched at the Liberal editors of his diocese: "May Almighty God curse these journals with the perpetual malediction launched against the devil and his angels! May they perish with Nero, Julian the apostate, and Judas the traitor! May the Lord judge them as he judged Datham and Abiram! May the earth swallow them up alive! Let them be cursed dav and night, sleeping and waking, in eating, in drinking, and in playing, when they speak and when they keep silence! May their eyes be blinded, their ears deaf, their tongue dumb! Cursed be every member of their body! Let them be cursed from to-day and forever! May their sepulcher be that of dogs and of asses! May famished wolves prey upon their corpses, and may their eternal company be that of the devil and his angels!"

A CATHOLIC writes to the N. Y. Sun regarding the Catholic Protectory: "As there seems to be a spirit of investigation aroused throughout the state, why not hav this institution investigated, and see where the profits arising from their extensiv business go to, and whether any of the directors receive profits therefrom. I who write this am a Catholic Irishman, but a hater of frauds and shams of every description, and am influenced solely by a desire to discover whether the Protectory is in reality a charitable institution or a corporation using the people's money to grow rich on. The Protectory has received thousands of dollars of the people's money. They hav invested capital, a quarter of a million at least, in stock and machinery in the printing and shoemaking trades. The property they are owners of, and constantly adding to, is a princely estate. They lately purchased city property in Broome street worth over $50,000, and still they want more. If I am not mistaken they hav asked from the public fund this year only $70,000. Now, when is this going to end, will they never cry enough, and, finally, who is this vast and ever-growing property going to belong to? Will the state which has given so lavishly of its resources own it—will it revert to the people out of whose pockets it has been built up, or will it be swallowed up in the capacious maw of an ecclesiastical corporation as greedy as any of the present monopolies who curse the country? This is a ticklish question, and I expect fault-finding. This and kindred institutions think they should be exempt from inquiry or criticism. The politicians of New York county giv it a wide berth. They are afraid to touch it, for political hari kari would be the result. But the time is fast coming when the legislator who tells the truth and stands by his convictions on every subject will hav the best chance of re-election. Now, what do the phlebotomized taxpayers of the state get for all this? They turn out of the Protectory as unfinished workmen as come out of the state prisons, for they hav no superior advantages in one place over the other. So the workingmen of the state hav to thank them for two very questionable benefits conferred. First, unfair competition—on capital furnished by the state—with legitimate enterprise outside. Second, flooding the trades that they hav already done their best to injure with botches unable to compete in the labor market, and who sell the little skill they possess so cheap that the men who paid their share of their board and training hav soon to come to the same level. Let us, then, by all means, hav an investigation before any more money is given away, and see if there is any colored individual roosting around Westchester county."

LAST Sabbath was Easter Sunday. It was generally celebrated in the Christian churches in commemoration of the alleged resurrection of Christ. The preceding Friday was Good Friday, celebrated as the day of the crucfixion. But unless a man believe that between Friday and Sunday Christ spent three days in the heart of the earth, he shall without doubt be everlastingly damned.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Egypt.

OTHER PYRAMIDS AND THE SPHINX.

The second largest pyramid of Gizeh is that supposed to have been built by King Chephren, or Chafra. It was originally 454 feet high, but is now 447. Its foundation is somewhat higher than that of Cheops, so that it looks very little smaller. The entrance is on the north side at a tolerable hight, and leads through a sloping passage down to the base line, thence proceeding on a level to the chamber hewn out of the rock, and in which bodies were deposited. It was opened by Belzoni in 1816, and in it was found a sarcophagus of granite filled with rubbish. The outer casing near the apex still remains, showing what both the large pyramids originally were.

The Arabs go up and down these monster piles with the greatest agility, making a run from the top of one apex to the other in less than nine minutes. I wished to see the feat performed, but for some reason the arrangements were not effected.

The third pyramid, built by Mycerinus, or Menkera, is now 208 feet in hight, having originally been 218. It was opened in 1837 by Colonel Vyse. It stands at a right angle with the second. To build this the workmen were obliged not only to cut the rock which inclines northeastward, but also to form it into a sort of terrace by means of immense blocks. It is difficult to enter. A sloping passage, not much raised from the ground, leads down into the rock, and then proceeds for the most part on a level to the first apartment, the entrance to which was prevented by pit falls and barricades. From this apartment a passage which can be seen at the top of the wall leads up into the pyramid and terminates abruptly. This first apartment is said to have been appropriated to funeral ceremonies; through its floor a narrow and deep passage leads to the chamber where Mycernus's coffin or sarcophagus stood. This chamber is hewn in the rock, and inlaid with blocks of granite, which, meeting from two sides, form a vaulted ceiling.

The sarcophagus was a beautiful piece of workmanship, made of dark brown basalt, and ornamented with four vertical triglyphic links joined by cross-bands. It was surmounted by a cornice with projecting edges, and by an astragal that separated the cornice from the links on the side of the sarcophagus. This astragal was carried down the pyramidically inclined edges and then encircled the sides of the sarcophagus. By its side the body of Mycerinus was found, torn to pieces. The mummy is now in the British Museum, but the sarcophagus containing it was thrown overboard when the ship conveying it was in danger.

The three small pyramids are on the south side of the last mentioned. They show plainly how the others were built, as they are only commencements or models of pyramids. On the east side of the second and third are the ruins of small temples, consecrated to the dead deposited in the pyramids. They consist of a few walls composed of large blocks and half buried in the sand. They lie eastward from the pyramid, to allow of turning toward the west, where it was supposed the dead lived with Osiris. In them is still discerned a set of apartments, the back wall of the sanctuary, as well as other parts of the structure.

The colossal sphinx next demands our attention. It stands not far from a quarter of a mile southeast of the Great Pyramid. It is unquestionably a marvel of antiquity. It is a natural rock, to which was given more or less accurately the external appearances of that mythical animal, the sphinx. The head alone was sculptured. The body is formed of the rock itself, supplemented when defective by somewhat clumsy masonry of limestone. The total hight of the monument is 65 feet. The ear measures 5 feet 10 inches, the mouth 7 feet 8 inches. The face in its widest part across the cheek is 13 feet 7 inches. Its origin is still a matter of doubt. At one time it was supposed to be a monument of the reign of Thothmes IV. (eighteenth dynasty), but it is now known from a stone discovered by Mariette-Bey, in the museum of antiquities in Cairo, that the sphinx was already in existence when Cheops (who preceded Chephren) gave orders for the repairs which this stone commemorates. Mariette-Bey asserts that the sphinx was to be the colossal image of an Egyptian god called Armachis, a god of the sun.

The face of the sphinx turned toward the east, and nearly twenty-eight feet high, must have once looked proud and beautiful, but now it is mutilated, and the nose and a part of the cheeks are missing. It was once painted a red brown. The excavations and researches of Mariette-Bey proved that the sphinx did not rest on a pedestal, although the Egyptians so represented it. It is, even to the head, where the work of the chisel is plainly discerned, a natural rock, a gift of nature. The neck is also the natural rock, with its crooked layers, and its immense oval body is also but little hewn. But the resting front paws were completed by large blocks, and in other places the holes in the rock were filled up with stonework. Between the front paws and breast is or was a small temple on which sacrifices were offered to the sphinx. The length of the sphinx from the points of the paws to the beginning of the tail is 172½ feet, though much of it is now covered by the drifting sands.

The sphinx is grand in its loveliness; it is imposing in its magnitude; it is impressive in the mystery that hangs over its story. And there is that in the overshadowing majesty of the eternal figure of stone, with its accusing memory of the deeds of all ages as they stand upon the eternal but unseen record of the events of the thousands of years that have rolled away.

Mariette-Bey's excavations also led to further discoveries. In front of the sphinx he found a paved dromos leading to a large wall which seemed to have formed a court round the sphinx, and through which a gate opened to an extensive temple on the south side. He came to the stone pavement twenty-four feet below the top of the wall, but the gate was still much deeper, and could only have led to some subterranean apartments under the pavement. After entering the gate he found a passage eighteen feet high and seven wide, which inclined gradually under the inclosing wall; to the right another smaller passage branched off, leading to a chamber. Opposite to this, a third he found to ascend to the open air, leading to the pavement above. The principal passage continued downward and was not further explored.

Much to be admired is the choice of the materials employed in building the temple. The large gate consists entirely of blocks of rose-colored granite. The large passage, notwithstanding its hight of eighteen feet, is from one end to the other of the same material, and the pavement is of the finest alabaster. In the small southern chamber and in the northern ascending passage the ceilings and floors are of granite, and the walls alabaster. Mariette-Bey also discovered several other passages and apartments, all built of alabaster and granite. Unfortunately he was unable to discover a single bas-relief or inscription to enable him to decide upon the age or the founder of this magnificent building. It is also to be regretted that this is again filled up with sand.

Behind the sphinx is the interior of a large tomb in the rock. But those, not before mentioned, placed in rows at the corners of the pyramids, are much more interesting. Here the princes, counselors, courtiers, and other persons of rank were interred. The tombs are of different sizes, built of block-stone with pyramidically inclined sides, but now in a state of ruin. A small door under a rounded door post opens to the east and leads to an apartment consecrated to the worship of the deceased buried there. He is represented in relief, sitting or standing on the walls; before him are numbers of offerings, plucked geese, legs of beef, etc. His wife, who stands behind, with one arm around him, is yellow, but he, being an Egyptian, is of a red brown color. In colored hieroglyphics are recounted his title, his riches, or the number of offerings brought to him. Other rooms have representations of mechanical and agricultural implements.

Other tombs are cut out horizontally on the east side of the rock on which the pyramids stand. One of the best known is the so-called tomb of Numbers, on the walls of which the rich man to whom it belonged is counting his herds. He is represented as a tall figure, leaning on his staff, with his dog by his side. The herds are cut out very small, in different rows, one over the other, and to each row the number is affixed—834 oxen, 760 asses, etc.

Having taken in a pretty good view of the pyramids, the sphinx, and the surroundings, our company divided. Six of us had ordered donkeys to meet us at the pyramids of Gizeh to convey us to the pyramids and tombs of Sakkarah, and the site of the ancient city of Memphis. This was my first experience at donkey riding, but I am bound to report them rather of a pleasant animal to ride. Their step is quick, half way between a walk and a trot; the trot itself is not hard, while the gallop is decidedly easy. Sakkarah is some six or eight miles to the south, and across the sands forming the edge of the desert. In some places it was pretty soft, and the small feet of the donkey settled in considerably. The ride was wholly novel to me, and I rather enjoyed it on that account. Off to the left we could see the verdure of the Nile region, but all around us was a desert, drear and lifeless. We passed one miserable little Arab village, at which place the dogs came after us and seemed disposed to make a meal of us, and they looked hungry and gaunt enough to have enjoyed it hugely. The donkey boys hurried up the animals, keeping them a considerable portion of the time in a gallop, so that we made the distance in less than two hours. I need not say the donkeys are small; a strong man could almost take one under each arm and walk off with them. The Frenchman, M. Lefebre, had the misfortune to fall from his, but the distance being not far, and the sand soft, it did not hurt him. The saddles for the donkey are odd; on the fore part, coming up before the rider, is a lump or ball as large as a peck-basket. I know not the purpose, but I utilized mine to hold on by when my donkey boy hurried my animal too much.

The pyramids of Sakkarah were plainly in sight from the time we left Gizeh, and the distance steadily shortened until we reached them. The pyramids of Sakkarah are eleven in number, being scattered along on the verge of the desert hill four and one-half miles by half a mile to a mile in width. A part of them, at least, are thought to be older than those we have already visited, and their looks indicate it. They seem to be gradually crumbling away. Sakkarah is the name of a small village, but the locality is a suburb of ancient Memphis, and was the great burying-place for the same.

The largest pyramid is built in stages or gradients; it is one hundred and ninety-two feet high, and contains a number of chambers and passages, but we were satisfied with an exterior view. Thirty mummies are inside, so said, but they have turned to dust. It is believed to have been built in the time of Ouenephes, the fourth king of the first dynasty, which gives it decidedly great antiquity, the greatest of any monument in the world. There is scarcely a spot in this necropolis belonging to the ancient city that has not been again and again explored and dug over. It offers a spectacle of utter devastation. Pits and mounds without number are on every side, and the fragments of pottery and building material are mixed with gravel and hard earth. Dismantled brick walls, heaps of sand mingled with stones and particles of granite, encumber the path at every step. Here and there fragments of mummy-cloths, borne along by the winds, and scattered and broken human bones occasionally are to be seen lying bleaching in the sn.

The tombs of this locality are very interesting. The Serapeum is one of them, and here were deposited the sacred bulls which the ancient Egyptians worshiped as a representative of the deity Osiris. It was one of the edifices of Memphis rendered famous by the description given of it by Strabo, as well as the frequent mention of it on the Greek papyri. It had long been sought for, and Mariette-Bey was so fortunate as to discover it in 1851. The passage in Strabo is this: "One finds also [at Memphis] a temple of Serapis in a spot so sandy that the wind causes the the sand to accumulate in heaps, under which we could see many sphinxes, some of them almost entirely buried, others only partially covered; from which we may conjecture that the route leading to this temple might be attended with danger, if one were surprised by a sudden gust of wind." Mariette-Bey, after quoting this, gives the account of his discovery thus: "If Strabo had not written this passage, in all probability the Serapeum would to this day lie buried under the sands of the necropolis of Sakkarah. In 1850 I had been commisssoned by the French government to visit the Coptic convents of Egypt, and to make an inventory of such manuscripts in oriental languages as I should find there. I noticed at Alexandria, in M. Zizinea's garden, several sphinxes. Frequently I saw more of these sphinxes at Cairo, in Clot-Bey's garden. M. Fernandez had also a certain number of such sphinxes at Gizeh. Evidently there must be somewhere an avenue of sphinxes which was being pillaged. One day, attracted to Sakkarah by my Egyptological studies, I perceived the head of one of these sphinxes obtruding itself from the sand. This one had never been touched, and was certainly in its original position. Close by lay a libation-table, on which was engraved in hieroglyphs an inscription to Osiris-Apis. The passage in Strabo suddenly occurred to my mind. The avenue which lay at my feet must be the one which led up to that Serapeum so long and so vainly sought for. But I had been sent to Egypt to make an inventory of manuscripts, not to seek for temples. My mind, however, was soon made up. Regardless of all risks, without saying a word, and almost furtively, I gathered together a few workmen, and the excavation began. The first attempts were hard, indeed, but before very long lions and peacocks, and the Grecian statues of the dromos, together with the monumental tablets or stelæ of the temple of Nectanebo, were drawn out of the sand, and I was able to announce my success to the French government, informing them, at the same time, that the funds placed at my disposal for the researches for the manuscripts were entirely exhausted, and that a further grant was indispensable. Thus was begun the discovery of Serapeum.

"The work lasted four years. The Serapeum is a temple built without any regular plan, where all was conjecture, and where the ground had to be examined closely, inch by and inch. In certain places the sand is, to speak, fluid, and presents as much difficulty in excavating, as if it were water, which ever seeks its own level. Besides all this, difficulties arose between the French and Egyptian governments which obliged me several times to discharge all my workmen. It was owing to these circumstances [to say nothing of other trials] that the work proved so long, and that I was compelled to spend four years in the desert—four years, however, I can never regret."

Apis, the living image of Osiris revisiting the earth, was a bull, who, while he lived, had his temple at Memphis, and, when dead, had his tomb at Sakkarah. The palace which the bull occupied in his lifetime was called the Apieum; the Serapeum was the name given to his tomb.

"As far as we can judge," continues Mariette-Bey, "by the remains found during our researches, the Serapeum resembled in appearance the other Egyptian temples, even those which were funereal in their character. An avenue of sphinxes led up to it, and two pylons stood before it, and it was surrounded by the usual inclosure. But what distinguished it from all other temples was that out of one of its chambers opened an inclined passage leading directly into the rock on which the temple is built, and giving access to vast subterranean vaults which were the tomb of the Apis.

"The Serapeum, properly so called, no longer exists, and where it stood there is now nothing to be seen but a vast plain of sand mingled with fragments of stones scattered about in indescribable confusion. But the most beautiful and interesting part of the subterranean vault can still be visited. The tomb of Apis consists of three distinct parts which have no direct communication with each other. The first and most ancient part carries us back as far as the eighteenth dynasty and Amenophis III. It served as the burial-place of the sacred bulls up to the end of the twentieth dynasty. Here the tombs are separate. Every dead Apis had his own sepulchral chamber hewn here and there, as it were, at random, out of the rock. These chambers are now hidden under the sand, and were never possessed of any very great interest.

"The second part comprises the tombs of Apis from the time of Sheshouk I., of the twenty-second dynasty. In this part a new system was adopted. Instead of isolated tombs, a long subterranean gallery was made, on each side of which mortuary chambers were excavated, to be used whenever Apis expired at Memphis. This gallery is also inaccessible now, the roof having in some places fallen in and the remainder not being sufficiently secure to allow of its being visited. The third part is that which is now so well known. Its history begins with Psammetichus I. of the twenty-sixth dynasty, and ends with the later Ptolemies. The same system of common vault has been followed here as in the second part, only on a much grander scale. These galleries cover an extent of 1,150 feet, and from one end to the other the great gallery measures 640 feet. Moreover, granite sarcophagi have been used here. Their number throughout the whole extent of the galleries is twenty-four. Of these only three bear any inscription, and they contain the names of Amasis of the twenty-sixth dynasty, Cambyses and Khebasch of the twenty seventh dynasty. A fourth, with cartouches without any name, most probably belongs to one of the last of the Ptolemies. As to their dimensions, they measure on an average seven feet eight inches in breadth by thirteen feet in length and eleven feet in hight, so that, allowing for the vacuum, these monoliths must weigh, one with another, not less than sixty-five tons each."

Such are the tombs of Apis, and as I walked through those extensive galleries and viewed those neatly-executed, highly-polished granite sarcophagi, placed there for the purpose of depositing dead bulls in, and this in the name of religion, I found plenty of food for thought. Of course I realized the absurdity of paying such reverence to bulls, but I remembered that religious ceremonies of nearly all kinds have been absurd. A fine specimen of a young bull, without spot or blemish—and that was the kind that was selected— conveyed to the minds of the Egyptians a symbol of creative power and vigor, and they used it to personify their favorite god Osiris, and the bull was not the only animal used in this way; the cow, the ram, the hawk, the dove, and many other animals and birds have been regarded as sacred. Christians have not been behind in this matter; they consider their God to be a lamb and thousands of times call him by that name. "The Lamb of God" is one of his highest titles, and whether a lamb represents divinity better than a bull or a cow may be a mere matter of taste on the part of the worshiper. If the Christian God indeed is a lamb, it is but a fair inference that his father is an old sheep of the masculine gender; so, if Osiris is represented by numerous bulls, perhaps he ought to be regarded as a bully fellow.

The exploration of this tomb furnished science with unhoped-for results; for what is now seen of it is merely its skeleton. "But the fact is," as Mariette-Bey says, "although it had been rifled by the early Christians, the tomb, when first discovered, still possessed nearly all that it had ever contained that was not gold or other precious matter. There existed a custom which had especially contributed to enrich the tomb with valuable documents. On certain days in the year, or on the occasion of the death and funeral rites of an Apis, the inhabitants of Memphis came to pay a visit to the god in his burial-place. In memory of this act of piety they left a stela, that is, a square-shaped stone rounded on the top, which was let into one of the walls of the tomb, having been previously inscribed with an homage to the god in the name of his visitor and his family. Now these documents to the number of about five hundred, were found, for the most part, in their original position, and as many of them were dated according to the fashion of the time, that is, with the year, month, and day of the reigning king, a comparison of these inscribed tablets must necessarily prove of the greatest importance, especially in fixing chronology."

TOMBS OF TIH AND OF PHTAH HOTEP.

The next points visited were the above-named tombs of the ancient empire in which the necropolis of Sakkarah is so rich. As a rule a tomb of the ancient empire may be recognized externally by a small building having the form of a mastabah, a sort of pyramid, truncated near the base, and which from a distance presents the appearance of an enormous sarcophagus lid. This mastabah consists of three parts; viz., 1. One or more chambers, sometimes with the addition of a serdab, a sort of narrow passage concealed in the thickness of the masonry—these chambers being accessible at all times through a doorway opening up on one of the streets of the necropolis. 2. A vertical opening out of one of the chambers. 3. A sepulchral chamber hollowed out in the rock, wherein the mummy reposes. The serdab never bears any inscription; the chambers, on the contrary, are almost always decorated, and these representations are too interesting not to arrest attention.

It is a noticeable feature that the general appearance of the place is as little funereal as can well be imagined. In some instances an army of strange fantastic gods has invaded the walls of a chamber. The dead are seen in the other world, and in a world peopled with beings difficult to describe. Here, however, there is nothing of this kind, as no figures of divinities are to be seen on the walls; the dead is in this world and not in the other. He is represented as standing or seated, with the staff of office in his hands, his wife is by his side, and his children close by; his servants are standing before him, and it altogether looks as though he were still in this world.

These tombs are large, square, underground chambers, ten to fifteen feet in hight and of different sizes the other ways. The walls are of square, smooth stone or they are covered with a kind of plaster very hard and made very smooth. This surface is covered with figures, inscriptions, and hieroglyphics, and to study them and know what they mean, not only requires a key, but takes a good deal of time. The name and titles of the dead are set forth, followed, perhaps, by an invocation to Anubis, the guardian of tombs, who is entreated to grant to the departed a worthy sepulture after a long and happy life; to befriend the defunct during his journey through the regions beyond the grave; and to secure to him through all eternity the proper paying of the funeral gifts.

The tomb of Tih gives many scenes relating to the personage while still living. He is in his home. Some women of his house are dancing before him; musicians are playing on various instruments, and singers accompany them, beating time with their hands. On the northern wall of the large chamber the dead man is represented shooting in the marshes; he is standing upright on a bark made of papyrus reeds; with one hand he holds some call-birds, and with the other he lets fly, over the acquatic birds dispersed among the tall reeds, a curved stick which whirls round and round. Crouching in the water on which the bark is sailing are hippopotami and crocodiles. Some of his servants are trying to catch them. A combat is represented between the aquatic animals in which the crocodile is vanquished. Close by a servant of the household is hooking a hippopotamus with a harpoon. Another scene represents the shooting of certain aquatic birds by the servants of the deceased. There are also many charming representations of country life. Cows are passing over a ford; calves are feeding in a meadow; herdsmen are conducting a flock of goats. Equally interesting are the agricultural pictures on the eastern wall of the same chamber. The grain is reaped; it is gathered into stacks; it is threshed and bound into sheaves, with which asses are laden. At each of these scenes the departed is present, either seated or standing in the attitude of command. He supervises the building of his barks, and also superintends cabinet makers who are making furniture for his house. Elsewhere large ships are seen with distended sails, and barks manned by rowers float on the Nile, bent on errands in his service. The dead appears to be leading a happy life, and everything is prosperous around him. He is surrounded by his family and servants and reaches a good old age.

There are also scenes relating to the death of the departed. He is standing erect in a bark, watching the conveyance of his own mummy into the necropolis; and this is about all that has anything of a funereal character about it. In one of the chambers scenes are portrayed where funeral gifts are being brought in; quite a long cortege of persons are bearing bread, wine, the produce of the fields, and parts of slaughtered animals. Two of the smaller chambers are covered with representations of this character, servants are carrying on their heads or shoulders, or on their extended hands, victuals, flowers, and trays laden with vases. In one part they are slaughtering bullocks intended to constitute an important part of the funeral gifts. In the interior of the tomb, on the lowest register of the northern wall, is a long file of women driving various animals and carrying cuffes or frail baskets on their heads. The various farms of the deceased are thus symbolized, and are made to contribute to the accomplishment of the ceremony for bringing in those offerings which are intended to figure in kind within the innermost chamber of the tomb.

Scenes of this description are also most vividly conveyed in the tomb of Phtah-Hotep. There, on the western wall, the dead man is seated, and before him passes a regular procession of servants, bringing offerings. At their head march a company of priests chanting sacred hymns, and following them are other servants of the household heaping upon a table the offerings thus being brought in. Phtah-Hotep himself receives the gifts and carries to his lips a vase containing one of the substances which make up the assortment of gifts.

Of course but a small portion of these representations can be alluded to. The chambers are numerous and the walls are completely covered all the way up with these carefully-cut inscriptions, colored with delicate tints and marked with great artistic skill. One is filled with wonder at the magnitude of the labor and the talent represented. Some of the figures are cut in the stone, but they are usually left up in relief, while the surrounding part of the stone is cut away. The vault in which the mummy is deposited is below the chambers described, sometimes in a pit like a square shaft and sometimes being reached by an incline, like a pyramid. The relatives of the departed are not supposed to have visited the pit where the mummy was deposited, but held their meetings in the chambers above.

What has been here partially described is the interior of a mastabah, on a level originally with the surrounding plain, but now greatly covered by the sand. A place for entrance has been excavated so as to giv the tomb decidedly a subterranean appearance. But one thing is observable in all these inscriptions, there is nothing mournful or sad about them; those ancient people seemed to take a cheerful view even of death. The deceased is represented in his house, surrounded by his friends and the members of his household. And what is more, these tombs were often prepared by the direction of the person himself while still in a state of good health.

Diodorus says the Egyptians call their habitations hostelries, because of the short space of time during which they sojourn there, whilst they speak of their tombs as eternal abodes. This is very evident from the great expense and labor they went to to make their tombs permanent and to decorate them so as to make them cheerful and attractive. A belief in a soul and a future life was the basis of their religious faith. No people had a stronger belief in a continued existence after death, nor in the sure results of a good or bad life.

MEMPHIS.

From the necropolis to the site of the ancient city of Memphis is hardly half an hour's ride, and the way leads over a causeway or embankment of soil thrown up, not unlike the track of a railroad on low ground. It is some ten feet above the surrounding fields, which are luxuriant with the growing crops. Upon leaving the embankment we rode directly through hundreds of acres where Memphis once stood. The city is said to have been known to the Hebrews by the name of Noph, thought to be a contraction of one of the Egyptian names for it, Men Nefru (pyramid city). It was the capital of Egypt at the time Abraham is said to have lived. Jeremiah is said to have meant Memphis when he said, "Noph shall be waste and desolate, without an inhabitant;" and again, "O daughter of Egypt, make ready that which can serve thee in thy captivity, because Memphis shall become a desert; she shall be forsaken and become uninhabitable." Jerry was partly right and partly wrong. The old city is "desolate" enough, but it is not a desert, nor even uninhabitable. The fact that the village of Mitrahenny stands upon the very site of the old city proves that it is not "uninhabitable," while the groves of luxuriant palm-trees all around, and the splendid growth of wheat, clover, lentils—the best I have yet seen—proves that it is not a desert. But those old Jewish prophets missed the mark oftener than they hit it. Of course it is desert where the necropolis is, and so it was when Jeremiah lived.

There are not many antiquities to be seen on the site of Memphis; everything portable has been taken away. Here is the lake of the temple of Phtah (Vulcan), a large stela commemorating the services rendered to the temple of Phtah by Apries in the twenty-sixth dynasty; broken remains of small statues, and a colossal statue of Ramses II., of red granite, lying with his face to the earth in a hollow place filled with water nine months in the year. This statue was presented by Mahomed Ali to the English government, but probably they found it too heavy to remove, though the ancient Egyptians conveyed it six hundred miles. From the site it is but half an hour's ride to the station of Bedreshayn, on the Upper Egypt Railroad, where we exchanged the donkey for the train, the donkeys also taking the cars. After waiting an hour, the train for Cairo came along, and in another hour or more we were at our hotel, feeling pretty well wearied, but satisfied that we had witnessed during that day most remarkable mementoes of a past race of people who lived many thousand years ago.

HELIOPOLIS.

December 15th.—The same company of us who were together yesterday at Sakkarah and Memphis chartered a carriage, and rode out to the site of the old city of Heliopolis, some four or five miles northeast of Cairo, and twenty north from the old city of Memphis. The ride was through groves and avenues of accacia and palm-trees, with beautiful fields under cultivation. On the way we saw several flocks of the white ibis, one of the sacred birds of ancient Egypt, belonging to the heron family. It has long legs and a long bill, adapted to picking up their food from the water or the soil, and is of a pure white color. They are a third larger than white pigeons, and taller and slimmer. We passed a very large military station, used as barracks, where Abbas-Pasha hid himself, in constant dread of assassination, and the plain where Selim extinguished the Mameluke dynasty in 1517; where also Kleber defeated the Turks in 1800.

The village of Mattareeah, which we passed, marks the site of the gardens to which Cleopatra is said to have transplanted the celebrated Balm of Gilead. These gardens were long famous for this thorny shrub. Here is also the miraculous fountain, which is alleged to once have been salt, but which was made soft and sweet by the Virgin Mary washing the diapers of the little Jesus in it at the time she made her visit to Egypt. It seems there was nothing about Jesus that did not possess the most remarkabla virtues. We also stopped at the great sycamore-tree, called the Virgin's tree, under which the holy family rested, and where it is thought the Virgin dried the diapers she had just washed at the fountain. It is a very wide-branching tree, and affords shade enough for nearly a thousand people if they stand compactly together. It is barely possible that the little deposit left by the infant Jesus had something to do with the old sycamore's growing to its large size. This old tree story is a Coptic Christian legend. The Roman Catholics say there is not a word of truth in it, and I am inclined to think that for once the Catholics tell the truth. If Joseph, Mary, and Jesus, as Luke says, did not come to Egypt, it is not very likely they sat under this tree; and it is furthermore likely that the Virgin's fountain was water from the Nile, the same as it is now, and was no more salt than at present, whether she washed her child's diapers in it or not. Thousands of the fools who have visited this tree have been anxious to make record of the same by cutting their names upon the tree, all the limbs, even, having been desecrated in that way. Our company did not commit this folly, but I bought some of the mandarin oranges growing on the ground and we partook of them.

Heliopolis was called An in Egyptian, and On in Hebrew. It was preëminently the city of Ra, or the sun, hence the Greek name Heliopolis. In ancient times it was a sacerdotal city—the Oxford of those times—and enjoyed the reputation of great learning. It had its colleges of priests; and here Solon, Plato, and Eudoxus studied. It was not a populous city, for by a census taken under Rameses III. it is said to have contained twelve thousand. Strabo speaks of it as a city "of barbarous construction." Probably it resembled the architecture of the temple of Armachis at the pyramids of Gizeh, proving it to have existed under the ancient empire. Usertasen's obelisk is still standing here, which connects it with the twelfth dynasty; and some stones excavated by Mariette-Bey in 1858 show that Thothmes III. enlarged one of its temples. When the city began is a question not easily settled. It had become a ruin in the time of Strabo, who wrote just before our era. He visited it and found it little more than a wilderness; and nothing now remains but the inclosing wall of the principal temple and the obelisk which stands in the center, with heaps of rubbish all around, probably the remains of ancient buildings. When the people of Egypt gave up their old religion and embraced Christianity, they made use of the ancient sacred edifices as habitations, and the precincts of the temples, until then considered inviolable and holy, were covered with the dwellings of the people. The ruins, then, that surround the obelisk at Heliopolis are not the ruins of the ancient city, but those of the Coptic town which rose upon the downfall of the ancient religion. The obelisk has peculiar interest in that it is the oldest in Egypt. It bears, in fact, the cartouches of Usertasen I., the second king of the twelfth dynasty. It has hieroglyphics on its four sides, and the execution was of an excellent character. The granite is still well preserved. It is a monolith, sixty-six feet high, and was brought fully six hundred miles. It formerly had a companion obelisk, but it fell and broke in the twelfth century, and has entirely disappeared. The two stood in front of the temple. As with Memphis, so, probably, also with Heliopolis; they were too near the younger and growing city of Cairo. As it came up and flourished, they were destined to go down.

THE MUSEUM OF ANTIQUITIES.

It is a good afternoon's work to visit the museum of Boulak, one of the suburbs of the city, a place of unusual interest. Much is due to Mariette-Bey for this collection of the antiquities of the country, for he did much toward gathering them. Many of the specimens he excavated and discovered himself. For a long time the museum was under his charge, his interest in the antiquities of Egypt confessedly being greater than that of any other man, and now his tomb is in the grounds in front of the museum—a most fitting place for the bones of the antiquarian to rest. When Bayard Taylor visited this conntry he wrote the following relative to the labors of this indefatigable man:

"Now we can say, without fear of contradiction, the most valuable Egyptian museum in the world is in Cairo. That which was previously carried away being for the most part easily accessible, proves to belong to the latter rather than to the earlier dynasties. Unwearied digging has enabled Mariette to reach the records of the ancient empire, and show what we never before suspected, that the glory of Egyptian art belongs to the age of Cheops, and only its decadence to Rameses II. Not only the art, but the culture, the religion, the political organization of Egypt are carried back to the third dynasty, 4,450 years before Christ, and Menes, the first historic king, dawns upon our knowledge, not as a primitive barbarian, but as the result of a long stage of unrecorded development. I do not hesitate to say that since Champollion discovered the key to the hieroglyphics, no scholar has thrown such a broad and clear light upon Egyptian life and history as Mariette."

I have no catalogue by me, and will be unable to give anything like a correct statement of what this museum contains, as several large rooms are filled with the art and handiwork of the people who dwelt in this land from four to six thousand years ago; but the collection comprises sarcophagi, statues of gods and kings, monuments, stones with inscriptions, basreliefs, stelæ with inscriptions, coffins, and mummies, tables of funeral oblation, funeral objects, historical objects, religious objects, civil objects, jewels of different kings, diadems, jewelry in great variety, with many, many things I cannot remember.

Of the main vestibule containing the larger share of the statues, and crowded with precious relics, but a faint idea can be given. It is undoubtedly the finest collection of Egyptian relics in the world. The British museum is rich in Egyptian antiquities, but this museum at Cairo must take the palm. The attention of the visitor is at once drawn to two life-size statues of painted limestone, which from their pedestals seem to overlook and guard the lesser and later remains. They are nude, save a cloth, folded in front like an apron, which falls from the hips to the knees. The arms and legs are perhaps somewhat stiffly modeled, but quite free from the rigidity which many other statues exhibit. The hands, feet, and joints show careful study of nature, as well as of the subject. The trunks are well rendered, and the heads are really amazing in their correct embodiment of life and character. They have no prescribed stolidity of expression in closed lips, steadfast eyes, and hands resting flatly on the knees as in the statues chiseled perhaps ten thousand years later. "They beam with a frank, free, naive expression of nature, and exhibit the activity of an art which is just about to overcome the last stubborn resistance of the material. There is no representation of motion, as in the crowning days of Greek sculpture; the figures stand or sit, but you feel that a slight effort would enable them to rise and walk."

Among the statues may be named the busts of Tirkahah, Menephthah, statues of Ramefer, Ti, a prophet of Ammon, Cephrenes, two of Osiris, a priest, Ra-en-ma, and very many others. The collection of divinities, little and big, with the religious emblems and symbols would make a large catalogue of themselves. Among the gods are Osiris and Isis, Nephthys, the Bull Apis, Horus, the divine son of the virgin Isis, Anubia, with a jackal's head, ibis-headed Thoth, with many other gods and goddesses too numerous to mention, even had I them in mind. The devil is here also. Possibly Satan always comes also. The Egyptians had their evil one, Typhon, a thousand years before Christians had a devil or an existence themselves. The figure of Isis and Horus, the virgin, are various, and of all sizes. These are four thousand years old, and though other nations had similar conceptions, here was certainly a sufficient origin for the conception which Christians much later adopted.

Among the historical objects are vases found with the mummy of Queen Aah-Hotep, a silver model of a boat and its rowers; fifteen royal heads, scores of sculptured models, etc., etc. Among the civil objects, persons kneading bread, arms and weapons, arrows with bone tips, articles of furniture, utensils, vases, lamps, vestments, mechanical implements of many kinds, specimens of ceramic art, colored representations of animals, numerous objects of glass and porcelain, combs, rings, perfume-boxes, mirrors, bracelets of many materials, gold chains, an ax-handle of gilded cedar adorned with precious stones, gilded bronze, gold dagger and case, necklaces, a picture of Ammon and Phre pouring water on the head of Amosis, Egyptian carriages, alabaster statues, an innumerable quantity of small articles—scarabees, cartouches, etc., etc. All these things tell very much of the history of the past ages, if one only had time to study them all up and to learn all about them.

Perhaps the most interesting part of this collection of antiquities is the large number of mummies and various other articles discovered in a deep pit in a secluded place in the rock, six months ago, four hundred and twenty-five miles up the Nile, opposite Karnac and Luxor, the site of ancient Thebes. The following article published in the Scientific American of September 10th last (sent me by a friend) tells the whole story very correctly. When the mummies of those royal personages, most exquisitely done up, are lying before one it makes him feel as though he was indeed having a visit with the ancients:

"GREAT FIND OF EGYPTIAN RELICS.

"A discovery of great importance to Egyptologists, and of no little popular interest, is reported by a Cairo correspondent of the London Times. The finds include not only the largest and most beautiful papyri yet discovered, but also the mummies of no less than thirty royal personages, among them Kings Thothmes III. and Rameses II. These names have lately been made familiar to our readers in connection with the obelisk lately transferred from Alexandria to Central Park. It was the former who ordered the construction of the obelisk, and the latter who, 270 years later, caused to be inscribed on its faces his own official titles and honors. These two monarchs have been removed to the Boulak Museum, where they lie side by side, and even the flowers and garlands which were placed in their coffins may to-day be seen encircling the masks which cover the faces of the deceased just as they were left by the mourners over three thousand years ago.

"The story of the discovery runs as follows: Last June, Daoud Pasha, governor of the Province of Keneh, which includes the ancient Theban district, noticed that the Bedouins offered for sale an unusual quantity of antiquities at absurdly low prices. The pasha soon discovered that the source of their hidden treasure was situated in a gorge of the mountain range which separates Deir-el-Bahari from the Bab-el-Melouk. This gorge is situated about four miles from the Nile to the east of Thebes. Daoud Pasha at once telegraphed to the khedive, who forthwith dispatched to the spot Herr Emil Brugsch, a younger brother of Dr. Henry Brugsch Pasha, who, during M. Maspero's absence in Paris, is in charge of all archæological excavations in Egypt. Herr Brugsch discovered in the cliffs of the Libyan Mountains, near the temple of Deir el-Bahari, or the 'Northern Convent,' a pit about thirty-five feet deep, cut in the solid rock; a secret opening from this pit led to a gallery nearly two hundred feet long also hewn out of the solid rock. This gallery was filled with relics of the Theban dynasties. Every indication leads to the conviction that these sacred relics had been removed from their appropriate places in the various tombs and temples, and concealed in this subterranean gallery by the Egyptian priests to preserve them from being destroyed by some foreign invader. In all probability they were thus concealed at the time of the invasion of Egypt by Cambyses.

"Herr Brugsch at once telegraphed for a steamer, which on Friday last safely deposited her precious cargo at the Boulak Museum. The full value of this discovery, of course, cannot as yet be determined. The papyri have not yet been unrolled, nor have the mummies been unwrapped. Conspicuous by its massive gold ornamentation, in which cartouches are set in precious stones, is the coffin containing the mummy of Maut Nedjem, a daughter of King Rameses II. Each of the mummies is accompanied by an alabaster canopic urn, containing the heart and entrails of the deceased.

Four papyri were found in the gallery at Deir-el-Bahari, each in a perfect state of preservation. The largest of these papyri—that found in the coffin of Queen Ra-ma-ka—is most beautifully illustrated with colored illuminations. It is about sixteen inches wide, and when unrolled will probably measure from one hundred to one hundred and forty feet in length. The other papyri are somewhat narrower, but are more closely written upon. These papyri will probably prove to be the most valuable portion of the discovery, for in the present state of Egyptology a a papyrus may be of more importance than an entire temple, and, as the late Mariette-Bey used to say: 'It is certain that if ever one of those discoveries that bring about a revolution in science should be made in Egyptology, the world will be indebted for it to a papyrus.'

"No less than 3,700 mortuary statues have been found which bear royal cartouches and inscriptions. Nearly 2,000 other objects have been discovered. One of the most remarkable relics is an enormous leather tent, which bears the cartouche of King Pinotem, of the twenty-first dynasty. This tent is in a truly wonderful state of preservation. The workmanship is beautiful. It is covered with hieroglyphs most carefully embroidered in red, green, and yellow leather. The colors are quite fresh and bright. In each of the corners is represented the royal vulture and stars.

"The following Theban sovereigns are the most important of those whose mummies Herr Brugsch has identified:

"Aahmes I. (Amosis), first king of eighteenth dynasty, reigned 1700 B. C. (about).

"Amenhotep I. (Amenophis), second king of eighteenth dynasty, reigned 1666 B. C. (about).

"Thothmes I., third king of eighteenth dynasty, reigned 1633 B. C. (about).

"Thothmes II., fourth king of eighteenth dynasty, reigned 1600 B. C. (about).

"Thothmes III. (the Great), fifth king of eighteenth dynasty, reigned 1600 B. C. (about).

"Rameses I., first king of nineteenth dynasty, reigned 1400 B. C. (about).

"Seti I., second king of the nineteenth dynasty, reigned 1366 B. C. (about).

"Rameses II. (the Great), third king of the nineteenth dynasty, reigned 1333 B. C. (about).

"Pinotem, third king of the twenty-first dynasty, reigned 1033 B. C. (about).

"Raskhenen (dynasty and date of reign unknown).

"Queen Ra-ma-ka (Hatasou?)

"Queen Aahmes Nefert Ari.

"A correspondent of the London Post adds the following details about the recent discoveries in Egypt: 'The place where these precious relics were found is an almost inaccessible cave in the face of the perpendicular mountain, in another part of which the royal cemetery, known as Bab-el-Melouk, is excavated, and not far from Deir-el-Bahari. The most remarkable of the four thousand objects are thirty-six royal sarcophagi, with their inner cases and mummies intact, belonging to Pharaohs, queens, princes, princesses, and high priests of the seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, and twenty-first dynasties, so that we are actually in possession of the lifeless bodies of many heroes, who, upward of three thousand years ago, ruled over this country and adorned it with temples and obelisks which are the wonder and admiration of the whole civilized world. Among them is that of Seti I., whose tomb in the Bab-el-Melouk was discovered by Belzoni, but that explorer found neither coffin nor mummy, only the large alabaster sarcophagus now in the Soane Museum, which was made to contain and preserve them. Next in importance we have the plain but highly polished wooden coffin of Rameses II, the Sesostris of the Greeks, with the mummy intact, the royal cartouche distinctly legible on the coffin-lid and on the mummy cloths enveloping the body. The mummy cases of Amosis, son of Amousa, of Thothmes I., II., and III., of Queen Ra-ma-ka and her daughter Mout-em-hat, of King Raskhenen, of Aahmes Nefert Ari, of Aah-Hotep, of Rameses I., and of Amenophis, are also in the collection, with the mummies in perfect preservation. The majority of these mummies are inclosed in two coffins, both elaborately ornamented with paintings and gildings, some of them having also certain ornaments inlaid with colored glass, and many of the faces have glass eyes, which give them a most lifelike appearance. Another remarkable object is a royal tent made of colored leather in a checkered pattern of red and green. The inner side of the dome is of blue leather, with yellow stars, and the hieroglyphic inscriptions are perforated in the colored leather with a backing of yellow. Fifteen royal wigs for state occasions are also in the collection. Besides the human mummies we find one of a gazelle, which was probably a favorite playmate of one of the Egyptian princes or princesses. We have also four scrolls of papyrus of great size, on which is inscribed the ritual of the dead, elaborately illuminated, and containing the cartouches of of the royal persons for whom they were written, one of whom is Queen Hatasou, sister of Thothmes III. Moreover, we have several sets of canopic vases in alabaster, with royal names engraved on the outer surface, 3,700 funereal statuettes, and many other objects of interest. The position of the cave is an almost inaccessible part of the mountain, the well, thirty-six feet deep, communicating by a gallery of two hundred and fifty feet in length, with a rough-hewn chamber, and the confused state in which all these objects of veneration were found, heaped one on another, and strewn about on the ground, lead Mr. Brugsch to the very plausible inference that they had been by friendly hands collected from the various tombs and concealed in this place of safety at the time of some threatened foreign invasion.'"

UP THE NILE.

Saturday, Dec. 17th.—Of course it would not do to think of leaving Egypt without maing a trip up the Nile to see more of the valley of that wonderful river, to visit the sites of some of the ancient cities of Upper Egypt, the ruins of the remarkable temples, the colossal statues, the obelisks, the tombs of the ancient kings, and, besides, the very place whence were taken, a few months ago, the extraordinary collection of royal mummies and antiquities just described. So we readily secured tickets at a cost of eighty dollars each—that is, six of our company, M. Lefebre, Mr. Getz, Mr. Wetmore, Miss Rose, Mr. Bridges, and myself. Mr. James, Mrs. Moots, and Miss Brayman declining to accompany us, they taking leave of us previous to our setting out.

Last evening at six o'clock, we were at the Boulak station, which is some three miles from our hotel, and took the night train on the Upper Egypt Railroad as far as Assioot, some 229 miles from Cairo. We were ten hours making that distance, showing not very rapid speed, arriving at Assioot at four o'clock this morning. Some Arabs were in readiness to take charge of our baggage, and we walked down to the little Nile post steamer, where we now are. The ride per cars was not a very pleasant one, as the air was very chilly and the road dusty. As it never rains in this country, it has a very good right to be dusty. Our road followed the Nile, of course, and we passed a considerable number of villages, at many of which we stopped, and any number of groves of palm-trees; but as I know little or nothing of the villages, and not very much about about the palm-trees, it will not be necessary for me to detain you with a description of them.

Having slept little or none on the train we were quite willing to betake ourselves at once to our state-rooms, and retire to bed, where, at least, we got warm and slept some. We soon knew, by the rumbling of the engine and machinery, as well as the tremor of the boat, that we had started, and were really on our way up the Nile. But, sad to state, at nine o'clock in the morning we are moored to the east bank of the Nile, and are told that the boat has sprung a leak, and we will have to wait a few hours for another boat to arrive from Assioot. This is not a very cheering prospect for would-be Nile navigators, but we try to make the best of it, hoping all will end well. It is a beautiful morning; the chilliness of the night is gone, and the sun is as bright and the air as balmy as the first of June. The scenery along the narrow Nile valley is very pretty, with the green crops giving the country a verdant appearance, the never-ending, towering palms, with the sterile desert mountains stretching from south to north on both sides of the river, sometimes six miles back, and sometimes coming even to the river on one side. The river craft are gliding up and down, principally by sail, in what are called barges; they are rigged very different from sailing-vessels in our country; there is one moderate-sized mast, and a long yard, from thirty to forty feet in length, crosses the mast, perhaps thirty feet up, in an oblique direction, much as a well-sweep crosses the upright post, and from this long yard the single sail depends. It is a cheap style of rigging, but the sail catches the wind nicely, and takes the craft along at a fair speed, even when going up-stream against the current. They are often seen, loaded with produce of various kinds, going to market.

There is a finer kind of craft for pleasure traveling, with a deck and cabin, which also goes by sail. They will accommodate twenty passengers or more, though a few persons often charter them for private excursions. The name of them is dahabeah, though sometimes spelt differently. Many excursionists have gone up to the first and second cataract in this craft, and it is a pleasant way of traveling if one has a plenty of time and money.

ABOUT ANCIENT EGYPT.

While we are waiting here for the leak to be stopped, or for another boat to take us off, I will, for your benefit, draw some from Mariette-Bey's work on Egypt touching its early history, the dynasties that existed, how long ago they flourished, and some of his ideas concerning hieroglyphics. It is doubtful if I can put my time in to any better advantage. He says that all the monuments to be found up the Nile belong to that civilization which flourished on the banks of the Nile, and which, from beginning to end, used hieroglyphics as its form of writing, and that, for the interpretation and understanding of these monuments, science avails herself of three different sources. As a matter of course, the first and principal source is afforded by the monuments themselves, the undeniable witnesses and often the contemporaries of the events they relate. After them comes Manetho, an Egyptian priest, who wrote a history of Egypt in Greek; the third and last place being assigned to the Greek and Roman authors who traveled in Egypt, or who wrote about it from hearsay.

Of the monuments, he says they are at once many and various. Some are still in Egypt. Some have found their way to the museums of many other countries. It will not be necessary to make an inventory of those which have been taken out of the country, but rather be satisfied with supplying a few data upon the temples and tombs, the only monuments which the visitor to upper Egypt will meet with on his way. The ruins of cities will hardly be included in the list, for they have so completely passed away that only here and there a few shapeless mounds are to be seen.

OF TEMPLES.

A complete temple consists of the edifice properly so-called, and an enciente, or surrounding wall. The temple is of stone, the outer wall is of large crude bricks, and is very high and very thick. When the entrance-gate is closed, nothing whatever can be heard or seen of what is taking place inside. It would be a mistake to look upon an Egyptian temple in the light of a church, or even of a Greek temple. Here no public worship is performed; the faithful do not congregate for public prayers; indeed no one is admitted inside except the priests. The temple is a royal proscynem, or ex voto, that is, a token of piety from the king who erected it in order to deserve the favor of the gods. It is a kind of royal oratory, and nothing more. In fact, this circumstance can alone explain the profuse decorations that cover the temples. Let it be borne in mind that the principle of the decoration is the picture; that several pictures are ranged symmetrically side by side, and that several series of pictures, disposed in tiers one above the other, cover the walls of the chambers from top to bottom. Such is the invariable arrangement. As to the meaning of the pictures it is everywhere the same. The king on one side and one or more divinities on the other—such is the sole subject of the composition. The king presents an offering (a table laden with victuals, flowers, fruits, and emblems), and solicits a favor from the god. In answer the god grants the gift that is prayed for. The decorations of the temples, therefore, consists of nothing more than an act of adoration from the king repeated under every possible form. Thus the temple is the exclusively personal monument of the king by whom it was founded or decorated. Indeed, this accounts for the presence of those most invaluable battle-scenes with which the external walls of certain temples are adorned. It is to the god and to his protection that the king chiefly ascribes his victories. In fighting the enemies of Egypt, and in bringing them in chains into the temples, the king has done an act grateful to the gods, just as he has in offering them incense, flowers, and the limbs of sacrificed animals. He therein gives proof of his piety, and is all the more deserving of the favors which the construction of the temple is intended to secure.

The Egyptian temples are always dedicated to three gods. It is what Champollion calls the triad—a trinity. The first is the male principle, the second the female principle, and the third the offspring of the other two. But these three deities are blended into one. The father engenders himself in the womb of the mother, and thus becomes at once his own father and his own son. Thereby are expressed the uncreatedness and the eternity of the being who has had no beginning and who shall have no end. The similarity between this theory and that of other religions, not omitting the modern one, must be seen at a glance.

The worship consists of prayers recited within the temple in the name of the king, and above all, of processions. In these processions, which the king is supposed to head, are carried the insignia of the gods, the coffers in which their statues are inclosed, and also the sacred barks, which latter are generally deposited in the temple, to be brought out on fete days. In the middle, concealed under a veil, stands the coffer within which lies the emblem that none must see. The processions are commonly held within the temples; they generally ascend the terraces, and sometimes spread themselves inside the inclosure away from the profane gaze, as already indicated. On rare occasions the processions may be seen leaving the city and winding their way, either along the Nile or along a canal called the Sacred Canal, toward some other city more or less distant. Close to every temple is a lake. In all probability the lake played an important part in the processions, and the sacred barks were deposited there, at least while the fetes lasted.

Of the tombs, he says they are situated in the desert or on the side of a mountain more or less distant from the river. This accounts for their being relatively so well preserved. Less conspicuous than the houses of cities and the temples, they have been less exposed to devastation. . . . The decorations of the tombs are in accordance with certain laws, which vary according to the period, or according to that part of the tomb which is to be ornamented. The well, the vault, the serdab are always without inscription. The stone sarcophagi and the wooden coffins of the mummies are often adorned with a vast amount of texts, interspersed with illustrations. All splendor of ornamentation was reserved for the chamber of the outer building.

It is not easy to point out the precise meaning of the decorations of the tombs of the ancient empire. The defunct is evidently at home. He fishes, he hunts; his servants bring him the product of his lands; dancing is held before him; his wife and children are by his side. But was it intended to represent the deceased as still of this world? And was it the object of the representations on the wall to preserve to us the remembrance of what he was during his lifetime? Or is he already in the other world, and according to the somewhat naive promise made to the Egyptians, will he continue in that other world to lead the same sort of life he led here? We cannot discuss that question now. All we can say is that the promises of which we have just spoken are real; the departed will some day live again in the plenitude of his faculties; he will have need of the same objects; he will occupy himself with the same interests; again will his family and his servants be by his side. But never again will he suffer pain nor be in apprehension of death. This seems to be the main idea which has presided at the decoration of the tombs under the ancient empire.

But a little later the decoration changes in its character; the defunct must prove that he had gained the immortality which is promised him, and that by his merits he had deserved it. The journey of the soul in the subterranean regions, the ordeals which it has to undergo, and its judgment are the subjects which adorn the walls of the chambers in the exterior building. No more do we behold the varied scenes of hunting and fishing, and of labor in the fields. In their place appears the mournful procession of infernal deities. The dead are represented as leading in the other world that domesticated and pastoral life which Egyptians regarded as the highest state of felicity.

Upon the subject of historical writers our author begins with Manetho, saying he was an Egyptian priest who lived in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, about the year 263 of our era, and who wrote a history of Egypt in Greek, in which he introduced a full list of all the kings who ever reigned on the banks of the Nile from the most remote period to the conquest of Alexander. This history is lost, but the lists are preserved in the works of Georgius Syncellus, a Byzantine historian of the eighth century, who had borrowed them from the Chronicle of Eusebius and from the Chronography of Julius Africanus. It is hardly necessary to point out here of what importance those lists are. If in every particular they are not fully to be relied upon, so far as the accuracy of figures is concerned which mark the duration of the different reigns and dynasties, those figures have been rearranged by the Christian authors who copied them from the original work; and, moreover, it may be surmised that the names of some kings have been changed or invented Be that as it may, if for one moment we suppose that the lists of Manetho had been entirely lost, through whom should we have become acquainted with that previous division into dynasties? and how should we even know that it ever existed? The real names revealed by the hieroglyphic inscriptions become every day more and more numerous. How should we know in what manner to classify them at all satisfactory without the lists of Manetho? Have not these lists the advantage—an advantage never sufficiently appreciated—of showing us at least a road which we may follow?

Among the sources of the history of Egypt, the royal papyrus of Zurin, if it were complete, could alone rival Manetho in importance.

Under the head of "Classical Historians," he says that such persons as may not care to go deeply into the study of Egyptology may be content to read the Second Book of Herodotus, the First Book of Diodorus, the Seventeenth Book of Strabo, and the Treatise de Iside et Oriside, attributed to Plutarch. He further says that had we nothing but the writings of Herodotus and of Diodorus to guide us to the study of ancient Egypt, we could certainly form but a very imperfect idea of that country. Every notion of chronology is there completely upset. For instance, Herodotus places the pyramids after Rameses, which is very much like placing Charlemagne after Louis XIV. They contain stories as ridiculous as they are impossible. One must read the histories of Egypt written before the discovery of Champollion to see into what fatal errors these two writers would involve science, were no other sources of information at hand. Strabo is more trustworthy. His "Geography" contains excellent information, with no other fault than that of being rather curtailed.

Whoever may have been the author of the Treatise on Isis and Osiris, no one can enter upon the study of the Egyptian religion without an intimate acquaintance with this book. The author has borrowed with discernment from true Egyptian sources. In this world of ours, good is incessantly struggling with evil, truth with falsehood, light with darkness, and life with death. Osiris is one of the personifications of the eternal antagonism of these two oposing principles. At one moment overthrown by Typhon—the genius of evil—Osiris dies; he revives only to fall again. Out of this antagonism and the numerous explanations and illustrations drawn from the myth the pseudo-Plutarch has woven the thread of his admirable Treatise.

THE HISTORY OF EGYPT

Commences with Menes, the founder of the monarchy, and it terminates with the Emperor Theodosius, who abolished by a decree the ancient religion of the land (381 A D). During this long period Egypt was not always mistress of her destinies. She had been conquered by the shepherds, a horde of barbarians from Asia; by the Ethiopians, by the Greeks, and by the Romans, to say nothing of partial incursions of Libyan and Arabian tribes. But all these conquerors, not even excepting the Shepherds, adopted while in Egypt the religion, the arts, language, and customs, of the conquered people, and their names figure in the official register of the king of the country.

To establish some order in the endless list of kings who reigned from the time of Menes to that of Theodosius, one generally divides them, after Manetho's method, into royal families or dynasties, and those dynasties are in their turn distinguished from each other either by the name of the favorite nation which furnished the kings, or by the name of the city which served as capital in the time of such dynasty. Thus there is the Greek dynasty, the Mephite, the Theban, etc. From Menes to Theodosius there are as many as thirty-four different dynasties. Another and a wider division has been made. Taking into consideration certain important events and certain modifications introduced into the general economy of the kingdom, the entire history of Egypt has been divided into four main stems.

1. The first comprises the first ten dynasties, and is called the Ancient Empire. The Ancient Empire belongs to a period so prodigiously remote that it is literally lost in the obscurity of ages. Its existence actually ceases before Abraham is born. The ancient empire spreads entirely over the fourth, the fifth, and part of the sixth dynasties. Before and after that all is confusion, or rather darkness. This is the age of the pyramids. It is a remarkable fact that the art of the statuary and of the sculptor reached a degree of perfection under the Ancient Empire which it was never again able to attain.

2. The second extends over those centuries that elapsed between the eleventh dynasty and the eighteenth. This is the Middle Empire. The Middle Empire had already been some time in existence when Abraham was born. Joseph is supposed to have been governor under the last king of the Middle Empire. Of the whole of this period, however, the twelfth dynasty and the shepherd kings alone need be remembered. The twelfth dynasty is made famous by the tombs of Beni Hassan. As to the shepherds or Hyksos, they give their name to the most lamentable period of Egyptian history—a period of 511 years, during which the national homogeneity is utterly broken, and Asiatic invaders lord it over the most flourishing provinces in the kingdom.

3. The third stem is called the New Empire. It commences with the eighteenth dynasty and terminates with Alexander. The most brilliant epoch in the New Empire, that of which the most frequent and glorious traces are met with during a voyage on the Nile, corresponds to the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties. It is the age of Thothmes, the Amenophises, and the Rameseses. It is also the time of Moses (nineteenth dynasty). But this brilliancy was not to last, and when Shishak (twenty-second dynasty) took Jerusalem the decline of Egypt had already begun.

4. The fourth stem, to which the general name of Lower Period is given, includes the Greek dynasty founded by Alexander, and that of the Roman emperors who were kings of Egypt by the same right as Cambyses and Darius. The history of this epoch, entirely taken up as it is with a fruitless competition for the throne, possesses but a feeble interest. The traveler in Upper Egypt, however, should not pass it by, because the temples of Philæ, of Edfou, of Ombos, of Denderah, and of Esneh, that is to say, the most complete monuments which we possess of Egyptian worship, belong to the Lower Period.

A primary division of the kings of Egypt into dynasties, according to the type furnished by Manetho, and a further division of the dynasties into Ancient Empire, Middle Empire, New Empire, and Lower Period. Such, then, is the starting-point of the classification of all the temples the tourist will meet with in his journey on the Nile.

It is evident that a history of Egypt would here be well placed, and would be the very best preparation for the voyage. But it would transcend the proposed limit to even give but a brief outline of the events which procured for Egypt so wide an influence over the destinies of the ancient world.

EGYPTIAN CHRONOLOGY.

Under this head our author states that Egypt is surpassed by no other nation in point of antiquity. Prehistoric remains, it is true, carry us back to a much more remote period, but if we seek monuments that bear the stamp of an already refined civilization, the most ancient are certainly to be found in Egypt. But easy as it may be to believe in the traditions which assign to Egypt so prodigious an antiquity, it is equally difficult to bring forward scientific proofs of that antiquity. Records of eclipses and other astronomical phenomena, which are still wanting, could alone furnish the required testimony.

In the mean time we have no other source but the lists of Manetho and the dates inscribed on these lists. Unfortunately, disorder reigns supreme here. Not only the dates taken from Manetho are not in accordance with extracts taken from Julius Africanus and Eusebius, but we possess two versions of the Chronicle of Eusebius, the dates of which do not agree with each other. On the other hand, it too often happens that the hieroglyphs themselves furnish us with dates which contradict the duration assigned to certain reigns by the national historian. It will be easily understood, therefore, to how much error we are exposed when we wish, for example, to fix the date of the foundation of the Egyptian monarchy.

And yet, for all that, it must be admitted that the authority of Manetho, an Egyptian priest writing the history of his own country from the archives of the temples, should always carry great weight. In vain it is alleged that several of the dynasties which he cites as successive were contemporaneous. If the fact were proved we must evidently deduct from the total amount the entire duration of those dynasties which have thus grafted themselves, like so many branches, upon the main stem. But the system of contemporaneous dynasties is as yet supported by no really trustworthy proof; on the contrary, it seems certain Manetho knew that at various epochs Egypt was governed simultaneously by several dynasties, and he availed himself of the means of control at his disposal to strike out of his work all such dynasties as did not belong to the genuine series of royal houses who succeeded each other on the throne, so that the latter were alone officially enrolled in due order on the register of kings. It is true Manetho's figures have undoubtedly suffered serious alterations. But if we consider that they have come down to us through Christian writers, who had an evident interest in curtailing them, we shall see that as a matter of fact, far from ascribing too wide a range to these figures, we are bound, as fair critics, to accept them as having been systematically reduced in their total amount.

The authority, then, of Manetho as a chronologist remains unshaken, but on condition that we take the dates which he gives us as only approximate. Certain as it is that those dates are not absolutely exact, yet it is difficult to believe that they have been so radically altered as not in any degree to come near the truth. Any how, the nearer we approach the source of those alterations the more we shall feel compelled to admit that if the lists could have reached us intact from the hand of Manetho, we would find them extending over a still wider range of time.

From these remarks it will be understood that the following table of Egyptian dynasties is presented to the reader under all reserve; and it is almost superfluous to add that the simultaneous dynasties are not included here; that the dynasties are presented in the same order as in Monetho, and moreover that the dates are, with one or two exceptions, the same as those given by the national historian:

	No. of Dynasty.	Name of Dynasty.	Duration.	Date B. C.

EGYPTIAN RELIGION.

Under this head Mariette-Bey remarks that Jamblichus, a writer who lived at the close of the third century, represents the Egyptians as believing in one God, unique, universal, uncreate; the author of his own being, having no beginning, existing from eternity. Jamblichus goes on to say that under this supreme deity are a number of other gods who personify his divine attributes. Thus Ammon is that hidden force in nature which brings all things to life.

The supreme intellect, in which all other intellects are summed up, is Imothis. Phtah is the creative essence which accomplishes all things with perfection and with truth. Osiris is the good and beneficent deity. If Jamblichus is a faithful recorder of Egyptian traditions, his statements would imply that, though degenerated by a belief in inferior gods personifying the qualities of the Supreme Being, a peculiar Monotheism was once the foundation of the Egyptian religion.

The monuments themselves give us some glimpses of this belief. At Tell-Amarna Aten is often styled the One God. At Thebes and at Memphis Ammon and Phtah are clothed with the attributes of the Supreme Deity—Ammon is father to himself; he is the generating spirit from the very commencement, the twofold being, at once father and mother, and existing from all eternity.

On this foundation rests the whole edifice of the Egyptian religion. To the initiated of the sanctuary, no doubt, was reserved the knowledge of the god of the abstract, the god concealed in the unfathomable depths of his divine essence. But for the less refined adoration of the people, who required, so to speak, a palpable and a tangible god, were presented the images of the divinities sculptured on the walls of temples. Such are the ideas which thus far have been accepted by the scientific world, and the only classical authority on which the whole tradition rests is the passage in Jamblicus.

"Unfortunately," continues our author, "the more one studies the Egyptian religion, the greater becomes the doubt as to the character which must definitely be ascribed to it. The most fertile source of materials has recently been placed at our disposal by the excavations of the temples of Denderah and of Edfou. From one end to another these temples are covered with legends, and present every appearance of being two books which treat, ex professo, of religion generally, and more particularly of the gods to whom these temples are dedicated. But neither in these temples nor in those which were previously known to us does the one God of Jamblichus appear. If Ammon at Thebes is the 'first of the first,' if Phtah at Memphis is the father of all creation, without beginning and without end, it is because all the Egyptian gods are in turn clothed with the attributes of the Eternal. In other terms, we find everywhere deities who are immortal and uncreated; but nowhere do we find the One and invisible God, without name and without form, who presides from on high over the Egyptian Pantheon. Thus no indication to that effect is given by the temple of Denderah, the most hidden inscriptions of which have now been thoroughly examined. What we may gather from the study of this temple is that with the Egyptians the universe itself was God, and that Pantheism formed the basis of their religion. We should, therefore, feel disposed to modify in favor of this view the general ideas which we have expressed in the 'Notice du Musée' (fourth edition, p. 20). 'The theology of the Egyptians, from which Orpheus borrowed his ideas,' says Eusebius, in his Evangelical Preparation, acknowledged that the universe is God, composed of several divinities which constitute his different parts. The passage in Jamblicus must, then, give way as a classical authority to the passage in Eusebius.

"However this may be, and in whatever light we are to consider the Egyptian divinities, an equal amount of worship was not paid to them in all parts of Egypt. Ammon was adored at Thebes, Phtah at Memphis, Cnouphis at Eleptum at Elefantine, Horus at Edfou, Hathoe at Denderah, Neith at Sais, Soutekh at Tanis.

Thus Egypt was divided religiously, as well as geographically, into districts, each of which possessed its local worship, and the gods thus shared among themselves the religious government of the country. An exception, however, was made in favor of Osiris, the presiding deity of the abode of departed spirits. Osiris was the god universally worshiped, and was equally venerated in all parts of Egypt."

LANGUAGE AND WRITING.

Mariette-Bey, under this heading, says the Egyptian language is neither Semitic nor Indo-European. It is one of the principal group of languages which may be called Chamitic. The Coptic language is this same Egyptian language as it was spoken in the second or third century of our era, when it was used to express Christian ideas.

There are still many persons who firmly believe that hieroglyphs are nothing but a series of riddles which, when taken collectively, form a sort of illustrated rebus, to be guessed at; and it must be confessed that this error is encouraged by the most classical writers. "The right hand open, with extended fingers," says Diodorus Siculus, "represented the desire of acquaintance; the left hand closed, the grasping and keeping of property." "To express hatred," says Plutarch, "they depict a fish." At Sais, in the vestibule of the temple of Minerva, there were engraved a child, an old man, a hawk, a fish, and a hippopotamus. Evidently they were so many symbols which meant, "O ye who are entering upon life, and ye who are ready to quit it, God hates impudence, arrogance, pride of heart, and self-sufficiency." Thus the entrance into life is expressed by a child, death by an old man, divinity by a hawk, hatred by a fish, because of the sea, and impudence by a hippopotamus. "A vulture signifies nature," says Ammianus Marcillinus. "Why? Because the king is the director of his people, whom he ought to be able to check by his gentleness at the same time he incites them."

These traditions are not entirely without foundation. A fish is pronounced betu, and betu means evil, an abomination. The bee is pronounced sekhet, and designates the sovereignty over Lower Egypt. If the temples of Minerva at Sais belonged to the Lower Period, it may be that in accordance with the maniéré spirit of the times, and regardless of all grammatical connection, they wrote a child, an old man, a hawk, a fisb, a hippopotamus, for what would thus be rendered, "O child, O old man, the divinity holds all evil in abomination" (the hippopotamus being considered a typhonian animal). Strictly speaking, therefore, Diodorus, Plutarch, and Ammianus Marcellinus do not lead us into absolute error. But what is false is at once the point from whence they start, and the conclusion at which they arrive. Because the Egyptians once made a play upon words with child, old man, etc., it does not follow that this sort of riddle should be the universal rule of all hieroglyphic writings. The authors quoted seemed to have no idea that hieroglyphic writing could be alphabetical, and they have helped to keep up this error until the present time.

The discovery of Champollion, however, has dispelled these errors. Hieroglyphic writing is not enigmatical; it is read and pronounced just as Hebrew or Syriac are pronounced, and possesses an alphabet of its own.

The chief instrument of the success of Champollion's discovery is the monument known throughout the world as the Rosetta Stone. The Rosetta Stone is a fragment of a stela discovered in the year 1799 by M. Boussard, a French artillery officer, while digging entrenchments round a town of that name. It contains a copy of a decree made by the priests of Egypt assembled at Memphis in honor of Ptolemy Epiphanus. This decree is engraved on the stone in three languages, or rather in three different writings. The first is the hieroglyphic, the grand old writings of the monuments; the second is the demotic character as used by the people; and the third is Greek. But the text in Greek character is the translation of the two former. Up to this time hieroglyphics had remained an impenetrable mystery even for science. But a corner of the veil was about to be lifted; in proceeding from the known to the unknown, the sense, at all events, was at length to be arrived at of that mysterious writing which had so long defied all the efforts of science. Many erudite scholars tried to solve the mystery, and Young, among others, very nearly brought his researches to a satisfactory issue. But it was Champollion's happy lot to succeed in entirely tearing away the veil. Such is the Rosetta Stone, which thus became the instrument of one of the grandest discoveries which do honor to the nineteenth century.

Thanks to this discovery, we are now in a position to affirm that hieroglyphic writing is not an idle play upon words. It is scarcely more complex or more difficult to read than any other writing. When once one can accustom oneself to an a in an eagle, a b in a human leg, a c in a bolt, etc, the difficulties are overcome. What has so many years distracted attention from the true meaning of the hieroglyphics is somewhat singular selection of the forms adopted to represent the letters of the alphabet. A priori, it was natural to imagine that this singular medley of representations of animals and of ordinary objects could only be taken figuratively; and as a certain halo of mystery had always enshrouded all things pertaining to ancient Egypt, it was quite natural to believe that under these symbols the priests concealed their religious mysteries. But now the veil has been rent assunder, and hieroglyphic writing has become not much more difficult to decipher than any other Eastern character.

In consequence or the nature of the signs of which hieroglyphic writing is composed, it can be written either in vertical or horizontal lines. In examining a hieroglyphic text it will be easily observed that all the heads of animals or of man are turned in the same direction. It is from that side toward which the heads are turned that the inscription begins. Consequently, according to the desire of the scribe, the hieroglyphics could be disposed in such a manner as to be read either from left to right or from right to left.

In a hieroglyphic inscription there are some signs which should be pronounced, and some which should not be pronounced. The former are much the more numerous; they include, in the first place, such signs as are purely alphabetical. The alphabet itself contains twenty-four letters; but there are several different forms for the a, several for the b, etc. In the second place, they include syllable signs; thus a chessboard has its own, men; an upright vase is pronounced hes. In the third place, they include the ideal sounds; a lion is represented by a lion, a horse by a horse, etc. And in the fourth place they include symbolic signs; that is to say, such as are diverted from their true meaning in order to symbolize an ideal; thus the vulture signifies mother; the cubit represents justice, etc.

The signs not to be pronounced are the expletives, which are used to call the attention of the reader to the text or the meaning of the word they accompany. Nor are the very numerous signs which Champollion has called determinatives to be pronounced either. Thus, after all names of quadrupeds the scribe draws a character which represents the tail of a quadruped; all such words as refer to speech, to thought, to affection, or anything an emotion of the soul, are sometimes followed by the figure of a man putting his hand to his mouth; a man in a crouching position raising one arm, etc. The crouching man, the man placing his hand on his mouth, and the tail of the quadruped are signs which are not pronounced; but the presence of these signs points out that the word which precedes them is either a proper noun or a word expressing a sentiment or the name of a quadruped, etc.

Such, then, is the construction of hieroglyphic writing in its principal features. At first sight it seems complicated, but in reality the use of the determinatives affords great help, and however obscure or mysterious a hieroglyphic text may appear, it is certainly by no means more difficult to decipher than a Hebrew text, nor does its translation require so great an effort of mind as that of a passage of Chinese. We must not forget to add that the task of interpreting hieroglyphic texts is facilitated by the fact that the Coptic tongue is derived from the language which lies hidden under the ancient Egyptian writing. And this Coptic tongue, whose connection with the old language can easily be traced, has a vocabulary and a grammar well known to scholars, and, although justly reckoned among the dead languages, it continues to live in its literature. It should be remembered that when the Egyptian language became merged into Coptic it had already greatly degenerated, so that the Coptic language represents the language of the demotic character rather than that of the hieroglyphic.

On the decorations of the temples the same author says they consist of sculptured pictures, and that these pictures are arranged side by side, and several rows one above the other, in such a manner as cover the walls in a symmetrical manner from top to bottom. They are also arranged in a uniform plan; the king on one side, the divinity on the other, with the accompanying texts arranged in the same order; on the side of the king, his names and a few titles in accordance with the offerings made, and then the words which the king is supposed to pronounce. On the side of the divinity, his name and titles, and an answer wherein gifts are conceded proportionate to the offering.

On the subject of cartouches, the author says it is impossible to travel in Upper Egypt without knowing what is meant by the term cartouche; it is an elongated oval terminated by a straight line, which is to be seen on every wall of the Egyptian temples, and of which other monuments also afford numerous examples. The cartouche always contains the name of a king or of a queen, and in some cases of royal princesses. To designate a king there are most frequently two cartouches side by side. The first is called the prenomen, the second the nomen. The prenomen cartouche is usually preceded by the title of king of Upper and Lower Egypt, and the nomen cartouche by the title of Son of the Sun. The cartouches fix the date of the temple.

"There is no need," he says, "to enlarge upon the importance of the monuments that cover the banks of the Nile. They are the witnesses of Egypt's former greatness, and, so to speak, the patents of ancient nobility. They represent in the eyes of strangers the tattered pages of the archives of one of the most glorious nations of the world."

Six o'clock P. M.—Well, I must tell you that the engineer and assistants on the steamer applied themselves to stopping the leak, and succeeded so well that by the time the other steamer arrived which had been sent for, it was concluded that it could go on and make the trip. Accordingly, in the afternoon, we were again under headway, steaming along up stream at the rate of four or five miles an hour. The steamer is of English build, but has not a powerful engine, so that, stemming against the strong current of the river, we do not go very fast, but we have a good opportunity for noting the scenery along the banks of the river. We passed several small towns, made mostly of sun-dried bricks, and not presenting a very attractive appearance. At some of the towns we halted, and at some not.

Christians at Work.

There are probably no more religious people in the world than the peasantry of Russia. They own allegiance to the Greek church, which is a little further behind the age, if possible, than the Roman Catholic. The peasantry believe in the priests absolutely, doing exactly as they say in nearly all things, temporal as well as spiritual. As a consequence, they are ignorant, superstitious, brutal, cruel, easily fired to deeds of fanaticism when called upon in the name of their church and God. In the sixteenth century the Roman Catholics persecuted to the extent of their power the Jews in Spain and Portugal, and in this the nineteenth the Greek Catholics are doing the same to the Jews in Russia. Almost every day brings the news of some fresh outrage upon these people "chosen of God." The scenes which disgraced the middle ages hav been reënacted by these Greek Christians with a devilishness horrible to read. The despotic character of the government, the ignorance and besotted condition of the people, hav made it hard to get at the facts in the case, but at last some light has been thrown upon the scene by the correspondents of the London Times. The record reads like an account of the Duke of Alva's campaigns, and it is difficult to believe that such things can take place in this age. Russia is a country that has religion and nothing else, and religion alone does very little to ameliorate the condition of a people.

During the past eight months a tract of country, equal in area to the British Isles and France combined, stretching from the Baltic to the Black Sea, has been the scene of horrors that hav hitherto only been perpetrated in the dark ages. Men ruthlessly murdered, tender infants dashed to death or roasted alive in their own homes, married women the prey of a brutal lust that has often caused their death, and young girls violated in the sight of their relativs by soldiers who should hav been the guardians of their honor—these hav been the deeds with which the Christian population of southern Russia has been stained since last April. In the face of these horrors, loss of property is of little moment, yet they hav been accompanied by the razing of whole streets inhabited by Jews, by the systematic firing of the Jewish quarters of towns in western Russia, and by the pillage of all the property on which thousands of Jewish families were dependent for existence.

In addition to all this, many Russian towns hav heartlessly seized the occasion to expel from their limits crowds of Jews who hav been left by this inhuman and deliberate measure homeless amid masses infuriated against them. And during these scenes of carnage and pillage the local authorities hav stood by with folded arms, doing little or nothing to prevent their occurrence and recurrence and allowing the ignorant priest-ridden peasantry to remain up to this day under the impression that a ukase existed ordering the property of the Jews to be handed over to their fellow-Russians. So far from publicly expressing reprobation of these outrages, the minister has issued an edict clearly betraying that the Russians authorities fully share the prejudice of the mob and contemplate adding to the burdens and inequalities which hav been the direct cause of the religious fanaticism that has led to these disorders

Ever since the German anti-Semitics had raised an outcry against their Jewish fellow-citizens, it has been feared that the movement would spread to Russia, and there take a form more adapted to the less civilized and more Christian state of the country. When, therefore, the assassination of the czar on March 3d of last year had aroused all Russia to the highest pitch of excitement, it was confidently predicted that the approaching Easter would see an outbreak against the Jews. On Wednesday, April 27th, the dreaded outbreak took place. A religious dispute in a cabaret led to a scuffle which grew into a general mêlée till the mob obtained possession of the dram-shop and rifled it of its contents. Inflamed by the drink thus obtained, the rioters proceeded to the Jewish quarter and commenced a systematic destruction of the Jewish shops and warehouses. At first some attempt was made by the Jews to protect their property; but this only served to increase the violence of the mob, which proceeded to attack the dwellings of the Jews and to wreck the synagogs. Amid the horrors that ensued a Jew lost his wife, and no fewer than thirty Jewesses were outraged. At one place two girls, in dread of violation, threw themselvs from the windows. One section of the mob, formed of rioters and soldiers, broke into the dwelling of an old man named Pelikoff, and on his attempting to save his daughter from a fate worse than death, they threw him down from the roof, while twenty soldiers proceeded to work their will on his unfortunate daughter. When seen by the correspondent who narrates this fact, Pelikoff was in a state of hopeless madness and his daughter completely ruined in mind and body. The whole Jewish quarter was at the mercy of the mob till April 29th. During the two days of the riots five hundred houses and one hundred shops were destroyed, whole streets being razed to the ground. It may be added that the property destroyed and stolen was reckoned at two million rubles.

After a week's pause a whole series of riots broke out, commencing on May 7th, at Smielo, near Czergassy, where thirteen men were killed and twenty wounded, and 1,600 were left without homes. Next day, Sunday, May 8th, a most serious riot broke out at Kiew, once the capital of Russia and still an important town, containing 20,000 Jews in a population of 140,000. Here the riot had been definitly announced for Sunday, and the Jews sent a deputation to the governor requesting him to call out his soldiers to prevent disturbance. He piously refused, saying that he would not "trouble his soldiers for the sake of a pack of Jews." During the riot which broke out on the day fixed the police and the soldiers again acted the same part that they had been done at Elizabethgrad. The first procedure of the mob had been to storm the dram shops, and staving in the brandy casks, to wallow in the spirits. During the period of license that followed four Jews were killed, twenty-five women and girls were violated, of whom five hav died in consequence, as was proved at the subsequent trials. At one house the mob, disappointed in the search for plunder, caught up a little child three years old and brutally threw it out of the window. No less than 2,000 Jews were left without shelter by the dismantling or the burning of their houses.

Next day similar scenes of violence occurred at Browary, in the neighborhood of Kiew, in the province of Czernigow. On the same day still more disgraceful deeds were enacted at Berezowka, in the province of Cherson. While the Jews of the village were at synagog a mob attacked the Jewesses and violated many of them, causing the death of three; others who escaped the worse evil were driven into the river and nine ultimately died from the effects of the exposure. When the Jews came to the rescue two of them were killed and a young lad stoned to death.

The neighborhood of Kiew was again visited on the next day, May 10th, at Konotop and at Wassilkow. At both places the attacks had ben planned; at the former wooden crosses were placed before the doors of Christians that their houses might be spared, while at the latter the day of riot had been announced and the report diligently spread about that the czar had given the property of the Jews away. At Wassilkow and in the neighborhood eight lives were lost, seven at one fell swoop at the inn kept by a Jew, who was forced to admit the mob to his wine cellars, and, during his absence in search of assistance, the drunken rioters cut the throats of his wife and six children.

By this time the chief towns and villages of southern Russia were ablaze with violence and riot. Throughout the whole of the provinces of Cherson, Taurida, Ekaterinoslav, Poltawa, Kiew, Czernigow, and Podolia the notion had spread fast as wildfire that the Jews and their property had been handed over to the tender mercies of the populace. At Alexandrowk, on the banks of the Dnieper, the operativs carried out what they thought to be the will of the czar, on May 13th, rendering 300 out of the 400 Jewish families of the place homeless, and destroying property to the amount of nearly 400,000 rubles.

Up to this time the riots had chiefly risen among the urban populations, but they now spread into the rural districts and reached every little village where even a single Jew resided. A Jew was murdered at Rasdory, a few miles southeast of Orjechow, and at Znamenka, near Nikopol, on the Dnieper, a Jewish inn-keeper named Resser was murdered and his wife dishonored, after which both were cast into the river. At Balka, also on the bank of the Dnieper, there was only one Jew, Allowioz by name. A band of ruffians went to his house on May 17th, and finding him absent they violated his wife, and, to conceal the crime, set fire to the house while the poor woman lay helpless in it. All this was witnessed by her little daughter, crouched in a ditch hard by. On the preceding day another tragedy had occurred at Kitzkis, where the house of one Preskoff was set on fire, and he with two little children left to roast in it, while wife and mother looked on, vainly appealing for mercy to the ruffianly perpetrators of the crime. At Gregoriewk a Jewish inn-keeper named Rieffman was cooped in one of his own barrels and cast into the Dnieper. Again at Kanzeropol a man named Enman was murdered brutally and his wife violated and afterward killed. Such were the Christian deeds that were done on the bank of the Dnieper during the month of May.

Meantime the seaport Odessa had likewise been the scene of an anti-Jewish riot. Originally announced for May 13th, it was postponed till the Sunday, May 15th, without, however, any precautions being taken by the governor, who had as usual been duly warned of the impending outbreak. Though only lasting for six hours, the riot resulted in the death of a Jew named Handelmann, and eleven cases of violation are reported, one resulting in death. Here the Jews seemed to hav been most energetic in their resistance. Of the 800 arrests made, 150 were Jews, twenty-six of whom were afterward charged with carrying revolvers without a permit. The police estimated the damage done at 1,137,831 rubles, while those immediately concerned raised the sum to 3,000,000. Similar scenes took place on the same day at Wolwezysk on the borders, where a riot had been announced for the Sunday. A week afterward the lower orders of Berdyozew rose against the Jews, and on May 24th a riotous disturbance occurred at Zmerinka, in Podolia.

The contagion spread as far as Saratow in early June, from thence to Astrakhan, and even reached a town near Tomsk, in Siberia, and caused an anti-Jewish riot there. The only bright spot in all this gloom was the condition of Poland, where Jews and Poles hav always lived in amity. This continued till General Ignatieff directed the governor of Poland to appoint commissions of experts to consider how the Jews should be dealt with, to which fact persons on the spot attribute the rise of anti-Jewish feeling that culminated in the Warsaw riots. But outside of Poland these outbursts of popular prejudice placed a population of nearly two millions in perpetual dread of their lives and property. At times they dared not remove their clothes night or day, fearing that they might hav to flee at any moment. Ever since last April that feeling of fear and insecurity has ruled the lives of all Russian Jews.

Not a month, scarcely a week, has passed since then without some outbreak or other occurring to confirm these fears and render them the more acute. After the Saratow affair, on June 8th, in which thirty Jews were wounded, there was a comparativ lull in the more violent forms of outrage. But early in July the neighborhood of Kiew and the banks of the Dnieper were once more visited by scenes which recall the horrors of the middle ages. On Sunday, the 12th, open rioting took place at Perejaslaw, which was characterized by the fact that the mob were led to the attack by the sons of the merchant of the district. Commercial rivalry adding its sting to religious and social differences, the struggle was here of a more violent nature than usual, and, while thirty of the mob were wounded, no less than two hundred of the Jews received serious injuries at the hands of their neighbors, and three died in consequence; one hundred and seventy-six houses were destroyed, some by fire. At Borispol, on July 21st, scenes occurred during the riots worthy of the worst days of the Commune. Women made their appearance on the scene as assailants, and added to its horrors. During the rioting they encouraged their friends on to the fight, and were seen to assist them to violate the Jewesses of the village by holding down the unfortunate creatures.

The month of August saw riots at Njezin on the 2d, at Lubny on the 8th, at Borzny on the 18th, and at Itchny on the 28th. If September was comparativly free from disorders, the cessation must be attributed rather to the needs of the harvest than to the quieting of the popular mind. Early in October the mob attacked the Jews of Balwierzski, in the government of Suwalki. October 3d was the Day of Atonement, the most sacred day of the Hebrew calender, and the mob took the occasion to destroy the synagog and wreck the Jewish quarter, where one Jew was killed and twenty wounded. Even as late as November the myth of the spoliatian ukase imposed upon the peasantry. On the 15th of that month a band of a hundred peasants at Czarwona, near Zitomir, pillaged the property of the Jews under that pretext. Lastly, to show the excitable state of the popular mind, the Sarah Bernhardt riots at Kiew on November 18th, and at Odessa on November 27th, proved that a mere suspicion that the actress was a Jewess was sufficient to arouse once more the fury of the mob, and cause them again to attack the Jewish quarter of those towns.

Besides appealing to the blind passions of the mob, the Jew-haters of Russia hav during the past year resorted to more systematic efforts to harass the hapless Israelites. The Russian Moujik has a method almost peculiar to himself of expressing his rage and hatred. Moscow is but the most celebrated instance of periods of Russian history when incendiarism has been the order of the day. Whenever the fever point of excitement is reached, arson is usually the direction in which it overflows. So well is this recognized in Russia that the peasants hav a technical name for the deliberate firing of towns; the "red cock" is said to crow. During the past year this method of revenge has been resorted to on a large scale against the Jews of Russia, especially in the west. By the end of June the "red cock" had crowed over fifteen towns in western Russia, including Mohilew, containing 25,000 inhabitants, and Witebsk, with 23,000, and Slonim, with 20,000.

Many thousands of Jews were rendered homeless by this means, and on July 3d 6,000 Jews lost their homes by fire at Minsk, 4,800 being deprived of every means of subsistence at the same time. The town of Pinsk, in the same province, suffered a like fate. And shortly afterward a conflagration took place at Koretz, in Wolhynia, in which thirty lives were lost, and 5,000 souls left without a home. Every week added to the number of fires in towns inhabited by Jews, till by the end of September the list extended to forty-one towns. This probably involved the loss of home to 20,000 Jews.

To the mass of homeless and penniless creatures in southern Russia must be added the many victims of pillage. The violence of the mobs often wrecked whole streets of houses as completely as any fire, and we know of 2,000 who were thus rendered homeless at Kiew, 1,600 at Smielo, 1,000 at Konotop, 600 at Ouchow, and 300 at Obuchow. The value of property destroyed in the South has been reckoned to reach $80,000,000.

It is possible that an aggregate of a hundred thousand Jewish families has thus been reduced to poverty. The ranks of the ruined were increased by those who dared not apply for their just debts, while in many cases the peasantry hav deliberately "boycotted" the Jews. It must be further remembered that in several places the Jews anticipated riots by evacuating their homes; thus, near Perejaslaw, after the riot at that place, no fewer than seventeen villages in the neighborhood were deserted by the Jews, and the same doubtless took place in other localities. Men hav fled from the villages in which they hav resided all their lives. Even after the events of Kiew the Jews of the neighborhood, fearing the spread of the disorder, crowded at the rate of one hundred families a day into the town which had so lately shown itself hostil. Others fled toward the border, and during the summer months a camp of refugees in the open air, at Podwoloczyska, contained no less than 1,500 souls, including children of the tenderest age. A few, who still possessed other means, attempted to flee across the frontier, but many were stopped. Of 5,000 who managed to reach Brody, on the Austrian border, in a perfectly helpless state, 2,000 still remain there, huddled in cellars.

Religious fanaticism and race hatred are at the bottom of all these outrages. Priests mingled with the mob and incited them in the name of the "Savior" the Jews are supposed to hav crucified over eighteen hundred years ago. It has been supposed that the world was too far advanced to ever hav further religious persecutions that took the shape of fire and sword, but it seems it is not so. It is only those countries which are Liberal that are free. The spirit of Christianity remains the same, and unless restrained is liable to break out and desolate the land in which it holds sway.

Reception to Mr. Bennett.

We are pleased to see that the Western Liberals are making preparations to giv Mr. Bennett a grand reception on his arrival at San Francisco, which is expected on the 21st or thereabouts of this month. With this object in view, the committee has issued the following circular, which tells the story in ringing terms:

ALL FOR THE NOBLE CAUSE.

To the Liberals of the Pacific Coast, Individually and Collectivly:

The undersigned, an executiv committee appointed by auxiliary Liberal League 190, of the National Liberal League, to make preparations to tender an ovation to Mr. D. M. Bennett, respectfully address you on this matter of vital importance to our noble cause.

You are aware that the bigots and fanatics hav tracked Mr. Bennett with a merciless persecution; that they finally, by decoy letter, through their vile tool, Anthony Comstock, had him arrested, tried, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary. You are aware that the notorious and infamous trinity of Benedict, Colgate, and Comstock reveled in this triumph of their devilish ingenuity and deadly hate. They thought that the penitentiary would be Mr. Bennett's grave, and that, entombed with him in that grave, would lie the fearless TRUTH SEEKER and the great publishing house he had built up for the destruction of superstition.

You are aware that Mr. Bennett survived his tortures and torturers; that he was received, upon his release, with the greatest honors in a great public demonstration in New York. This demonstration, and the largest petition ever sent to Washington praying for his release, while yet a prisoner at Albany, are evidences of his innocence, of the justness and nobleness of the cause for which he suffered, and the deep public appreciation of the man. You are aware that the Liberals of the United States sent him to Europe; that he returned, and again the Liberals sent him on his Around-the-World tour. He is coming back to us, and will, from best accounts, arrive in this city some time in April, via China and Japau.

Never in human history has there been a more noble display of friendship and fidelity than the Liberals of America, Canada, and England manifested toward Mr. Bennett during his persecution, trial, and imprisonment, and never did man more worthily deserve this friendship and fidelity. He has stood up boldly and bravely for the sacred cause of mental liberty and for civil and religious liberty, and he has bravely and boldly hurled defiance at the bigots and fanatics who sought not only the destruction of his property, but even of his life, by swearing it away, and incarcerating him in the bastile at Albany. With what fortitude and heroism did this venerable sage endure this merciless imprisonment! With what devotion and unselfishness did the Liberals of America stand by him to the bitter end, never failing, never flinching, in their touching, beautiful, and heroic devotion. Glorious triumph of the man and the men who could thus do and dare for truth and liberty.

You remember the plaudits of true and loyal souls that greeted Mr. Bennett as he departed by the Atlantic! Let true and loyal souls greet him as he returns by the Pacific! Let us unite as one man to giv him a hearty and hospitable welcome. Let us open our hearts and purses to giv him a Pacific coast welcome that will ring along and across the continent, that will be glad music to his ears as he journeys, after his long and perilous travels, to the sanctum made sacred to us by his sufferings and sorrows.

To this end we specially invite you to co-operate with us. If you can come possibly to take part in the ovation, do so. If you cannot, confer with us by letter, and aid us financially to the best of your ability. Act promptly, act with the fires of liberty burning in your heart, as they burned in the hearts of the Revolutionary fathers of precious memory. Let us be united, let us show the bigots and fanatics they cannot, and shall not, wreck the lives of the heroic men who are fighting our battles at the front. All true lovers of civil and religious liberty, whether Freethinkers, Jews, Christians, or others, must unite solidly to prevent any and all encroachments of the church upon the state, must unite to oppress and defeat all special legislation like that carried through by Comstock's Society for the (alleged) Suppression of Vice, but really for the extermination of Freethought publications, or such special legislation as now attempts to enforce a Christian Sabbath upon the people of California. Dangers threaten the republic. The arrest and imprisonment of D. M. Bennett was a blow at the rights of every citizen who dares to express his honest convictions as becomes an American and a freeman, who has too much pride and manhood to bow to bigots, or believe in organized superstition, based upon immaculate frauds. We must be united, we must carry on the conflict against superstition with unflinching courage; we must triumph, for in that triumph is the perpetuity, peace, and prosperity of the republic, and the final happiness of the human family. Keep the sacred fires of liberty burning all along the line.

PHILIP COWEN.

Address all letters to Mr. Byron Adonis, Cor. Sec. A. L. L. 190, 615 Kearny street, San Francisco, Cal.

The surplus fund, if any, will be donated, with willing heart, to Mr. Bennett, to aid him in shotting that magnificent instrument for the destruction of frauds and myths theological—THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The public press will advise you as to the exact date of the arrival of "the old man eloquent," the gallant old hero who has never flinched his duty in sunshine or in storm.

Extensiv preparations are being made to giv Mr. Bennett a splendid and enthusiastic reception at all important points along his triumphant march. COMMITTEE.

San Francisco, Cal., March 28, 1882.

Regarding the same our venerable friend, the Boston Investigator, says:

We understand that the Liberals of San Francisco, Cal., will giv Mr. D. M. Bennett, of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, a public reception on his reaching that city from his travels. What a commentary on the persecuting efforts of Mr. Comstock! They hav rebounded to the interest of Mr. Bennett more abundantly than even his most sanguin friends could hav expected. Some of his Christian friends sagaciously predicted that prosecuting an Infidel would not pay, and probably they are now convinced of it.

The Bennett Reception in California.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I was honored to-day by the receipt of a letter from the gallant old Christ of the invincible army of Freethinkers. The letter is dated Colombo, Ceylon, Feb. 20, 1882, and is forwarded via Yokohama. Mr. Bennett expected to remain on "the island of charming tropical delight" until March 2d, when he was to take the steamer for Singapore, and possibly Shanghai, and then Yokohama. He expects to reach this city the latter part of this month. Mr. Bennett writes in a cheerful, buoyant mood, and it is apparent that this revolving globe agrees with him. It is his intention to lecture upon his arrival in the United States, and will make a friendly call upon all his true and tried friends when it is possible to do so.

We are activly at work to giv him an ovation worthy of the cause, and a real spirit of enthusiasm pervades our ranks. Auxiliary Liberal League 190 has issued a ringing appeal to the Liberals of this coast. We hav mailed a thousand copies throughout the interior, and sent a number to leading Liberals and Leagues at the East. Another thousand hav been distributed throughout the city and surrounding towns.

I am in receipt of several letters from the country, all of which indicate a hearty desire to coöperate with us in the celebration. Among them are letters from intelligent women, and several ladies hav called to make inquiries about Mr. Bennett. They are zealous advocates of Freethought and warm admirers of the old hero.

A large number of letters from all parts of the country for Mr. Bennett are already in my care, and "still they come." The enthusiasm for him is widespread. Well he deserves it. He has fought heroically against the bigots. We must stand by him, as we hav ever stood, unflinchingly. We are pushing the enemy to the wall. It is only a question of time until triumphant victory is ours.

BYRON ADONIS.

San Francisco, Cal., April 3, 1882.

T. B. WAKEMAN is under the doctor's charge temporarily, which accounts for the non-appearance of his lectures this week. We sincerely trust his illness will be very short, for the Liberals of New York hardly know how to spare him even for a day.

Round the World.

The first volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" has now been mailed to the subscribers to the fund. We are glad to announce that the first edition has nearly all been subscribed for, and that we shall hav to issue a second shortly. Since the list of names was stereotyped we hav received many new ones. They all wished to be enrolled, but it was too late for the first edition, and to accommodate them and many others we hav concluded to put them in the second edition of the first volume, and also open a list of subscribers to appear in the second volume. This will giv all an opportunity who may wish it, and also aid in paying expenses. The volumes will be sold separately for $2 per volume, and the three for $5 if taken before the volumes are completed. We would very much like a larger list to greet the traveler with on his return home. The books will be very cheap at $5—much cheaper than any other publisher would get them out.

The additional volume of course increases the expense of publishing by a third, and we need many more names, with the "V's," to meet the cost.

The following is the list of subscribers who hav sent in the $5, and the amount will be acknowledged in the dedication of the second volume. We shall see the list grow with great pleasure:

The Freethought Missionary.

Mr. Bennett has been preaching the gospel of truth, as he sees it, to the Indians. He has delivered, by invitation, ten lectures, all to large audiences, and one to an audience of between three and four thousand. All but one of his lectures hav been to people who do not understand the English language, and he has had to hav them interpreted into Singalese as he delivered them. The Buddhist priests are delighted with them, and most of them will be printed in the nativ language to use as missionary documents. Mr. Bennett has taken in a radius of several hundred miles in his lectures, including Ceylon, Colombo, Kandy, Pandura, and Galli, in some of which places he has spoken twice. He has been treated like a prince by the learned nativs, who paid his hotel bills, railroad fare to the different towns, carriage hire, etc., and did everything in their power to honor him. He has had a grand time, and his visit will be long remembered by both them and him.

On March 3d he left Galli, Ceylon, for Singapore. He contemplated a short detour into Java before going to China. He expects to reach San Francisco in the latter part of this month.

WE learn from the Investigator that ElizurWright has recovered. Good for him! May his last sickness be a thousand years away!

T. C. LELAND'S address is 744 Broadway, not 144.

COL. INGERSOLL will lecture next Sunday evening, the 16th, at the Academy of Music, this city, on "Talmagian Theology."

AGAIN it becomes our solemn duty to chronicle in our news column the death of a minister of the gospel while in the act of breaking the bread of life to his hungering flock. When the pulpit becomes no longer a protection to a preacher from the wrath which breaks out occasionally without any warning or apparent cause, it is about time for believers to begin to ask in what calling and in what place a man may reasonably consider himself safe.

Communications.

Beating their Mother.

"Benjamin Franklin, writing to Thomas Paine, urging him not to publish the 'Age of Reason,' said to him: 'You are probably indebted to religion for the habits of virtue on which you so justly value yourself. You might easily display your excellent talents of reasoning upon a less hazardous subject, and thereby obtain a rank among our most distinguished authors. For among us it is not necessary, as among the Hottentots, that a youth, to be raised into the company of men, should prove his manhood by beating his mother.' The pertinency of this argument as against Paine cannot fail to be seen by any one. And it is equally applicable to the modern apostles of Infidelity and their more noisy and offensiv followers.

"What Franklin advised Paine not to do is what the advocates of Infidelity of all shades of ability and attainment are busily engaged in doing. They are beating their mother. To Christianity do they owe all that distinguishes them from heathen. Blot out all that Christianity has done for the education, civilization, and elevation of mankind, within the last eighteen centuries, and what of intelligence, good order, development of the forces of nature and human happiness would remain?" "B."

The above scrap was sent by a pious friend, who, I presume, thinks she has scored not only one but one hundred for Christianity and against Infidelity. But every educated Liberal will tell her that the whole thing is a complete tissue of falsehoods! It opens with an assertion that has been refuted over and over again by critics, scholars, and historians all through the land. Benjamin Franklin knew nothing about Paine's "Age of Reason," for he died years before it was written, and consequently he could not hav spoken of it one way or the other. As to Paine "beating his mother" by speaking of the Christian church as he did, he is emphatically "not guilty," for Christianity is not the parent of good deeds or of good men. Christianity is not the "mother" of education, civilization, or the elevation of mankind. She has always done her level best to keep the world in ignorance and barbarism. She knows that the more science, philosophy, or common sense a people hav the less belief they hav in the supernatural, and the less are they molded by other people's ideas and influences. "To be as little children" has been the great ambition of the Christian. To hav all beliefs and creeds made ready to hand, and only just be asked to swallow them precisely as a child unquestionably swallows all its parents teach it, is "Christian civilization" and Christian piety. The church has fought against every invention, every progressiv movement, every step toward the elevation of woman and the general education of the masses. It was only as each reform or invention became popular, and the general demand for it grew to be an imperativ necessity, that it was cautiously and grudgingly adopted and advocated by the church; and then just as soon as she was compelled to suffer a reformatory movement to be in accordance with Christian belief and the holy scriptures, she at once claimed to hav originated and given it birth and to hav fostered it in her bosom.

But the real works she did giv birth to as a mother she denies as being her legitimate children. Among these stands first and foremost persecution for opinion's sake, wars, murders, and bloodshed for holy ends and purposes; two hundred thousand crusaders sacrificed by their "mother" in the vain attempt to get back the holy sepulcher, which after all was only a figment of the imagination and had no real existence; nine millions of her own children, believers in her as a true mother, murdered by her for witchcraft. The church has incited and allowed her children to murder each other in wars, riots, and homicides at the rate of 100,000,000 people every hundred years. And only to-day I read that Europe givs thirty-three cents per capita for education, and 108.84 cents per head for war, to aid Christians to murder Christians.

Christian civilization licenses bar-rooms, brothels, and gambling hells. It allows professional thieves, who steal whenever they hav an opportunity to run loose all over the land and prey upon the industry of honest citizens; permits strong men to murder, abuse, and torture helpless women and innocent children. It makes the husband and father lord and master over the women and children, and, through its god-book, robs one-half of the race of ninety-nine-hundredths of its rights and privileges. It taxes them without representation and teaches them to hug the chains that fetter them. Go among the Chinese and the Japanese and you will find many virtues much more developed than even in our boasted land of Christian civilization. It is the same in all places and among all peoples. Some will hav one virtue or set of virtues, and some another; and equally so with vices. But Christian civilization has them all, or nearly all, in their fulness. If education, freedom, and enlightenment foster the good, they also giv wider scope for the evil. Mere belief has but little to do in civilizing. The gods and religions of a nation are only reflected images of the minds and hearts of that nation. A war-like nation breeds the religion of Moses and the patriarchs. A peaceful nation fosters a religion of love, tenderness, and humanity. As the world grows older peace triumphs over war, and therefore the religion of the New Testament far surpasses that of the Old, and even this improved theology has been having new meanings put into it year by year as civilization has passed onward and upward, leaving it in the rear.

You Protestants are the last ones who should talk of "beating mothers." Who deals harder blows on a mother than you do on yours—on the Catholic mother church—the church that claimed as its own all the Christian fathers; the church that gave you your god-books, creeds, and rites and ceremonies, and even your gods and devils? Aye, all your stock in trade you inherit from her, and yet you never let pass a single opportunity to beat and stone her. Try again, my friend, and see if thee cannot make out a little better case; one that has at least a semblance of reasonable truth for its foundation. One thing is sure, goodness is its own reward. To be good, to do good, to believe in good is a blessing.

"Every seed of good we sow,
Both in shade and shine will grow,
And will keep our hearts aglow,
While the days are going by."

ELMINA.

Essential to Liberal Growth.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I desire to impress on Liberals one or two things of more importance than all our strictures on the Bible and Christianity, than all our arguments from nature or art, toward the propagandism of our cause. It is the need of introduction in our common schools of a few lessons in logic, and especially that part connected with the detection of fallacies. If this were united to some lessons on a few articles in literature, such as Smith's "Bentham on Fallacies" and Macaulay's Southey "Colloquies on Society," these lessons would be forever impressed on the mind. The wonderful awkwardness of most people in considering a subject is unaccountable. People think they can reason crookedly and yet conclude correctly; that reasoning is of no importance; that a creed, for instance, may be true, yet founded on falsehoods; that a party may be right though upholding nothing but wrong. Reason has nothing to do with conclusions among nearly all of us. This must be from a defectiv education. Years are spent over the art of getting the right word in the right place, or the right letter; not one day in all the years of schooling is devoted to the art of detecting falsehood from truth; of reading critically. Children are asked to "read that sentence and show where the letters are misplaced or wanting," or, "read it and show what words are inaccurate," and are drilled over such things for years. Never in the whole course of their education are they asked to read such a sentence or article and see if it is self-contradictory or false in any way.

If our Liberal friends everywhere would exert themselvs toward this matter, and some publisher would get up a small school-book teaching the art of detecting fallacies, and giving a few illustrations by articles such as Smith's and Macaulay's, gradually a mighty work could be accomplished. READER.

Lecture Field Notes.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A world of news can be gathered in one's journeys if the traveler is not too busy in studies, sight-seeing, reading, speaking almost every night. Just now I find myself penning these few items in New Lisbon, Wis., where I am in the midst of a course of lectures. The preachers duly warned their people last Sunday against attending the Infidel meetings. The godly ones obeyed implicitly. It is a wonder that we secure as good audiences as we do when the efforts by the superstitious to prevent people from hearing are taken into account.

After having given ten lectures in Escanaba, Mich., J. H. Stanley, a veteran Freethinker of Gravesville, Wis., furnished hall and abiding-place in Chilton, Wis., where I gave a half dozen lectures to as enthusiastic audiences as I ever met, composed mainly of German turners. Our home was with Dr. La Count and wife, both of whom are Liberal and progressiv. Their daughter is a fine pianist, and a great deal of music was a part of our Chilton feast.

The town is almost entirely Catholic; two large Catholic churches; no Protestant. The priest, Father Larrigan, is more broad-minded than the generality of Protestant ministers. On Sunday I went to hear him. He gave his congregation a refreshing scolding because they neglected to bring wood for the "house of God." It appeared to me that I never saw a man who enjoyed the application of the cat-o'-nine-tails more than he did the rebukes which he showered upon the heads of his helpless victims. He had them. They could not "jaw back." For twenty minutes or more he reveled in his juicy feast of that prospectiv dry wood. It was a dry subject, but the reverend father made it interesting. He read off a long list of delinquents who had failed to come to time on the wood question, and wound up with the blood-curdling information that those who would not bring wood that week should not obtain absolution.

Then he attacked the congregation in general; told them to their faces that they were a niggardly set. No man in the crowded edifice dared to dispute the allegation. "Last Sunday," he said, "the collection amounted to only forty cents," the Sunday before a few cents more.

Freethinkers do better than that. When collections were taken up, which are the only religious exercises we ever hav, sometimes as much as eight dollars were contributed by one-twentieth of the number that donated forty cents; in all, forty dollars nearly. But there is this difference: the collections in the Catholic church are only the "strippings." The poor people, from fear of fire in a world to come, impoverish themselvs to build grand temples dedicated to an almighty task master in heaven. They pay rent for pews. It is pay, pay at almost every turn, like a tourist among a swarm of Niagara hack-drivers.

My Infidel friend, J. H. Stanley, wrote me that Chilton is a "Catholic nest," and that I might consider myself fortunate to get off with a "whole hide." As the saints of God are not quite as ferocious as they used to be—Infidelity has tamed them—I had no misgivings. Eggs were talked of, but as they were too dear to throw by a people who could only raise forty cents for the Lord—I contributed one-quarter of that myself to pay for the pew I occupied—I felt comparativly safe even in a "Catholic nest," and was treated with far more politeness by the Catholics than I hav often been by Protestants.

Since leaving there Mr. Stanley writes me, "Your lectures hav had a good effect, and will hav a tendency to set people thinking, especially the younger class. All our Liberal Germans were so well pleased with the lectures that they would not take anything for the use of the hall, which I expected to pay for.

The names of a few of them I will giv, for I consider this a good plan to make the Liberals all over the country acquainted with each other: R. Schliehting, L. Schneider, Henry Rollman, F. R Gutheil, Charles Menig, William Paulsen, A. J. Haussen, Julius Find, Harmon Whipperman.

My next lecture point was Fox Lake, Wis. J. H. Williams was an activ friend in securing the course. He is a great admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the numbers of which he preserves as sacredly as a Christian does his Bible.

Mr. and Mrs. Bliss made a portion of our stay very pleasant.

Dr. Hawse and wife were attendants and supporters of the series of lectures.

Here resides the editor and publisher of the Fox Lake Representative, Mr. Hotchkiss, a paper which has been often quoted by the Liberal press.

The people generally of Fox Lake are a conservativ class, and are easily startled at a radical statement. Fox Lake is connected with the main railroad route by a two miles' track, the cars of which are run by horse-power. This may hav something to do with the general behind-the-times air of the town.

I found a few specimens of that oddest sort of all Liberals, wealthy and indifferent as to whether people believe fact or fiction. They count themselvs Liberal, when the fact is they are only indifferent. Their favorit expression is, "I am willin' everybody should believe to suit himself. I don't care a d—n what folks believe."

You will generally find such "Liberals" consistent; that is, they subscribe for no Liberal paper, and pay not one cent to sustain a course of lectures in their dead-and-alive town. More than that, they boast of it. Examin the curiosity a little further and you will discover that this same pseudo-Liberal pays from $25 to $100 a year on his wife's or daughter's church account. He is so generous that he neglects himself and his own intellectual needs. I do not say "wants," for he wants no more intellectual development than he has. Lecturers and editors who hav spent years in scientific studies and experiments can teach him nothing, and he takes very good care that they shall not. W. F. JAMIESON.

Taxation, Capital Punishment, and Prayer.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A bill to tax church property in this state (Wisconsin) has been defeated by our legislature, which is to be regretted.

The Senate voted to restore capital punishment, but the House defeated their project, for which it is entitled to the thanks of the people.

There was great rejoicing all over the country at the conviction of Guiteau, and a speedy hanging is demanded. Ropes hav been sent to Washington to hang him with. Many jokes are cracked at his expense. Some papers speak of its being in bad taste. Would not the word brutal be more appropriate? Orthodox Christians seem to take the lead in their bloodthirstings in the matter, which may not be very strange, as their religion was born, nurtured, and reared in blood; in fact has waded in rivers of blood ever since it has had an existence—is essentially a blood theology. Guiteau's history is a natural outgrowth of his religion. He is constitutionally a religious fanatic. His life training has been in the inspiration theory. He is a firm believer in it, and claims that he was inspired to remove the president under such pressure that he had no power of resistance. In this he only voices the common sentiment.

President Arthur said in his proclamation that "God had removed from us our beloved President," and the pulpit re-echoes it all over the country. This is exactly Guiteau's theory, and if true, why hang Guiteau? If the principal is to escape the gallows, and the agent or instrument to be hung, why not hang the pistol? that was the instrument that did the work.

If the doctrin of inspiration is true, Guiteau has just as good a right, and is just as likely, to be inspired as Moses, Abraham, Peter, Paul, or Freeman. We hear no complaints about Moses's indiscriminate slaughter of thousands by command of God. Abraham is honored with the title of "Faithful Abraham," "the Father of the Faithful" for offering up his son Isaac. Freeman was sent to an insane asylum, Guiteau is to be hung, and what is to be done with Myers, who offered up his son a sacrifice to God by shooting him? Consistency is getting to be a lost jewel.

Then there is the efficacy of prayer theory, which thinking people are beginning to question. After the president was shot all the praying people went down on their knees for two months in prayer for his recovery. But their God was dumb as an oyster and as stubborn as a mule, and paid no attention to their pleading.

When Garfield's doctors announced that he was convalescent, and that it was only a matter of time when he would fully recover, they boastfully said, "See what prayer can do." But after he died, all they could say was, "Well, God knows best." If he knows best in one case, he must in all cases. Therefore it would seem to be a wise thing to let him alone, let him hav his own way, and stop this everlasting teasing. In my humble opinion, there is not efficacy enough in all the prayers ever offered on earth to sprout a potato or giv a starving man a crust of bread. E. B. ROUNDS.

The Three Persons in One.

The following facts in regard to the origin of the mysterious godhead are of interest in these days when they are liable to be lost sight of in the distance:

In the "History of the Christian Church from its First Establishment to the Present Time," compiled from the works of Dr. G. Gregory by Martin Ruter, D D., published by Carlton & Porter, 200 Mulberry st., New York (Carlton & Porter had charge of the Methodist Book Concern as agents of the Methodist church), page 72, is the following: "The first general council was called by Constantine, A.D. 325, at Nice in Bithynia. In this council Jesus Christ was declared to be of the same essence with the father." Same page, "Another council, which was held at Constantinople in the year 383, added to that of the Nicene council more precise terms to express the divinity of the Holy Ghost." Page 73, "In this council the Homousian doctrin, or consubstantiality of the three persons in the godhead, was declared a fundamental article of the Christian faith." Page 110, "The fourth general council, assembled at Chalcedon in 451, asserted the doctrin of two distinct natures in one person united in Christ, without any change, mixture, or confusion." Page 120, "In the year 553 a general council at Constantinople fully acknowledged the decrees of the four preceding general councils." Page 142, "At a general council convened at Constantinople in 680 the creed that two wills and two operations were existent in Jesus Christ was finally determined."

In the "Ecclesiastical History from the Earliest Period to the Present Time," by Rev. Wm. Palmer, M.A., of Worcester College, Oxford, page 35, these words occur: "The first Œcumenical Synod assembled at Nice in Bithynia, A.D. 325. And the Christian faith was declared in that celebrated Nicene creed, which has ever since been received as the rule of faith by all Christian churches. In this creed it was professed that Christ is 'of the same substance' (homousion) with the father, i.e., of the same real godhead." Page 41, "The second Œcumenical Synod was at Constantinople in A.D. 381. On this occasion the Nicene creed was enlarged, in order to express the belief of Christians that the Holy Ghost is truly God." Page 43, "The third Œcumenical Synod, held at Ephesus A.D. 431, decided the doctrin of the union of the divine and human natures in the one person of the Lord Jesus." Church Taxation in Michigan.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I was pleased to note in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 18th Mr. Green's kind notice of our efforts in the cause of justice, as connected with the subject of church taxation. From my knowledge of the members of our state legislature, I am satisfied that the majority of the members believe as we do upon the abstract question. It was more than we expected, however, that they would do the right thing and brave the prejudice of the church. I heard members express themselvs in this wise, "Personally I believe churches ought to be taxed, but the great majority of my constituents do not, and I deem it but just to represent my people rather than my personal views." The agitation is not over by a long way, as these tender-footed legislators will find; and they will also find that they hav constituents who will demand justice at their hands in the future. Means will be taken to advise the people of this state of the members who did right and those who did the other thing on this question, as they may become candidates at future elections.

The new tax law passed at the late special legislativ session was framed by a commission of five persons appointed for the purpose. This commission asked for a public expression on the subject of church taxation. There were at once eight thousand names on petitions in favor, and scarcely any on the other side, not to exceed two or three hundred. And yet in the face of this expression that they had themselves asked for, Mr. John Moore, of Saginaw, and Charles A. Kent, of Detroit, both members of the tax commission, took occasion to pettifog their personal prejudices before the legislature in favor of continuing the pauper exemption.

Of the whole number of petitioners, over 2,000 were from this city. The credit of sending in this large number is largely due to Mr. Edward Chope, Mr. C. Schulenburg, and Dr. W. R. Merwin, of the local committee.

It is seldom that the legislature of Michigan is approached by petition by so many names on any subject. We shall pick our flints and try again. S. B. McCracken.

A Test for Spiritual Mediums.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: At the State Convention of Spiritualists and Liberals lately held at Ionia, Mich., F. D. Lacy in giving a short address stated some of his objections to what appeared to him to be the mysticisms of Spiritualism. He though that the "clairvoyants" of medical profession assumed more in their newspaper advertisments than they were able to substantiate, and that their treatment was a farce and a growing imposition well calculated to dupe that class of the community more subject to the miraculous than to good sense; that it is not uncommon to meet with those who assume to treat by spiritual aid, who scarcely know a muscle from an artery, and when under the "influence" are not any wiser, and that such impostors claim to read letters without unsealing, and giv medical advice from a lock of hair, a glove, or an old kerchief; that from the knowledge he possessed of such things he could regard them as no less than impostors; and that if they were such the sooner they were discountenanced the better for the world; that such things were tinctured too much of ancient miracles to be a good healthy doctrin to promulgate; but that if they had reached another strata of thought beyond where he had fathomed, and these mysterious things were facts made to appear illusiv because of not being understood, then, as he was a seeker for truth and an ardent lover of scientific investigation, he very much desired some satisfactory test of Spiritualism to sustain what at present he must necessarily reject. He therefore presented an envelop which he said contained a slip of paper with a few words written upon it, and desired to giv one hundred dollars for the benefit of the society when they would procure a clairvoyant who would read the words inclosed without unsealing or mutilating the envelop; and in addition to this sacrifice he would espouse their cause and would henceforth promulgate their views.

As there were none to accept his generous proposition it is still lefe as a standing offer for all time or until some one is able to accomplish the phenomenon.

I would advise the Spiritualists to spare no pains to demonstrate to the world, if in their power, their ability to comply with Mr. Lacy's request, and thereby establish that fact; or if unable to do so, let them frankly acknowledge some of their nefarious impositions slung upon the public.

A Truth Seeker.

Wilson and Comstock.

In a recent issue we chronicled the fact that Comstock had begun suit against Mr. Wilson for defamation of character. That the suit is entirely malicious, no one who knows the two men can doubt. In the Brooklyn Eagle Mr. Wilson makes the following statement of the case:

"Now," said Mr. Wilson: "Mr. Comstock had written a libelous letter to over a thousand of my patients. Each patient brought me a copy of that letter, together with a copy of a letter sent to Mr. Comstock in reply. These were patients of mine who had been cured by my appliances. Feeling that Mr. Comstock had deeply injured me in the eyes of the public, I immediately applied to Messrs. Howe & Hummell and presented the libelous letter to them. They decided that it was a criminal libel, and forthwith made application to Judge Solon Smith at the Jefferson Market police court, and he, upon the face of the letter, admitted that the letter was libelous and granted an order of arrest thereupon. We sought for Anthony Comstock several times at his office, and were told that he had gone into the country and would not return for a week. I, myself, was told at the entrance to his office that he had been in the office a few minutes before, hence my order of arrest. I offered $100 reward for the discovery of his whereabouts, and had him arrested in a room above his own office. He was taken to Jefferson Market police court, and by Justice Solon Smith, the same judge who had granted the warrant, ordered to find bail for his appearance. Said bail was given to the amount of five hundred dollars. No more was heard of the matter for three weeks, when I received a notice to be at the Jefferson Market police court for a hearing. I attended, with between fifty and sixty witnesses, so that a special room had to be set apart for their accommodation. These were patients who had been cured by my appliances and had this letter from Anthony Comstock. It was decided by Judge Smith that the case should be handed over to the district attorney to prosecute on behalf of the people, and that I should receive notice in due time when a hearing should be had. In the mean time I applied to a celebrated lawyer in New York, who wrote to the district attorney, to Judge Smith, and to Mr. Tenny, of Brooklyn, Comstock's attorney, for a copy of the brief and information connected with the business, and we were to be notified when another hearing was to be had. My attorney, Mr. Dawson, went with me to the police court in the interim, and we were told by the officer in attendance that Judge Smith had gone into the country and would not be back for a week, and as the case was in his hands nothing would be done until his return. Yet only two days after this I received a letter from Judge Smith, intimating that the case had been heard and settled. The next I heard of the matter was that Anthony Comstock had been honorably acquitted. Feeling aggrieved that such a proceeding could occur in America, I wrote in the columns of the Brooklyn Eagle an explanation of the whole affair. I then applied to my attorney, Mr. Dawson, who prepared papers for a new action against Anthony Comstock; but by the advice of my personal friends I allowed the matter to rest, waiting my time for other evidence against him. At the present moment I hav such papers in my possession. I several times offered, through the columns of the press, a sum of $5,000 to Anthony Comstock if he could show he had received a letter from any one complaining of me, and yet he, in his present action, has dared to state that I had abandoned the action against him. This I hav not done. He has been the cause of a loss to me of over $30,000. This can be proved by my books. I hav the best of the faculty of Brooklyn and New York in my favor. Dr. O'Brien, of the Hospital for Incurables, on Blackwell's Island, will testify in favor of my appliances, which Anthony Comstock attempted to disregard by his letter.

"'The milk in the cocoanut' is simply this: I had given Mrs. Chase $100 to prosecute the inquiry at Washington into Anthony Comstock's conduct in other matters. It was for this alone that he dared to assail me. The facts are that Mr. Comstock was not in Jefferson Market police court five minutes, and the case was not called on the next day, and not until three weeks afterward, when I appeared with my fifty or sixty witnesses. The fact is, I only want justice done me."

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 73.

839. I cannot think that Jesus spoke the truth if he said, "These signs shall follow those that believe: in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them." It is the easiest thing in the world to prove the falsity of this claim. There are between two and three hundred millions of Christians in the world who believe in Jesus, and there is not one of them who could handle cobras and other poisonous serpents; who could swallow prussic acid, corrosive sublimate, cyanide of potassia, strychnine, and hundreds of other deadly poisons without thereby being poisoned. They would kill the pope of Rome, Archbishop of Canterbury, Cardinal McClosky, Howard Crosby, Joe Cook, or Dwight L. Moody just as quick as Charles Bradlaugh, Robert G. Ingersoll, or a believer in Brahma, Buddha, or Mohammed. It is the most arrant falsehood to claim anything of the kind, and as a proof of it there is not a Christian, however great his faith in Jesus may be, who would dare to test the matter and let me prepare the dose.

840. As a prophet Jesus can hardly be called a success. On more than one occasion he said that before some of those standing around him should see death or taste death, he would make his second coming and be seen in the clouds of heaven in great splendor and glory. What has been the fulfillment of this prophecy? Not only has every person who has lived on the earth at the time he uttered it tasted death, but eighteen hundred years have passed away, hundreds and thousands of millions of people have been born and lived and died, and nothing of the kind which he predicted has ever taken place. Judging by the past, we have good reason to believe that eighteen hundred years more will pass away, and many times that amount on the top of it, before that prophecy will be fulfilled.

841. It does not seem fair in Jesus, unless he wished to befog the minds of his hearers, that he should speak to them in parables and riddles which they could not comprehend, and which, judging from some of his remarks, he did not wish them to comprehend. In the fourth gospel especially there is much so metaphysical and obscure that it has hardly been properly understood even down to this day. It was not so with the ancient sages whom I have mentioned; they taught in such plain, simple language that two meanings could hardly be given to it. With Jesus some of his teachings have no apparent meaning, while others are susceptible of two or three meanings.

842. When Jesus approached the hour of death he did not show that fearlessness of the grim monarch that many pagan heroes before him showed. Although death was to be the gateway through which he was to pass to reach the regions of bliss, the only avenue by which he could gain the celestial sphere, he exhibited a great amount of dread and cowardice as the king of terrors approached him. In the garden of Gethsemane his fear and trepidation arose to such hight that he is said to have actually sweat great drops of blood; while on the cross, although an hour or so only separated him from the arms of his heavenly father, for whom he had such great love, he seems to have given himself up entirely to fear and despair. He groaned out in the greatest terror, "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabacthani," My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me. We have no account of any of the old pagan sages dying in such utter horror and fear. How different from the way in which old Socrates died, who was just as wrongly sentenced to death as Jesus was. He conversed cheerfully with those around him; he heaved no sighs, uttered no groans, showed no fear; but when the hour arrived he calmly took the poison cup, quaffed it without trepidation, and lay down and died like a man; he did not howl like a frightened god.

843. There are many other passages in the teaching and actions of Jesus which are very open to criticism, but I think I have alluded to enough of them to show conclusively that in the domain of moral and personal bravery he did not equal those old heroes who preceded him by five hundred or a thousand years. Possibly the hearing of the abject state of mind in which Jesus found himself before his taking off is what caused his followers to show such terrible fear when they approach the hour of death. If their master was so afraid to die, perhaps they conclude they have some reason to be so themselves.

844. I cannot think that Jesus was a person of any literary attainments. We have no account of his ever reading any book, magazine, newspaper, or manuscript of any kind. If he ever wrote anything there is no account that anybody ever saw it. It is certain that nothing from his hand was transmitted to the generations that succeeded him. We have no grounds for the opinion that he had what is called "book learning," of any kind.

845. There is no ground for thinking he was a scientific sort of man. He made no pretensions to mathematics, he never mentioned astronomy, he knew nothing of geology, he showed no knowledge of chemistry, he was undoubtedly ignorant of biology, physiology, anatomy, mineralogy, natural history, botany, the laws of matter and force, of pneumatics, hydrostatics, or any of the kindred subjects. About all the knowledge he seemed to have was about devels and religious superstitions, which the more a man has of the worse off he is.

846. It is difficult to see that he gave any new truths to the world, any new inventions, anything calculated to do mankind good, to enable them to overcome the obstacles in nature, either in agriculture, mechanics, or social life. He taught no better means of tilling the soil, securing good crops, improving the breeds of horses and cattle. He gave no new hints in mechanism or machinery. Though he was a carpenter's stepson and had good reason to know what hard work it is to shove the jack plane all day, yet he got up no planing, mortising, or matching machine, or anything of the kind, when he should have known how much those things were needed by his fellow-carpenters. He seems to never have done so much as to invent a patent churn, a clothes-wringer, or a patent mouse-trap. What a fine thing it would have been for the world had he been able to anticipate Watts, Fulton, and Stephenson in building the steam engine, the steamboat, the railway, etc. How gratifying it would have been had he imported some new ideas in these branches; what a good thing it would have been if he had invented a reaping machine, mowing machine, or a good improved plow. But he did nothing of the kind. Probably he had no ability or inclination in that direction. He even did not invent a new church, a sewing machine, or even a mouse-trap.

847. He seems to have known nothing of philosophy of any kind, save it be the philosophy of devils, of evil beings, of everlasting furnaces and lakes of fire, in which to submerge his fellow human beings forever. As millions of the human race look to him for guidance and instruction, what a pity that he had not a greater share of useful, practical information, which would do the world some good, and a great deal less about devils and hell, which are not of the slightest benefit to anybody.

Resolutions

PASSED BY THE PATERSON LIBERAL LEAGUE, IN MEMORY OF CAMPBELL WILSON, DECEASED.

Whereas, Campbell Wilson is no more. A good man has been taken from us. Death has claimed its own; but the example of his life will liv forever, for he lived for the good of his race, and all that was good had his earnest approbation and support. He was charitable to a fault, giving of his slender means to everything brought to his notice which in his judgment was noble of purpose and which had a tendency to benefit those who needed help. And in the death of our esteemed friend society has lost a good citizen, a wise counselor, and his family a good husband and father, a sympathizing friend. Therefore,

Resolved, That in the death of our worthy brother, Campbell Wilson, we mourn the loss of one who was at all times an activ and earnest member, giving of his time and means bountifully for the propagation of universal mental and religious liberty and the emancipation of the masses from the tyranny of concentrated wealth. Extending our sympathy to the bereaved wife and daughter, relativs and friends, we can only say that we venerate his noble life and manly deeds, remembering that in the midst of life we are in death.

Resolved, That these resolutions be sent to The Truth Seeker of New York and the Boston Investigator, and a copy of each be sent to the family of deceased. John Warr, Sec.

Book Notice.

I hav received Vol. I. of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and am "powerfully pleased" with it. It is a larger and nicer book than I had anticipated, and is more profusely illustrated, and the pictures are of a better style and quality. Every one who sends in $5 for the three volumes will be sure to get more than double the worth of their investment. The trip has been very enjoyable to us all, but to go over the ground anew, and in one grand instalment with no break-offs, is another treat few of us would be willing to miss.

The letters are biographical, historical, descriptiv, entertaining, Infidelic, and Bennettish; and can one giv them greater praise or better recommendation? Roll in the "fives," then, brothers and sisters, and let full coffers and glory-wreaths greet our wanderer as he returns to his Truth Seeker home after all these long weeks of absence, during which he has so faithfully used his eyes, brain, and muscle for our benefit and the benefit of all human kind

"Who are the great?
They who hav boldly ventured to explore
Unsounded seas and lands unknown before;
Soared on the wings of science, wide and far,
Measured the sun and weighed each distant star;
Pierced the dark depths of ocean and of earth,
And brought uncounted wonders into birth;
Repelled the pestilence, restrained the storm,
And given new beauty to the human form;
Wakened the voice of reason, and unfurled
The page of truthful knowledge to the world;
They who hav toiled and studied for mankind,
Around each slumbering faculty of mind,
Taught us a thousand blessings to create—
These are the nobly great!"

Elmina D. Slenker.

NUGENT'S GROVE, IOWA, April 1, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 for the Round-the-World fund, if not too late. JOHN PUGH.
["Never too late" is a good saying, and fits the case exactly.—ED. T. S.]

ELDON, IOWA, April 3, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 for the Round-the-World books. I was opposed to his going, but am willing to help bring him back. Am very late, perhaps too late for the star; however, since the old dragon got so many, I can do without any. My "V" should hav been along sooner, but hav to borrow now at eight per cent. R. HUBBARD.

AURORA, DAK., April 3, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: The Catholics and Protestants hav been oppressing me for the last fifteen years. They picked me up for a triumph. Let it be known that I am an Infidel, and that the Infidels hav the triumph.
Yours truly, CHAS. MCLEAN.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., March 25, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that Mr. Bennett is expected to arrive in California next month. We shall try and hav him giv one or more lectures in Sacramento on his way home. J. L. York is lecturing here now to good houses, and is very highly appreciated by many. N. D. GOODELL.

PAOLA, KAN., March 23, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER and help carry on your deviltry to as great an extent as possible. I like to read those devilish letters from that devilish holy land. As "Holy Writ" says there were many little devils in that holy land, I wish Mr. Bennett would bring us a sample of the kind that was cast out of Mary Magdalene if they are not extinct. Yours, W. A. LOWE.

BALTIMORE, MD., March 27, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: I hav read over the letter of Wm. W. Scholes in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and your reply. Well, I must say that, in my estimation, you hav demolished him. Why is it that when a person "gets religion," especially among the Methodists, he immediately gets possessed with the notion that everybody else other than Christians is going to hell? Let everybody mind their own business, and every tub stand on its own bottom, I say.
Yours truly, C. GARWOOD.

BIG CREEK, N. Y., March 30, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: I see that the pilgrim got baptized in the river Jordan, and that it came very near being the "cross over" to him. Had he been drowned would not the good Christians, so called, hav thought it a just dispensation of divine providence truly? But as he finally, like Jonah, was landed on dry ground again, the other gentleman, the devil, must hav held the reins at the time, which it seems to me was the best end of the bargain, as is often the case.
Well, I hope and trust that the pilgrim will be permitted to once more reach his beloved American home and many friends. JULIA C. FRANKLIN.

LOWELL, NEB., March 27, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: It is with pleasure that I write you and our Liberal friends in general. I must say that Liberalism is spreading fast and growing stronger every day. I was through a portion of Colorado last winter, and wherever I stopped I found lots of Liberal friends. I hav Lucy N. Churchill's badge pin. I must say that it was a great help to me in my travels.
We expect to organize an auxiliary to the National Liberal League this summer. If we are successful I will write later. Please send Kersey Graves's "Bible of Bibles," for which find inclosed $2, and oblige a friend. Yours truly, EDDIE E. CARPENTER.

ETNA MILLS, CAL., March 23, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: I am no newspaper correspondent, and this is the first time in my life that I undertook to write to a paper. However preposterous it may sound to you, I hope, nevertheless, you will favor me with its publication. I always deplore my own unfitness for correspondence when I see some of our local press of this coast favoring so much the Christian elephant. There are many valiant TRUTH SEEKER correspondents on the Pacific Coast, though none seem to be aware of the necessity of fighting that big religious monster at home. My Liberal friend, E. W. Fitzner, of Nevada City, seems to be the only one who has the courage to face the lion in its own den. He is always on the alert. I find these three letters, "E. W. F.," signed to opposition arguments in a great many of our coast papers. Would some of the able writers to THE TRUTH SEEKER take the same ground, and make a bold front at the Christian devil, the semi-religious press would soon learn to comprehend our rights. Ever since I became acquainted with the valiant TRUTH SEEKER, through that most outspoken Liberal friend of mine, and through a great many books he sent me since—always accompanied by an encouraging letter—I hav for myself learned to contradict any Christian assertion made in my presence, and hav become convinced of the easiness of upsetting any and all Christian follies that are afloat. All Liberal papers and books that I receive are, after read, put out right away on mission work, and you know, through the subscription list I hav sent in, how much good it has done in so short a time. Formerly, Infidelity was only known by name in this place, while now we number quite a respectable little army. Let every Liberal become more outspoken and aggressiv, and Christians will soon not only learn to respect us—they will also lay down their arms before our invincible force. Yours truly, A. A. LANPHER.

ITHACA, N. Y., April 1, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that there are various opinions expressed, pro and con, in regard to the origin, present, and future of mankind, and, with your permission, I will express my opinion. As we are not all similarly organized, it cannot be supposed that we should all view things in the same light; and by looking into the same mirror each will behold a dissimilar likeness, and each may build upon the same foundation, and his superstructure will be to suit his individual ideal. Now, to carry out Liberal ideas, each upon a general foundation has a claim according to his capacity and importance in the building. There are many members in the body; some are comely, and some are uncomely; yet one member cannot say to another, "I hav no need of you," for all are necessary to the body. It would take much time and space to carry out my ideas from the premises laid down, therefore I can giv out a few hints for the present purpose. As to the origin of the animal called Adam, I will only refer you to the opinion of Darwin, upon which I stand. And then take Adam as a representativ animal structure of humanity. I take the ground that God is a scientific principle, from which all things material, moral, or intellectual are derived, thus laying the foundation from which I propose to pen a few thoughts. And, as you will observe, in order to form the superstructure called man, or the first Adam, or animal in the shape of man, it was first necessary to form the elements of his nature, moral as well as animal, which God did do according to his animal nature, as is plainly seen throughout the history of the acts of the people, as laid down in the Old Testament. As a consummation of the first Adam, it is recorded that God finished his work on the seventh day and rested. As to how long it took him I hav no means of knowing; it is said, however, to be six days, but how long the days were I cannot tell. It is recorded that he commenced at the beginning. I hav no proof when that was. But I think when he got through he must hav been weary, as he took one day to rest; also his organ of combativness must hav been excited, being the commandment of so many bloody wars. But he pronounced his work good (I suppose it was good of the kind), it reflected his image. But it would appear that after God had well rested himself, and in contemplation of his work he had not yet caused it to rain upon the earth, therefore there was no mental moisture, and of course his man was incapacitated and could not till the ground. Thus God through the shadow of his female likeness (progressiv intelligence) was made to repent that he had made the man, and gave him up to his animal excesses, and he was overwhelmed by them (as per account of the great flood).

Thus came the end of the first man, Adam. Except from the dust of the ground (or the same animal in the shape of drunken Noah) God the male by the assistance of the female better half, the shadow of reason, now called the Lord God, taking a companion, formed another man, having now the assistance of the female likeness breathed into his nostrils the breath of life (moral). And thus you will observe we hav another beginning, as recorded in St. John i, 1, "In the beginning was the word," signifying declaration, promis, and the word was with God, that is, female assistant, the breath of life; in other words, the conception and the word was God, or will be in the future, when man becomes a living soul, and has the likeness of the female god reason, thereby controling all his animal propensities or excesses. And now the controling principle is the word, or Jesus.

Now this man Jesus, the tiller of the ground (animal) is an improvement, though imperfect. He exhibits a degree of morality and liberality, but is rigidly sectarian and uncharitable, must leave all and follow him. And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden, and there he put the man, the tiller of the ground, Jesus, and he proclaimed himself the son of man, and also the son of God, which he was in the animal, and also a moral capacity, but not in an intellectual capacity, he did his best as to dressing the garden into which he was put. And there went a river (moral sentiment) out of Eden to water the garden, and from thence it was parted and became into four heads, representing the four leading Christian sects of the present day, or the sources from which they are nourished. But Jesus being so positiv, sectarian, and uncharitable, and came not to bring peace but a sword, and so ready for denouncing and combating that his enemies crucified him and put him to death, supposing they had made an end of him and his doctrin. But he had so impressed his followers that they handed down his sayings from generation to generation; that there came a time when they succeeded in getting up the myth of his resurrection and ascension, and his coming again in the future near at hand, to take vengeance on all his enemies. And this impossibility is carried down to this day. And now his professed followers, being greatly weakened by science, being in a deep sleep, God proposes to make a helpmeet for him, which helpmeet is to be brought to him in the shape of representation by woman's ballot, and as the great majority of church-members are women, and they are looking every day more and more favorable at the fruit (the ballot) of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, which stands now in the midst with the subtle, deceptiv, beastly principle in their bosoms, carrying them on to splendor and to power. And thus will animal prevail, and we shall see God in the Constitution, the Bible in our schools, and our liberties in every sense of the word downtrodden, perhaps for a generation or more, but the female likeness, though of slow growth, will prevail, and man become a living soul (intellectual) after many mental and perhaps physical battles with the many-headed and horned sectarian beast. But intelligence, the male and female god of reason, will reign in humanity in due time. The weekly return of THE TRUTH SEEKER fills me with pleasure and anxiety. Please find inclosed $3 for your paper another year.
Yours for truth and liberty, ZENAS KENT.

BOTLAND, KY., April 1, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: From the short acquaintance I hav had with THE TRUTH SEEKER I like it well, and consider it as a true friend. There is not one (that I know of) in this vicinity who adheres to the same opinions and belief that I do. I am all alone so far as Freethought and Liberalism are concerned. This is truly a Christian community, if one must judge by church-members and so-called religious worship. I am in sight of three churches, Campbellite, Baptist, and Methodist, and every one claims the only right and true way to that unseen, unknown, and unexplored heaven, and all who do not believe all their teachings and all that is in the Bible must go to hell. I guess hell will hav a dense population, for there is only one right way to heaven, and as all the different denominations cannot be right, the members of all but one are sure of hell; then comes the Infidel, the unbeliever, and others who are bound to occupy this hell in spite of themselvs.
'Tis such a pity this almighty Christian God could not or did not show the right way in such a manner that all could see in the same light, but unfortunately such is not the case; we, or all who reach this promised heaven, must believe all the contradictions, absurdities, impossibilities of a so-called divinely inspired word of God, which nowhere bears the imprint of the true God. The most devout believers of the Bible cannot tell by whom it was written. They say it was written by God through men, but they cannot prove that the men they say wrote it were inspired or really wrote a word of it. But perhaps I am making this letter too long, so I will close for this time. Yours for truth, A. B. BRINEY.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3, for which add my name to your list of subscribers. This is my first subscription, but I hope it will not be my last. My vocation is such that I can giv no permanent address, but trust it will not be too much trouble should I desire it sent elsewhere before the expiration of the year.
I never hav believed in the Bible, for the study of science taught me that it was all a lie, and thus I hav always been a Freethinker to a certain extent. A short time ago a friend loaned me the "Age of Reason," since which I hav been an enthusiast in the cause of truth, and I regret that my education has not fitted me to devote my life to the overthrow of superstition, but as it has not I must content myself with humbly advancing Liberal ideas, for every man exerts some influence over his fellow-men, be it ever so little.
Some of the doubters admit that the Bible is a collection of unreliable legends, but advance the opinion that the majority of the people are not enlightened enough to dispense with religion, that they must hav something to restrain their evil passions; but I say, not so; this is the age of enlightenment, the era of science, and fraternity should take the place of groveling superstition, while truth, purity, and honor should become our watchwords.
Let every man who despises fraud do his share to cast overboard the monstrous humbug, Christianity, and all its appurtenances, then let the millions that are yearly poured into the insatiable maw of the church be devoted to alleviating the distress that is everywhere; poverty is a terrible incentiv to crime, as statistics will or ought to prove, and they surely will prove it if the crime is traced to its primary cause.
And last but not least let woman take her place side by side with man; let her hav equal rights, equal privileges; she is not fitted by nature for the rougher paths of life, but she is every way man's equal, from an intellectual point of view.

S. V. Mulkey, in your issue of Feb. 11th, claims that by advocating the cause of woman suffrage we court the ruin of the Liberal cause; he also claims that woman has ever been, and ever will be, a supporter of the church; admitted, so far as the first is concerned, but who established the church? Woman but follows where man leads the way, and the reasoning powers of woman are in every way as clear as those of man, and when woman once pins her faith to a cause she never deserts it. Then, exclaims some one, the church-members will never desert their banners for those of Liberalism. But I think they will, for the simple reason that not more than one in ten believes in the nonsense that is taught them in the church, and but await an opportunity to declare their unbelief.

There are several doubters, and at least two rank unbelievers in the engineering corps to which I am attached, and besides having family discussions we sometimes carry the war into the camps of the nativs, and to say that we hav had a queer experience in this benighted part of Pennsylvania is putting it mildly.

Herman Dean, a nativ of Fishkill, is the name of my friend and fellow-Infidel, a promising young man, who I trust will make his mark, for he is quite an able amateur lecturer, although still in his teens. We stop at farm-houses when away from the villages along the route, and as the only subjects of conversation are the crops, railway prospects, etc., we find it rather dull unless the grand topic of the day is broached, when we generally hav a hot debate, and invariably defeat our opponents.

One day we encountered a Methodist minister and a deacon in a small village called Nassville, and they were the first to open fire. We soon found out that the deacon did not believe in the annual and diurnal revolution of the earth, so his argument amounted to nothing, and I sat and listened while Dean poured the red-hot shot, grape and canister, into the arguments of the minister, deacon, and their wives. Several times I thought I should be obliged to assist my friend, but each time he rallied and pressed the steel home, and after an hour had expired they were all hors du combat, and had the grace to acknowledge it.

I hav treated these grand subjects in a very brief and scattering manner, but for fear I am trespassing too much on your valuable time I will close.

Yours in truth, G. C. T. Hall.

Mr. Editor: This is a fine day down here, and it is what the Christians call the holy Sabbath, and the folks are mostly gone to the holy church of the holy God to hear the holy preacher take a holy text from the holy Bible and preach a holy sermon about the holy son of the holy virgin. Yes, sir, there is getting to be so much holiness in this country, I mean this world, that it naturally stinks of it to me. No, I am mistaken; it is not a natural scent, because unnatural things can't produce natural ones. I know now what it is—it is a supernatural scent. I should hav said it supernaturally stinks to me. No, sir, I am not right yet. On more mature reflection I plainly perceive that all things are natural, therefore I can't be right yet. Stop! let me think a while. I can't say it naturally stinks, I can't say it unnaturally stinks, or that it supernaturally stinks. Is it possible that I was mistaken about smelling something? Holiness, holiness! What kind of stuff is it, anyhow? Can you see it? No. Can you taste it? No. Can you feel it? No. Can you hear it? No. "I see, I see," says the blind man. It is not tangible to the senses. It is not material; can it be spiritual? Not materially so. Eureka! Eureka! It is all as plain as noonday, now. Listen: It is an immaterial spiritual chimera, a colorless, weightless, scentless chimera. So I am mistaken about smelling holiness, but I am sure I smelt something, and it must hav been the old hen which hatched this ghostly chicken. Old Yahweh has got a snap judgment on the Southern states. His gospel shops are numerous all over the country; his agents are named legion, and they are continually busy throwing sand in the people's eyes, and they let them—that is, most of them do, and they are mad at the rest because they don't.

I tell them that their religion is all a humbug, and they say they can admit that to be a fact, and then be on the safest side, because, they say, if we are right and they are wrong, they are as well off as we are; but if they are right, and we are wrong, our case will be awful. In reply to this I tell them that their religion is a tyrannical one, and based on policy, while ours is humanitarian and based on principle, and that as for the ifs and buts in the case we are not troubled with any. The case to us seems to be clear as crystal so far as their burning hell and fanciful heaven is concerned. I hav for a long time been studying the God question, and I think I am now about settled down on it. I believe in a universal intelligence (material, of course); all things are material—eternal of necessity, because something cannot come of nothing. Well, about the easiest way to express it is, God is the universe.

Kent, O., March 22, 1882.

Friend Macdonald: For the encouragement of the many friends of the liberal cause, I beg leave to report that the Y. M. C. A. of this place has died a natural death, and been buried beyond all hope of resurrection. We are blessed (or cursed, as you please) with eight churches in our little place, with their tall spires pointing heavenward, with the same number of priests and their families, who, like so many leeches, are sucking the life-blood from our honest hard-working citizens. We also hav a little seven-by-nine brick jail, or lock-up, as it is called, where we confine drunken refractory Infidels—for of course Christians do not get drunk and act naughty—and keep tramps in. When a poor unfortunate waif of humanity comes along, who, perhaps, for no fault of his own is out of work, and asks for a night's lodging, our Christian trustees order our Christian marshal to lock them up, with, perhaps, a lot of thieves, and if they ask for anything to eat they are politely told that it is enough for the town to lodge them, without finding them. While a poor family were wending their way to our Western country to seek a home during the hot weather in summer, the wife and mother was taken down with a fever and had to stop here. And our Christian people shut them up in that little tight place without a bed and no ventilation but one small window with iron bars, and kept them there for two weeks, and her little girl playing about the streets all this time, bareheaded, barefooted, and nearly nude, and none of our Christian people gave her a bonnet, pair of shoes, nor an old dress. Such is Christianity in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Fraternally yours,

B. F. Cona v

Doylestown, Pa., March 27, 1882.

Mr. Editor: A debate came off here on March 11th, 16th, and 17th, between B. F. Underwood and Rev. A. R. Horne on the following propositions:

1, The Bible is false in its scientific teachings; 2, that it is false in many of its historic teachings; 3, it is erroneous and pernicious in many of its moral teachings; 4, that the leading religions and moral doctrins of the Bible were accepted before the book was written; 5, that intellectual, moral, and physical progress the past four hundred years has corresponded with the decline of the belief taught in the Bible.

The first night of the debate Mr. Underwood proved beyond a doubt that the Bible and science are in direct conflict with each other; also that the book was false in many of its historic teachings. Mr. Horne's argument against this could not be called logic. He talked a good deal about things being in a vapor or mist at the beginning; that God was walking about on it at one time, and afterward turned this dampness into a world. How he did it he did not say—may be by sleight of hand. He went on to say that things were rolling along for thousands, tens of thousands, and millions of years, forgetting, no doubt, that he was defending a book with a record of less than six thousand years. According to the book, about six thousand years ago God made this beautiful world out of nothing; he might hav occupied these millions of years spoken of by the reverend gentleman in getting this material ready.

With the second night came the moral question. Mr. Underwood gave a pretty full account of what the moral teachings of the book had done toward establishing and perpetuating human slavery, polygamy, intemperance, and many other evils, quoting passages from the book sanctioning all these crimes, proving clearly the Bible pernicious in many of its moral teachings—admitting, at the same time, that it did teach morality in some instances. This evidently began to make the good gentleman think he had something more than a skirmish line to contend with. He did not undertake to disprove what Mr. Underwood claimed immoral in the book, but quoted passages, saying they were moral. The claim had not been made that everything in the book was immoral. Like most of God's vicegerents, he sounded the Christians' well-known battle-cry, quoting a passage here and there from the old book, saying they were moral, "This is my God's book!" and "My book!" and tossing about on the stage like a lunatic. Thus he put in his time the second night. It was plainly evident to the intelligent part of the audience that the holy man was about used up.

The third and last night came with the two last propositions—fourth and fifth. The fourth one was presented by Mr. Underwood, and was not replied to by the reverend gentleman, he admitting it to be true.

In the last proposition he attacked Mr. Underwood's arguments, in his first speech of half an hour making a poor showing. After Mr. Underwood made his second speech the pious man came out on his last raid, and commenced by saying his opponent was a learned and able man, having written a number of works and made it a life-long study, and that when he saw the challenge in print he waited to see if any one would accept. They did not, and he thought it his duty to defend the holy book, but he was sorry some abler man did not come to the front; that he would rather hav met Bob Ingersoll than this man; that Ingersoll was a fool. By this time he was completely lost for argument, gave way to his temper, and began to abuse his opponent, Freethinkers, and Infidels in general, closing by inviting his friends to leave before Mr. Underwood could giv his closing address. A few narrow-minded Christian bigots obeyed their master.

Mr. Underwood, in his closing remarks, nobly espoused the cause of the Freethinkers and Infidels, and showed that Christianity did not prevent people from losing their temper, or keep them from abusing those who honestly differ from them in religion. Two of our good editors, one a Democrat, the other a Republican sheet, were afraid to say but little about the discussion. The Democrat did insert the advertisment. The editor having been a good officer in the late war, was not to be entirely frightened out by those religious hypocrits who opposed the debate. Still, after the discussion was ended he came out in an editorial misrepresenting the whole thing. Mr. Underwood and the Freethinkers, he said, were pulling down and offering nothing in place of the old bogus religion. The Republican editors would not advertise the debate, and what little they had to say about it was in favor of the Christians. While Freethinkers are the pioneers in the cause of civilization, they must expect to meet with this opposition on all sides. Still, in spite of these cowardly assaults, Liberalism is gaining.

Yours truly, A. J. Reading.

Jersey City, N. J., March 27, 1882.

Mr. Editor: In calling the attention of Liberals to the need of establishing a Liberal orphan and old folks' home, I would suggest that the two be combined into one, thus making one benefit the other, giving to the old folks the care of the children. Such a home could be made self-sustaining by allowing four hours' work of some kind when they became old enough. Some out-door work, such as farming and gardening, would be healthy exercise for the children, and by having a superintendent who understood the business, I think the home could soon pay its own way. Then devote certain hours to study and recreation, thus bringing the children up to work and giving them a fair education, enough to carry them through the business world. My idea has been seconded by several, and one has offered the land to build this home in Nebraska, and he has, I think, made a liberal offer.

Now I think this vast United States could support two homes. Awake, Liberals! Do you want to hold your own? Do you want to see those who hav grown old in the cause be supported by the church? Do you want to be supported yourself by the very church you hav no faith in? Then arouse! Strike when the iron is hot; and that is just now. I will subscribe one dollar a year. Who will put their names down for another? Now, then, a committee is to be appointed if there is anything to be done in this matter. Will some of the Liberals suggest some way of appointing such a committee?

Yours truly, B. F. Batt.

Paterson, N. J., April 3, 1882.

Mr. Editor: I want to tell your readers that under the auspices of the Paterson Liberal League in the last two weeks, we hav had two splendid lectures, one from Mr. Courtlandt Palmer on "Co-operation, or the Reign of the Common People," clearly proving to the writer, at least, that the "common people" were nearer to the millennium to-day than at any time during the world's history. But at the same time he believes that before that time arrives the "common people" hav a great deal of work to do, which must be done in a co-operativ fashion, organization. If the League should survive for another month or two, Mr. Palmer will, I think, speak for them again. So mote it be.

Mrs. Neymann's lecture on the "Spirit of Republicanism," was simply grand. She was thoroughly master of her subject, and gave ample satisfaction to a critical audience, who enthusiastically applauded throughout the discourse. This is a new lecture of Mrs. Neymann's, and the writer, who is somewhat acquainted with the lady, must acknowledge that she far exceeded his expectations, both in composition and delivery, and all of our Liberal friends east of the Alleghanies who want to hear a good lecture should engage her forthwith. They will be amply repaid. And I would further say that it is a lecture for the times, and ought to be heard or read by every voter in the Union. Yours, J. Warr.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed please find subscription to The Truth Seeker. Allow me to congratulate you on your reply to young Scholes; no one could sit down on him harder than that. I wrote him a postal, on which I offered him a first-class plan for a kicking machine, to produce a counter-irritation in a particular part of his body to help his head, which I think you must hav enlarged considerable.

Yours, truly, G. C. Fink.

Waiting.

BY ALHAZA.

Sadly we stand by the moaning sea,
And fairies pale are waiting there;
And stark and still on the cold white sand
A mermaid lies with gleaming hair.

Faintly we wait, by the foaming tide
Hovers his bark o'er the dark-blue wave?
The westlin' wind, will it never arise,
And bring him to greet us, the true and brave?

The sea-flowers wave 'mid the creamy turf,
And morning gray peeps over the hill:
For a gleam from his sail to gild her brow,
And every nook with light to fill.

Now moonlight comes with silver veil,
And hunts the wave that bounds afar
To here his vessel plows the deep,
Beneath the dewy evening star.

Her arrows fall upon the beach,
And glimmer round the mermaid pale,
While fairies whisper to the breeze
To fill his coming snowy sail.

The Brain and the Bible Discussed

BY P. C. CHEEKS AND EDGAR C. BEALL.

Mr. Cheeks.

EDGAR C. BEALL, Dear Sir: In accepting your challenge to criticise publicly your work entitled "The Brain and the Bible," I take up chapter ii, devoted to the discussion of "The Fall of Man," since you are led to say at its close: "And if this account is a myth, is not the whole system of orthodoxy also a human invention? If Adam never fell, we certainly hav no need of any Redeemer."

Here you fall into the customary error tyros in theological disputes, especially disputants of your school, never fail to find in their blind gropings after truth. After presenting your subject, you proceed to discuss it from your standpoint—the standpoint of a man who is, phrenologically speaking, deficient in Veneration, Wonder, and Hope. Such a man, you say, "of ever so great intellect, who is deficient in Veneration, Wonder, and Hope, is incapable of ascertaining the higher needs of the soul, or of properly criticising the Bible" (Beall, The Brain and the Bible, p. 56).

After this, I wonder greatly how you could hav brought yourself to so forcibly illustrate the very doctrin you devote so many pages to annihilate, i. e., the freedom of the will, and your own incompetency to criticise the Bible! You say that "if Adam was created perfect, his lower propensities must hav been under the control of his intellect and his moral seniments; and, therefore, no thought or action could hav found sympatny in his mind without the consent of his moral faculties and intellect."

In the first place, Adam was a finite, not an infinit being. If he had been created and endowed so that he could not but choose to do as he was bidden, then there would hav been no freedom in his actions at all; he would hav been simply a machine running in the grooves of Divine fate, and would hav had to go wherever the track was laid—to the right or the left, as the irreversible switch was turned! Indeed, he would not hav needed any restraining faculties at all. For of what use would they hav been to him? Restrain him from what? The very fact of his having fallen proves him to hav had freedom of will, just as the production of your books proves you to hav been free to disbelieve the Bible's account of man's genesis, and to get outside of your environments. You hav devoted a great deal of time, wasted a great deal of vital force, squandered more financially, to prove no freedom of the will, when your argument so forcibly illustrates it that I wonder your perceptiv faculties did not enable you to see it before you had launched your puny bark on the ocean of blind skepticism!

You say that "perfect freedom can exist only where there is an absence of all restriction"—p. 79. If this is perfect freedom, and you here maintain that it is, how then are you led to say, "If Adam was created perfect, his lower propensities must all hav been under the control and direction of his intellect and his moral sentiments." Any restraint here? In one of my former communications to you I made this proposition: "Only a perfect man could perfectly will to sin." On page 79 of your work, above quoted, I am glad to see that you recognize the force of it, but am equally pained at your lack of consistency in your definition of perfect freedom given on page 67. If "freedom can only exist where there is an absence of all restriction," with what consistency do you maintain in your other proposition, "If Adam was created perfect his lower propensities must all hav been entirely under the control of his intellect and his moral sentiments?" In all this, freedom, perfect freedom, in one place in your your book, is one thing, and in another place in the same work it is another. Pray which is it? If "perfect freedom is the absence of all restriction," and you say that it is, how can "perfect freedom be the restriction of his lower propensities under the control of his intellect and moral sentiments," as you also maintain? You are paradoxical as well as illogical!

Are you a professor of phrenological science and cannot imagin a perfectly balanced mental organization? If you can, will you admit, as you do on page 79, that it has "perfect freedom" because there is an absence of all restriction? If "there is an absence of all restriction," then would not such an organization be perfectly free to perfectly evolve a will to do that which its intellect and moral sentiments knew to be forbidden? An engin, to be perfect, must be constructed so as to permit of its going backward as well as forward. A perfect mental organization has the power also, has it not, of going forward or backward—of willing to do, and then willing not to do, as the case may be? If Adam had not a perfect mental organization, how could he hav evolved the will to disobey the Divine command, since, "perfect freedom," in your opinion, is the "absence of all restriction?" If Adam had been restrained in the exercise of his faculties, he would not hav been free! If he possessed faculties which were capable of being acted upon from without by another, without the power to resist, then his was not a perfect mental organization! This you affirm when you say that "Adam's lower propensities must hav been under the direction of his intellect and his moral sentiments, and, consequently, no thought, no desire, no action could hav found sympathy in his mind unless approved by his moral sentiments and intellect." On this head, Fowler, than whom there is no greater exponent of your science, says, "Men cannot well enjoy even their passions, without the assent and actual participancy of their moral sentiments."

"The will is always determined by the strongest faculties; either those which are permanently strongest, or those which are for the time being strongest" (Beall, The Fall of Man, p. 75.) "The other faculties giving their consent to this gratification of the leading propensity" (Ibid). What more do we need than these admissions to show the fallacy of your argument against the "fall of man," or "the freedom of the will?" If "the will is determined by the strongest faculties, or those which are for the time being the strongest," why may not the faculties appealed to in the case of Adam hav exerted their influence the strongest so as to hav determined him to evolve the will to gratify his desire for more knowledge, and thus to hav disobeyed his Creator's command? Did he not yield to the desire? and, in yielding, did not the other faculties giv in their assent to the gratification of this, for the time being, leading propensity? This is the inevitable conclusion the principle laid down by you leads me to reach; and how you could hav failed to see it I am at a loss to discover! The law you lay down in the above citations I recognize as true, and as agreeing with Prof. Fowler, above quoted. That it should hav obtained in the mental organization of Adam givs me no cause for wonder or dismay. Indeed, if he had not been influenced by his "for the time being strongest faculties," he would not hav had the power to gratify the desire which he willed to gratify. Willing to do a thing, and putting that will into execution, are two different things. The one is a mental, the other a physical effort. The one "is determined by the strongest faculties," the others "giving their consent," as you say, while the execution of that will thus evolved may be attended by such insurmountable obstacles as to entirely overcome the possibility of its being gratified!

But my letter is long enough. I hope not too long, however, for there is much in your book to which I can but take exception, and especially in the chapter selected, that I fear you will lose patience before I hav done with you. Before I close, however, let me again quote from Prof. Fowler. He says: "Man is created with a faculty of his mind and an organ of his body expressly adapted to worship a Supreme Being: therefore a God exists specifically adapted to receive the homage this faculty prompts him to pour forth. What proof of any problem, even mathematical, could be any stronger? It has but two conditions—that man is adapted to worship God, and that the existence of one thing in Nature adapted to another proves the conjoint existence of both. The first is a matter of sight and touch. This organ is easily found. Now see whether those who are large, rounding, and full here, are or are not also devout worshipers of God in some form, and do or do not experience a strong feeling of sacred awe and reverence. They may worship idols, or sacred images, or ministers, or in this sect, or that; may be Pantheists, 'looking through Nature up to Nature's God,' but they worship some God somehow. They may hav it small, and yet be strict Sabbatarian worshipers from duty, or fashion, or Spirituality, or other motivs; or hav it large, and discard all sects, but will worship what is a God to them.

"The only other prerequisit to render this proof of the Divine existence absolutely demonstrable, is the law of adaptation. Who will jeopardize their reputation for sense by denying that? A part of Nature, a part and parcel of man, a portion of his anatomical structure, a Faculty, a great section of his mind, that very highest part of Nature, and of the body, together with the most exalted and central function of the human mind, is adapted, and adapts man, to loving and worshiping God: therefore a Supreme God exists adapted to receive the spontaneous human love, adoration, and worship. No proof of any natural truth, not even that two and two make four, is any more absolutely demonstrated."

P. C. CHEEKS.

Washington, D. C, March 17, 1882.

Mr. Beall.

MR P. C. CHEEKS, Dear Sir: Although I hav challenged you to a brief debate, I hope the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will not feel that I hav thrust it upon them without due regard for their time and patience, especially in case they should find it dull. Your friends hav represented you to me as a converted Infidel, now an activ champion of orthodoxy in Washington, and as one who is greatly "disgusted" with my "sophistry." Regarding you thus, and trusting that your criticism may really be taken as the expression of a leading thinker on your side, I would reply, first, that your quotations from my book show at least one of three thing: Either you are dishonest, or you are a very careless reader, or you are so blinded by superstition that you cannot understand an Infidel argument when expressed in the plainest English. Of the three, I am disposed to think the last, i. e., that you are simply lost in a fog of faith. I wish to be generous and fair with you, but how else can I explain your first (alleged) citation from page 56, where you attribute to me the very absurdity which I distinctly affirm is held by "some clergymen of to-day who imagin that phrenology may be reconciled with orthodoxy," and which the whole paragraph is intended to refute? You represent me as asserting that "a man of ever so great intellect, who is deficient in Veneration, Wonder, and Hope, is incapable of criticising the Bible," when in fact this is exactly what I do not hold, and what I explicitly deny in the sentence immediately following the word Bible, viz., "But it might quite as reasonably be objected that a skilful pilot is no longer capable of determing the safest course of a ship when in a storm, simply because at such a time all her sails are furled." Also on page 225 I argue that intellectual men who lack Veneration are best adapted to examin theology, from the very fact that they can do so without restraint. Can you be surprised, then, if I question your intelligence or your honesty, when you so grossly pervert my meaning?

Next, of Adam, you say, "The very fact of his having fallen proves him to hav had freedom of will." Here your argument amounts simply to this: Cheeks is right, therefore Beall is wrong. Christianity is true, therefore Infidelity is false. This may be good orthodox legic, but you must not expect Freethinkers to see any force in it.

Most emphatically I say that "perfect freedom (i. e., absolute freedom) can exist only where there is an absence of all restriction."

And now you wish to know how I am led to say: "If Adam was created perfect, his lower propensities must all hav been entirely under the direction and control of his intellect and his moral sentiments." Is it possible that you can ask such a question after reading my chapter on "The Fall of Man?" Do I not clearly state in the second paragraph, as well as in several other places, that a perfect mind would be entirely under the supremacy or control of the moral sentiments and intellect, and on that very account, not free? Do I not say on page 71 that "the idea of a perfect moral nature necessarily implies a complete moral restraining power?" Do I not italicize the same idea again on page 73? And is not a portion of the chapter especially devoted to arguments against the freedom of the will? Where and how, then, am I "illogical?"

You assert that "only a perfect man could perfectly will to sin," and with this paradoxical standard in your own mind you measure everything I say. But what could be more absurd? Can you not see that I am consistent in denying both the freedom of the will and the possibility of Adam's having fallen in spite of a perfect endowment of moral restraining power? Do I not explain (pages 67–74) how the moral faculties, when perfect, would, in the very nature of the case, completely subordinate all the lower propensities? You seem to make no distinction between entire freedom in the action of the lower propensities, and perfection of the whole mental constitution. Just here is the pivot upon which our dispute rests. You hold the doctrin of free-will, not I, and you disagree with me, not I with myself. I do not say, as you do, that if Adam was created perfect he was entirely free to sin. On the contrary, I argue that a perfect man would be equipped with perfect Conscientiousness, Firmness, etc., etc., which would restrain him from sin; and that where there is perfect, i. e., absolute, restraint, there cannot be perfect, i. e., absolute, freedom.

Furthermore, I cannot comprehend what you mean by saying that on page 79 I recognize the force of your doctrin that mental perfection and freedom to sin are reconcilable. I certainly do nothing of the sort; and as to my "lack of consistency" in my "definition of perfect freedom given on page 67," I will simply say that neither the word freedom nor the word free occurs on page 67 at all. Therefore you do me the greatest injustice in asserting that I giv conflicting definitions in different places. When I speak of perfect freedom, on page 79 and elsewhere, I mean absence of all restrictions; and when I refer to a perfect mind, as I do on page 67 and elsewhere, I mean one endowed with perfect moral restraining faculties, hence not free to sin. Is pure gold free to corrode? Is not its very purity a barrier in the way of its becoming like the baser metals when exposed? Just so with men. The more moral sentiment they hav the less freedom they hav to do wrong. In this world, where everything is related to something else, nothing can be entirely free.

As to the parallelism you seek to draw between a perfect mind and a perfect engin, I would say that you could only compare a perfect man to a locomotiv which has been set to go forward, and of which the reversing lever has been locked.

Again, you ask me how Adam could hav evolved the will to disobey if he "had not a perfect mental organization," since "perfect freedom," in my opinion, is the "absence of all restriction." Here, as before, you employ the terms "perfect mental organization" and "perfect freedom" just as though they were compatible, utterly ignoring my definitions and misrepresenting my position. Need I say more to show that you are wrong?

But to crown the general unfairness of your letter, you conclude with a long quotation from Prof. O. S. Fowler, in support of a sophism which I hav written a special chapter to refute, yet you do not so much as refer to what I hav said on the subject. Is this the approved Christian method of criticising a book? If you meant to expose my errors, or to defend that "correlation" fallacy made so popular by Fowler and Joseph Cook, why did you not attack my arguments against it? Granting that, perhaps, you did not consider them worthy of mention, you should not forget that there are many who will not share your opinions unless you support them with something better than mere assertion.

According to Fowler and yourself, if we hav a faculty adapted to a certain sphere of activity there must also exist, conjointly, just as much material, and of as high quality, as the faculty is capable of using. Why, then, do you not argue the existence of a hundred gods, since Veneration would certainly be adapted to them all as much as to one? If you dare to say that reason points to but one, I reply that reason points to none. Your "correlation" argument, like the argument from design, proves too much, hence nothing.

What is God? Simply a conception of a person more powerful and wonderful than ourselvs. Veneration is, of course, appealed to by this conception. And in like manner we may excite the fear (Cautiousness) of a child by talking of hobgoblins and ghosts; but do these things really and necessarily exist conjointly with Cautiousness? Did "Jack and the Beanstalk" ever exist in fact simply because the story is adapted to gratify juvenil Wonder? Would you argue that pies and cakes grow on trees simply because we hav Alimentivness "specifically adapted" to enjoy them if they did thus grow?

The existence of a faculty indeed proves the conjoint existence of something to which it is adapted, but not everything. It indicates simply that there is or has been somewhere something, either in fact or fancy, to develop it. But no sentiment or propensity can be shown to bear a special relation to any single object in the general class of things to which it is adapted, since all objects are perceived only by the intellect, and some may exist only in imagination. Veneration, therefore simply proves that man was formerly, if he is not now, surrounded by objects or phenomena adapted to excite his admiration and fear. The relation of the parent to the child is almost enough to develop such an instinct, and surely the faculty has to-day a sufficiently wide field for legitimate activity in prompting us to pay that beautiful deference and respect due to the rights of every human being. But to our prehistoric ancestors the march of nature was an endless panorama of alternating savagery and sublimity, which, in the infancy of even a nobler race than ours, would hav brought its proudest sons in terror to their knees, and taught them the language of prayer. When man first began to think beyond the visible, he clothed the infinit with his own finite rags, and then, with his face in the dust, he worshiped the mental image of himself. But it is the glory of our day that we are at last raising our heads to recognize Goodness as the only God, and Human Happiness as the Highest Good Respectfully,

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland. Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogell and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, in Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogell and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a pale or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turbid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

Gems of Thought.

"EDUCATE the people" was the first admonition addressed by William Penn to the colony which he had founded. "Educate the people" was the legacy of George Washington to the nation which he had saved. "Educate the people" was the unceasing exhortation of Thomas Jefferson; and I quote Jefferson with peculiar pleasure because of all the eminent men that hav ever lived, Adam Smith himself not excepted, Jefferson was the one who most abhorred everything like meddling on the part of governments. Yet the chief business of his later years was to establish a good system of state education in Virginia.—Macaulay's Speeches.

THE thing that is uttered from the inmost parts of a man's soul differs altogether from what is uttered by the outer part. The outer is of the day, under the empire of mode, the outer passes away in swift, endless changes; the inmost is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.—Carlyle.

IT is asserted that the doctrin of the immortality of the soul, and of happiness in a future state, givs us a solution of that distressing problem, the misery of the innocent on earth. But in reality it does nothing of the kind. It does not explain the origin of evil, and it does not justify the existence of evil. A poor, helpless infant is thrust into the world by a higher force; it has done no one any harm, yet it is tortured in the most dreadful manner; it is nour ished in vice, and crime, and disease; it is allowed to suffer a certain time, and then it is murdered. It is all very well to say that afterward it was taken to everlasting bliss; but why was it not taken there direct? If a man has a child and beats that child for no reason whatever, is it any palliation of the crime to say that he afterward gave it cake and wine?—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

IN the canonic books of the old dispensation there is not a single genuin text claiming to come from God, which teaches explicitly any doctrin whatever of a life beyond the grave.—W. R. Alger.

OF all the dreams handed down to us by the scriptural writers, by far the most material, as evidence of their divine character, is that on which the mystery of the incarnation mainly rests. Take away the dream in which Joseph was informed that the Holy Ghost was the parent of Mary's first born child (Matt. i, 20), and that mystery will depend conclusivly on a story of an angel's visit, of a necessity related by Mary herself (Luke i, 35), for obvious reasons not the most trustworthy witness on so delicate a point. But this is not all, for it was by a dream that the magi, after adoration, were warned to escape the vengeance of Herod (Matt. ii, 12), and by a dream that the life of the infant Christ was preserved in the massacre of the innocents (Matt. ii, 13). Christianity, therefore, may be said to owe its very existence to the celestial intimations conveyed in dreams, and Christians cannot consistently embrace any theory which would lead to a denial of their holy and prophetic character. Since, moreover, we hav numerous instances in the Bible of such dreams being granted to heathens and idolaters it is plain that the Christian deity does not confine his nocturnal visitations to orthodox believers. If the chief butler, the chief baker, Pharaoh, and Nebuchadnezzar dreamed prophetically, so may any of us at any time according to this teaching.—Amberley's Analysis.

DREAMS hav in all ages and countries been believed in as indications of the future; and of all forms of superstition this is perhaps the most excusable. Whatever is mysterious as to its cause and beyond the power of the will appears as supernatural; and what more so than dreams! The thoughts in dreams, too, arise out of the past and present circumstances of the dreamer, and therefore are not altogether without connection with his future destiny, as most other omens are. In the Homeric age it was firmly held that "dreams come from Zeus." In the most ancient civilized communities of which we hav any record—those of Egypt and Babylon—to interpret the monarch's dreams was one of the most important state offices and was confided to a college of wise men. A common way of constructing the Greek or Roman oracles was for the inquirer to sleep a night in the temple, after performing sacrificial and other rites, when his questions were supposed to be answered in dreams. . . . In modern times, and among European nations, dreams are seldom heeded except by the very ignorant or superstitious; and "as idle as a dream" has become a proverb.—Chambers's Encyclopedia, Article Dreaming.

VICTORIAN: Yet I fain would die!
To go through life, unloving and unloved;
To feel that thirst and hunger of the soul
We cannot still; that longing, that wild impulse
And struggle after something we hav not
And cannot hav, the effort to be strong;
And, like the Spartan boy, to smile and smile
While secret wounds do bleed beneath our cloaks;
All this the dead feel not—the dead alone!
Would I were with them!
HYPOLITO: We shall all be soon.
VICTORIAN: It cannot be too soon; for I am weary
Of the bewildering masquerade of life.
—Longfellow's Spanish Students.

IF this god book of Christianity is to hav a much longer life as a popular reading book it will hav to be completely overhauled and purged of whole chapters and numerous scattered texts that no decent man could be hired to read aloud to a select audience of refined and intelligent men and women. For the sake of the sweet memories clustering around the time-worn volume; for the sake of the glimpses of ancient manners, customs, and beliefs; for the sake of the legends, stories, and scraps of romantic fiction, which, like Robinson Crusoe, Jack the Giant-killer, Mother Goose, and others of like ilk, hav become a part of the literature of the heart, I would hav the Bible saved just as we save Shakspere, Ovid, and other books which though not exceptional in all respects are yet too precious and valuable to be destroyed and lost. But to blindly worship and insanely adore such a medley of all that is bad, vile, and obscene, simply because there is goodness, morality, and beauty mixed in with it, is foolish, absurd, and fanatical. —Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

IT is no use to try, you can't tell how many legislators are boarding at a hotel by the number of cocktails sent to the rooms of a morning. This is a case where figures will lie.

WHEN a nice young man asked the bright daughter of an undertaker her father's profession, she promptly replied, "He's a planter." She couldn't tell a lie about a little thing like that.

AN Indiana clergyman delivers his sermons in rhyme. His congregation prefer them that way. They sleep much sounder, and leave the church much more refreshed than after listening to a prose-y discourse.

THE GRAND OLD GARDENER,

Though Adam's dress was a nude design,
He often would sadly grieve,
And sit on the limb of a tree and whine,
'Cause he couldn't laugh in his sleeve.

BOB INGERSOLL indignantly denies the charge of plagiarism. He says he never stole anything. We are not quite so sure about that. To us, off here in Texas, it looks very much as if he stole a march on the prosecution in the Star Route cases. —Siftings.

AMBITION.

One by one the roses fall;
One by one the cashiers go;
Mince pies fade away in spring;
Boys begin to play base-ball.
When the gentle summer comes,
With its wealth of summer flowers,
Then a gentle picnic sprouts
In the sylvan dells and bowers.
Let us never waste a day,
Let us always forward push,
Or some other duck will take
Myrtle to the matinee.

KEEPING LENT.

Farewell to opera and ball,
Reception, and to morning call;
Hail to ashes, sackcloth, prayers,
To sewing-circles, orphan-fairs.

I've packed away my party dresses;
I've straightened out my flowing tresses;
I've sobered down my giddy look,
And hunted up my lost prayer-book.

And now, with pious soul intent,
I feel I'm ready to repent;
For, as I think the rector says,
The Lent will end in forty days.

IN MEMORIAM.

A Boston dispatch says: "Telegrams to private parties in this city report that General Grant has failed. It is rumored that General Grant's brokers hav sold him out, he not being able to further guarantee them."

Broke, broke, broke,
In the city by the sea!
And the news comes in the dispatches
Flat busted is U. S. G.

Oh, well for the stalwart man,
As he shout's o'er his medal in glee;
Oh, well for the whole three hundred
Aud six, who voted for me.

And the stately ships go on
To their haven under the hill;
But oh, for a look at George Jones's fund,
And the passage of Logan's bill

"SWEET child," gushingly exclaimed young Mr. Taffitalker, as her little baby brother of five bright summers came toddling into the parlor; "Sweet child, with sunny hair and eyes so like its lovelier sister's; come here, cherub, and see what I've got for you." And when the cherub came and spread two fat, dimpled hands, covered with bread-crumbs and molasses, on the knees of his pale striped pants, Mr. Taffitalker whispered hoarsely under his breath that he had a large two-edged knife that would go through him four times and back again, for him, but, unfortunately, he hadn't it with him. So he gave him a handful of red and green candy—very unwholesome—and smiled sweetly as the cherub trotted away, and murmured audibly, "Dear little fountain of love and sunshine and innocence, how my heart always goes out to a child." "This, dearly beloved," remarks Burdette, "goes under the head of 'dissembling.'"

A MEXICAN BALLAD.

There was a Greaser bold and staid—
Don Gomez del Gomazza—
Who loved a gentle Greaser maid,
The Donna Frontpiazza.
Don Gomez rode a mustang proud,
And wore a bloody slasher,
Of all the gallus Greaser crowd
He was the giddiest masher.
Don Gomez once was tempted sore.
Despite of law and order,
To glut his greedy thirst for gore
And cross the Texas border.
"So fare you well, my lady fair—
My pretty little Donna!"
In vain she tore her raven hair—
Her Gomez was a goner.
Then hied he to the Rio Grande,
With Yankee hordes to battle;
He crossed into the promised land,
And went to stealing cattle.
And there, with more than royal pluck,
He did his pleasing duty,
And, meeting with uncommon luck,
He started home with booty.
But, oh! the Yankees, fierce and strong,
While marching out to battle.
Beheld Don Gomez come along
A-driving them their cattle.
They gathered in the festiv steers,
And snagged that gallus Greaser,
And, with a round of hoots and jeers,
They hanged him to a tree, sir.
Loud wailed the Greaser maiden fair—
The Donna Frontpiazza;
Once more she tore her maiden hair
For Gomez del Gomazza!

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of the work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

Notes and Clippings.

BARNES, the Kentucky evangelist, accepted a purse of $800 for his revival work in the village of Paris. As he professes utter pecuniary disinterestedness, this rather works against him.

REV. W. H. TURTON, of Farmington, Iowa, has been expelled from his church for preaching universal salvation. His elders tell him there is no authority for such doctrin in the Bible. It grieves the good church-members to think that any one but themselvs shall enjoy the pleasures of heaven or escape the fires of hell.

JESSE JAMES was the son of a preacher, Rev. Robt. James, a prominent Baptist minister. His favorit song was "Am I a soldier of the cross?" and he once shot a man for questioning the truth of the Christian religion. Such a missionary as he would hav just suited John Calvin.

A MICHIGAN revivalist goes out this season with what he advertises as "the most complete camp-meeting outfit ever invented, consisting of a handsome pavilion, splendidly painted, portable stand, reed organ, and gilded cross in the pulpit." That's nothing. A good many circuses will beat it.

THE temperance constitutional amendment has been defeated in the Connecticut House of Representativs. A two-third's vote was needed to pass it. One hundred and fifteen votes were cast in its favor—ten short of the number required. Only fifteen votes were cast against it, but 119 members did not vote at all.

A DAUGHTER of the Rev. John Deering, of Toledo, committed suicide, and it was said that his cruelty prompted the act. A congregational council was called to try Mr. Deering, and to that body he sent his resignation, saying that he was innocent, but that he did not "feel equal to the task of personal vindication."

A ROMAN Catholic woman's little girl was taken to a Presbyterian Sunday-school by a missionary in east St. Louis. The mother entered the church to rescue the child from what she deemed religious peril. The sexton considered her conduct disorderly, and put her out by force. The merits of the case are to be weighed in a suit for damages.

THE Rev. J. W. Minor, colored, of St. Louis, is in serious trouble. He was arrested for passing a forged check. Then the officers searched his house, and found many things not pertaining to the ministry, such at a rifle, a set of surgical instruments, and some billiard balls. All these things were claimed by persons who said they had lost them through sneak thievery. Mr. Miner says he does not rely on human aid in this emergency.

THE Rev. George Sweinforth was holding revival meetings at Pawpaw, Ind. He started one day to drive with Sister Beekman, the principal singer in the meetings, to the railroad station. She kissed her female friends in departing, and the minister improved the opportunity to kiss her, too. Considerable talk was caused in the town by that event. The evangelist stated, in a sermon, that Pastor Mann, of the local church, had also kissed Miss Beekman, and neither had meant any harm by it. Such kissing was commanded by scripture, and he was going to obey, no matter what was said about it by worldly people.

THE superintendent of the Pacific Mills at Lawrence, Mass., gets eighty-three dollars a day. The operativs whom he superintends hav been getting eighty-three cents a day. The stockholders of the mills hav been getting an annual dividend of over twenty per cent for nearly two decades. In consequence of serious defalcations and mismanagement on the part of the officials the mills are slightly less profitable than they were. The superintendent tells the operativs that in order to keep the dividends up they must work for sixty-eight cents a day. The operativs refuse. Thereupon the superintendent sneers at their "ambition to liv in luxury," and priests and parsons are found to upbraid them for being unwilling to work for the same wages paid at other mills.

WE hav received our first volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and a real beauty it is too. This is the first of the three volumes to be published by D. M. Bennett of what he sees in journeying around the world, and which he furnishes to those who hav aided him by giving him five dollars to help him make the journey. As a descriptiv history it is unsurpassed by any ever before published. One of its important features is its absolute freedom from bigotry and superstition. These books are well worth the money they cost, $5, and the best advice we can giv our readers is, for those who are able, to send Mr. Bennett the money and get them.—Cloud County Blade.

AT a recent meeting of the French Academy of Science, the change which seems to hav occurred in the French climate during the last few years formed one of the chief topics of discussion. It was remarked that the sardine fishery, which regularly brought in to the Breton population $3,000,000 per annum, had now become a thing of the past, the sardines having completely disappeared from the coasts. M. Blavier attributed the mildness of the winter and the precocity of the spring to the altered direction of the Gulf stream, but no definit opinion on this subject was pronounced. Before, however, the members separated a committee composed of MM. Faye, Jaunsen, Daubree, and Admiral Julian de la Graviere was appointed to study the problem of the Gulf stream.

THE controversy over the Rev. Dr. Smyth, the newly-elected professor at Andover theological Seminary, rages with new force, several of the leading Congregational and other religious papers having taken it up. Until Dr. Smyth was elected by the trustees of Andover to this position, his theological views were not considered unsound or unsatisfactory. He was the pastor of a Presbyterian church in the West. After his election some of the advocates of the most rigid style of Calvinistic theology looked into his published sermons, and pronounced him to be loose on several of the doctrins which that system got from John Calvin, who is usually regarded as a very orthodox man. The question of Andover now is whether Dr. Smyth shall be thrown overboard, or the rigidity of ancient formulas of faith be relaxed to keep up with the spirit of advancing thought.

SPEAKING of the position the editor of the Irish World finds himself placed in by the action of the recent Catholic council, Liberty says: "Mr. Patrick Ford is in a dilemma. He appears not to be aware of it, but his readers are painfully aware of it. We venture to point it out to him. Some weeks ago he announced in large type that, the moment the Catholic church should denounce the doctrins of the Irish World, he would renounce them. Since that time a provincial council of the Catholic church has met in Cincinnati, composed of nine bishops and archbishops in five dioceses. That body has issued a pastoral letter to be read from the altar of every Catholic church in five important states. This letter says: 'The Irish World is a bad paper, breeding insolence and defiance of authority, teaching Communism, assailing the rights of property, and inciting to rebellion that can end but in disaster. We therefore direct pastors to warn their people against this paper, and as far as in them lies, discourage its circulation among them.' This language is direct and unmistakable, and unless set aside and rebuked by the pope (as it is not likely to be), must be considered authoritativ. It is the utterance of the power which Mr. Ford acknowledges as the sole source of truth. Now, therefore, he must renounce his faith and condemm his church as a foul instrument of tyranny for the oppression of the many by the few, or he must renounce his reasn, keep his pledge, and publicly confess that for the last ten years he has been a servant of the devil. Liberty calls on him to do one or the other, and that promptly, or stand convicted as a hypocrit and time-server."

THE Washington correspondent of the Congregationalist is evidently getting to be heretical. He complains of a colored church of that city which encourages chicken-stealing by getting its members who commit these little depredations out of jail. He says: "I hav occasionally spoken of the lack of morality in some of the colored churches. Riding in the horse cars into the city in the early morning, the seat by my side was taken by a police captain. In his hands he carried a stout oak stick some three feet long, on one end of which was a leather thong that could be slipped over the wrist, leaving both hands free; the other end of the stick was shod with steel and sharpened to a fine point. With this staff a thief could open any door and force his way into any barn. Its owner was a well-known chicken-thief, whom the officer had just left in the cell, having been captured the night before, the staff in his hands, a weighty bag of chickens over his shoulders. The officer remarked that the man would be subject to a slight fine or to an imprisonment of fifteen days, and would then return to his life-long employment as a chicken thief. 'But,' said the officer, 'this man is the pillar of his church. No sooner had I arrested him than he sent for his minister, who at once came to the station, and remarked, "Well, brother Jones, don't trouble yourself. We'll call a church meeting to-night, and get you out at once if it's a fine," and I presume it was done.' That he was a professional thief, living by his stealings, formed no hindrance to his church standing."

THE San Francisco Jewish Times, from which we clip the following, is mistaken by considerable over 40,000 in our circulation, but we suppose it took its figures from its wish, and so we shall not quarrel with it. Its kind words will long be treasured: "D. M. Bennett, editor and proprietor of THE TRUTH SEEKER (New York) a journal having a circulation of 50,000, is expected in this city next month. He comes via China and Japan, and will be tendered a public reception by the Liberals upon his arrival here. Mr. Bennett has been making a tour of the world, the expenses of the trip having been voluntarily contributed by the Freethinkers of the United States and Canada. The total contribution is between $5,000 and $6,000. In return Mr. Bennett writes three volumes of his travels, copies of which will be mailed to those who subscribed to the Round-the-World fund. The distinguished traveler has a remarkable history. He is an American by birth, was reared a Shaker, and is now a Freethinker. As he owns the largest Freethought publishing house in the United States, and has carried on for years a bold and incessant war against what he calls 'the popular superstition of the day,' the fanatics and bigots hav followed him with a remorseless hate, and finally had him arrested, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary at Albany, where he was incarcerated for twelve months on a a trumped-up charge. The Liberals got up a petition signed by 200,000 citizens, and sent it to Washington, asking President Hayes to sign his release. The ex-president feared the power of the church, and so Mr. Bennett had to serve his term out. The petition was the largest ever presented to an executiv at the White House. Mr. Bennett upon his release was received by the Liberals in a great public demonstration at New York, was sent to Europe by them, and upon his return was again sent on his Round-the-World trip, from which he is returning. This was done to show that the Liberals believed him innocent and to condemn the fanatical outrage perpetrated upon him. He will undoubtedly receive a hearty reception in this city. Among the executiv committee appointed to make the necessary preparations to receive him we notice the names of two Jewish-Americans, A. Berenz, Sr., of this city, and Philip Cowen, of Petaluma, two true and loyal sons to the core."

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Egypt.

Luxor, Dec. 19th.—At 8:30 this evening, after three days on our up the Nile journey, we arrived at this town, the point of our destination. Several servants from the Luxor hotel met us on the boat with large lanterns and escorted us to our quarters. We have had a very pleasant passage up, stopping at Girgeh, Keneh, and other towns of considerable size. In several of them minarets are prominent, giving positive proofs that the religion of the country is not what it once was. We saw the inhabitants, in an assorted variety of wearing apparel, from a full light suit to next to nothing, which is a breech-clout of limited dimensions, and in some instances even this was lacking. We saw many men raising water, principally by the shadoof or well-sweep plan, and these invariably wore no clothing save the clout, which they sometimes found an incumbrance and left off. Persons working in the fields are burdened with very little clothing. This looks odd at first, but it is singular how soon one can become accustomed to these things. The females wear more than the males, but their entire wearing apparel often consists of a single garment of dark stuff, between a chemise and a dress, without a belt or band around the waist, but a cloth over the head. We are told by those who have been five hundred and a thousand miles further up the river, that up in Nubia and Soudan many go entirely naked, and that girls wear nothing till about sixteen years of age. Since hearing this I have felt very little like visiting those parts, and cannot help feeling glad that the young ladies of America have not introduced the African fashions.

ANCIENT THEBES.

Luxor, on the east side of the Nile, is a modern town, but it occupies the site, or a part of it, where stood the ancient city of Thebes. It is a sort of market town, of considerable size. It derives its name, signifying palaces or temples, from its vicinity the ruins of the most remarkable temples, palaces, and tombs ever erected. The ancient city occupied the whole plain on each side of the Nile, but it was on the east bank that the chief portion of the city was situated, the western side being principally occupied by temples and palaces and the tombs of the dead. Homer described the city as having one hundred gates, but it is claimed that it was not a walled city. Thus the old poet sang:

> "Not all proud Thebes's unrivaled walls contain,
> The world's great Empress on the Egyptian plain,
> That spreads her conquests o'er a thousand states,
> And pours her heroes through a hundred gates,
> Two hundred horsemen and two hundred cars,
> From each wide portal issuing to the wars."

Thebes has marvelously impressed the mind of the world by its extent and the vastness of its monuments. Here were temples whose front elevations were nearly a mile in length, and here are fragments of colossal statues of dimensions truly enormous; colonnades that rose to over seventy feet in hight. Not only do these ruins extend over the whole breadth of the Nile valley, but on the sides of the surrounding mountains ancient remains lie in heaps, whilst tombs, still in good preservation, cover the western plain, and stretch far out into the desert. "It appeared to me," said Belzoni, "like entering a city of the giants who, after a long conflict, had been all destroyed, leaving the ruins of their vast temples as the only proofs of their existence."

The plain of Thebes is thus described by Heeren: "The whole valley of the Nile in upper Egypt offers no spot so fit for the foundation of a large capital. The mountain chains—the Libyan on the western, and the other, usually called the Arabian, on the eastern side—retire here to such distance on either side of the river that they leave a spacious plain, on both banks, whose breadth from west to east amounts to about three leagues and a half, and the length from north to south amounts to about the same. Toward the north this plain is again closed in by the near approach of the mountain chain to the river; toward the south, on the contrary, where the western chain continues distant from the river, it remains open. The plain, therefore, on which Thebes was built, though limited in extent, was yet sufficient to contain one of the largest cities of the earth. According to Strabo, there is no doubt but that the ancient city covered the whole plain. Thebes, therefore, was built on the two banks of the Nile, without being connected, so far as we know, by means of a bridge."

The exact origin of Thebes, like that of Memphis, is involved in much obscurity. It was after the decline of Memphis or Abydos that Thebes rose to be the capital of upper Egypt. Several kings are supposed to have reigned before the time Abraham is claimed to have entered Egypt. The first of the great Theban kings was Osirtasen I. "He was," says Bartlett, "the builder of the older and smaller part of the temple of Karnac, which served as the nucleus around which his successors grouped other and more colossal additions. This early Theban monarchy was, in fact, a religious community, in which place was a temple, the people worshipers at the gate, and the monarch the chief priest. The dynasty of Osirtasen was terminated by the conquest of upper Egypt by the Memphian kings, who built the pyramids."

Like the other ancient cities of Egypt, Thebes was for a time subject to the shepherd kings, till Amosis of Thebes expelled that alien race, and upper Egypt began to rise to its highest degree of power and glory. The temple at Karnac (two miles below the town of Luxor) received important additions from Amunoph, Thothmes, and the beautiful queen Nitoris. Under Thothmes III., lord of seventeen tributary nations, as displayed in the sculptures, the magnificence of Karnac greatly increased. Monarch after monarch, whom it were needless to name here, took a pride in adding to the glory of the Theban temples and palaces. Rameses II., of whom we have heard at Abydos, did much memorable work here also, as will be pointed out in describing the monuments. A few kings of lesser note succeeded, and then Rameses III., the builder of the temple Medeenet-Haboo, finished the record of Theban powers and splendor. Weak kings succeeded; foreign possessions slipped from their grasp, and Thebes became merely a vassal province to the new dynasties of Bubastis and Tunis, in the delta. Its fall is as obscure as its origin.

"When the dynasties of Lower Egypt were terminated by the Persian conquest, the great General Cambyses marched southward to conquer Ethiopia, turned back from the intended exploit by famine, and irritated by the loss in the desert sands of 50,000 men, whom he had sent to conquer the oasis, he madly wreaked his vengence on Thebes. After burning and destroying the temples and palaces, he plundered the tombs and left the city in a ruined condition, from which, however, it largely recovered. Theban commerce was utterly lost by the rapid growth of Alexandria under the Ptolemies. These princes made some considerable additions to the temples, etc., and in these additions Greek art is perceptible.

"The reign of Ptolemy Lathyrus," says the author before quoted, "is remarkable for the rebellion of Thebes, and for the final consummation of her ruin. It had long been failing in trade and wealth, and had lost its superiority in arms, and its temples, like so many citadels, its obelisks, its colossal statues, and the tombs of the great kings yet remained, and with them the memory of its bygone glory. The Thebans had borne for two centuries and a half under their Greek masters the political servitude, heavy taxes, habitual annoyance, and occasional cruelty. Under the government of Cleopatra Cocce the measure of their injuries overflowed, and taking advantage of the revolutions in Alexandria, a large part of Upper Egypt rose in rebellion. When Lathyrus returned to Egypt, Thebes refused obedience. For three years the brave Copts, entrenched within their temples, every one of which was a castle, withstood his armies; but the bows, the hatchets, and the chariots could do little against Greek arms; while the overthrow of the massive temple walls and the utter ruin of the city prove how slowly they yielded to greater skill and numbers, and mark the conqueror's distrust lest the temples should again be made use of. . . . The wide acres of Theban ruin prove alike the greatness of the city and the force with which it was overthrown; and this is the last time that Egyptian Thebes is met with in the pages of history. The habitations of the city were swept away but the temples, miles apart, from the nuclei of different scattered hamlets, whose inhabitants fill the plain, once covered with the living millions of the ancient city. The Christians under the Greek emperors raised their puny structures amidst the colossal courts of Medeenet-Haboo, but fled on the conquest by the Arabs, whose degenerate successors make their habitations amongst the tombs of Germa, and gain a precarious subsistence by rifling their contents and dragging from their repositories the mummied remains of their tenants.

"But the ruined temples still stand to call forth the wonder of the traveler. They have seen the whole portion of time of which history keeps the reckoning roll before them. They have seen kingdoms and nations rise and fall—the Babylonians, the Jews, the Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans. They have seen the childhood of all that we call ancient, and they seem likely to stand and tell their tale to those who will hereafter call us the ancients."

THE TOMBS OF THE KINGS.

December 20th.—This morning we purposed to go to the tombs of the Kings. We crossed the Nile in a large-sized row-boat, and found the current rapid. When we reached the western bank donkeys and donkey-boys, which had been engaged for our use, were awaiting us. There was one for each of us, including our guide, Josef Hassan, and a few thrown in for good measure. The boys bade us "good-morning" in pretty good English, and immediately commenced to praise their donkeys, assuring us that we would find them of the very best description.

There were also nearly a dozen Arab girls awaiting us with small water-jars or bottles on their heads. We were at a little loss to know why the girls were there, but soon the matter was made clear enough. They ran to us with the greatest enthusiasm, and commenced talking to us, with such English as they could command, with unusual fervor. "I be your girl; I carry water for you." It was in vain we told them that we did not need a girl, and could not begin to drink water enough to require a girl to carry it. "Oh, yes, yes," cried they, "I go with you. I be your girl all day. You shall not get thirsty. I give you water often."

We appealed to Guide Josef Hassan to learn what these girls meant, and he informed us that it was customary for girls to carry water for those who went out into the desert to the tombs, and that they expected but little for their services. So, with becoming resignation, we submitted to our fate, and consented that the girls might accompany us, though gently suggesting that one or two girls could carry all the water we required. But all wished to go, and we had to consent. A rather tall, straight, dark daughter of the desert selected me as the party who should drink the water from her bottle, and she assured me in the most emphatic manner that she would be my girl for the day. I told her if it was my fate to have a girl I knew no reason why I should not as soon accept her as any one.

"And now," said I, "if you are to be my girl, let me know what your name is, so I may know what to call you."

"My name is Fatma," said she.

"Well, that is a good name, and I think I can remember it; and I shall expect you will see that I do not get very thirsty."

We were soon on our donkeys and on our way toward the Libyan Mountains. The boys followed close at the donkeys' heels, whipping them up and keeping them at a good traveling gait. The boys soon began asking:

"You likee donkey?"

"Oh, yes, he seems to be a very good donkey?"

"You thinkee me good donkey-boy?"

"Why, yes, you seem to fill the bill. And what is your name?

"Mehemet Ali."

"Well, Mehemet, I think we shall get along very well together; but don't hurry my donkey too fast, for I am not a very good rider."

"All right, sir; I make him go just as you likee, sir. You want him to go slow, I make go slow; if you want him go fast, he shall go fast. My donkey shall suit you."

The girls with the water-bottles kept along by the donkey's side, and, whether the donkeys walked, trotted, or galloped, keeping the bottles on their heads, holding the same with one hand, and frequently asking if we were dry. It seemed strange how these children of the desert had learned to talk English so well, but probably visitors are coming so often that they easily learn the words they most need to use.

We cut a comical figure with our donkeys galloping along over the plain of the Nile, the donkey-boys close behind and hurrying them on and yelling at them; and the girls running along at our sides, and I could not help laughing outright at the novelty of the situation. At a distance of two miles from the Nile we came to a branch of the river so wide that we had to dismount and be ferried over. The ferry-boat was a large, open, and decidedly primitive craft, which could not come within a rod or two of the shore; so, after making the donkeys jump into the scow, two muscular-looking Arabs carried us (the riders) on their shoulders through the water. The donkey-boys and water-girls waded to the boat and easily helped themselves. With donkeys, donkey-boys, water-carriers, and sight-seers, we made an amusing cargo. We were, however, soon over, and again off across the plain.

Our direction was northwest, and after a mile or two we came to the ruins of the temple of Koorneh, at the extremity of the cultivated land, and near the entrance of a gorge. It was built, on a somewhat fantastical plan, by Sethi, son of Rameses I. and father of Rameses II. It is funereal in character. The deity to whom it was dedicated was Osiris himself. After entering the hall of six columns by the central doorway we found on the walls of the third chamber a fine head of Sethi, whose filial piety had raised this temple. The walls are covered with inscriptions representing scenes between the gods and the king, etc. When Sethi died the temple was unfinished; it was completed by Rameses II., who consecrated it to the memory of his father, as well as his grandfather, to whom it was originally dedicated. It would take considerable space to describe the inscriptions, and I will only say that the walls of the rooms are still standing, and are thoroughly covered with inscriptions.

THE TOMBS OF THE KINGS.

Near this temple we entered the desolate gorge or valley, of Bab-el-Modook. We rode for about an hour up the barren gorge with rocky and gravel hills on each side, looking as though a heavy water course might have rushed down there one hundred thousand years ago, but now it is as dry as the mouth of a volcano. In the rocks of these hills, in this lonely and desolate valley, are cut out large rooms or chambers running into the mountain sometimes two hundred feet, and in one case five hundred feet. The walls are cut square or are plastered over with a hard cement, the chambers being twelve or fifteen feet wide and nearly as high, and with wide chambers at intervals, the walls filled with inscriptions and engravings much in the style of those desribed at Sakkarah. One is struck with the immense amount of labor expended on these vast tombs, and the artistic skill displayed. The mummies were long since removed from them, but an air of solemnity and almost painful silence pervades these resting-places for Egypt's dead kings. The entrances are not very imposing, being a doorway of moderate size in the side of the mountain, with solid stone frame and unpretending exterior; but upon entering with candles lighted, the purposes and solemnity of the place are soon apparent. There are some twenty-four of these tombs in this vicinity—too many to be visited. Some are more interesting than others, and a selection of the most noted was made by the guide. When the royal mummy had been deposited in these resting-places, the entrance was walled up, and the surrounding earth was leveled so as to leave no external trace of the situation of the tomb. I will give a description of but a part. The tomb of Sethi is commonly called Belzoni's tomb. This is the most magnificent of all the tombs in this silent, lifeless gorge. By its grandeur and the profusion of sculptures with which it is adorned, it eclipses all the others. It was discovered in 1817 by Belzoni. It had already been violated, but still not a single bas-relief was then missing from the walls, and its pictures yet maintain their origiaal freshness, the most of them being artificially colored. But since that time much mutilation has taken place, which has amounted to nothing short of desecration.

Immediately on entering the tomb we found ourselves, as it were, transported into a new world. The almost joyous pictures of the tombs at Sakkarah have given place here to those more serious. The departed is not to be seen at home, surrounded by his family. No more making of furniture; no more building of ships; no more extensive farm yards, with cattle, oxen, antelopes, wild goats, geese, ducks, etc., marching in procession before the stewards. All has become fantastic and chimerical. Even the gods themselves assume strange forms. Long serpents glide hither and thither round the rooms or stand erect against the doorways. Some convicted malefactors are being decapitated and others are precipitated into the flames. It is not a difficult thing for a sense of horror to creep over the sensitive mind; but under these strange representations are the indications that the soul becomes happy at last after all his trials are over. Such, in fact, is the meaning of the pictures which adorn the walls of this tomb. It has been said that before, according to their kings, the honors of burial, the Egyptians passed judgment upon them. This legend is to be understood in an allegorical sense. The judgment of the soul, after being separated from the body, and the many trials it will be called upon to overcome by the aid only of such virtues as it has evinced while on earth, constitute the subject matter of the almost endless representations which cover the walls of this tomb, from the entrance to the extreme end of the last chamber, a distance of several hundred feet. The serpents standing erect over each portal, darting out venom, are guardians of the gates of heaven—the soul cannot pass unless justified by works of piety and benevolence. The long texts displayed over other parts of the walls are magnificent hymns to which the soul gives utterance in honor of the divinity whose glory and greatness it thus celebrates. When once the dead has been adjudged worthy of life eternal, these ordeals are at an end; he becomes part of the divine essence, and henceforth, a pure spirit, he wanders over the vast regions where the stars forever shine. Thus the tomb is only the emblem of the voyage of the soul in its eternal abode. The soul no sooner left the body than we are called upon from room to room to witness its progress as it appears before the gods and becomes gradually purified until at last in the grand hall at the end of the tomb we are present at its final admission into that life which a second death shall never reach.

When Belzoni discovered the tomb a fine sarcophagus in alabaster stood in the furthest chamber, but this was subsequently carried away to England, and is now in Sir John Soane's museum. In the center of this chamber is a passage which penetrates some distance into the ground. The tomb was to have been extended further in that direction, but whether Sethi died before it could be finished, or whether, as perhaps more probably is the case, a layer of argillaceous marl was encountered, which offered serious obstacles to further progress, this passage was discontinued, and its entrance to the chamber was hidden by a paving-stone over which the sarcophagus was finally deposited.

The next is that of Rameses III., called also the tomb of the Harpists. This is also very interesting, though not equal to the last. Toward the middle of the tomb, and on either side of the first two passages, are some chambers worthy of attention. The most varied scenes, with boats, household furniture and utensils, coats of arms, bows, arrows, and pikes, are here represented. One of these pictures is that of the celebrated harpists, of which several copies have been made. Like the other tombs, the walls of this are covered with pictures and representations cut in the rock and colored artistically.

The Tomb of Thotmes III. is also very interesting. On the left hand side of the room first entered is a large procession of Ethiopian and Asiatic chiefs, who are bringing tributes to the king; they are in five rows; the upper one consists of black and red men from the land of Paunt, who offer ebony, leopards, monkeys, hides, and dried fruit. Their dresses are short, in keeping with the custom of their country. In the second row the men are of a pale red color, with long, black, curly hair, but without beards; they wear short scarfs and sandals. Their presents consist of vases of very elegant forms, ornamented with flowers, necklaces, and other valuables. According to inscriptions, they are chiefs of Koofa. In the third line the "Chiefs of the Southern country" advance. Some are clothed in Egyptian dresses, others in skin aprons, the hair turned outward. They bring gold rings, monkeys, leopards, ebony, ivory, eggs of ostriches, feathers, giraffes, hounds with collars of precious stones, and bulls with long horns. The fourth row consists of a people of a northerly nation. They are clad in long white garments with a blue hem. Some wear a tight-fitting cap, others have nothing but their short reddish hair, and all have little beards. They bring long gloves, various vases, a carriage, horses, a bear and elephant, and ivory. Their name is Rotno. In the fifth row are first Egyptians, then follow women of Koos, carrying their children in baskets, and others of the Rotno in long cloaks with three collars. The presents are laid before the king, who is sitting on his throne, and are noted down by his secretaries. In the inner apartments are scenes taken from the lives of the Egyptian artisans, joiners, carpenters, rope-makers, and sculptors. Some of the latter are employed in cutting a stone square, others are working on a sphinx and two immense statues of the king. Further on are brick-makers; in another part they are boiling some fluid over a coal fire, which is blown by bellows. Some are employed with a brush in laying either glue or varnish on a board. On the opposite wall a maid-servant is represented pouring out some wine to a lady, and giving an empty cup to a black slave who stands behind her. Other guests are seated around, the women separated from the men, and they are entertained with music. There is also a garden on the right wall, in which the inhabitant of the tomb is drawn in a boat over a pond which is surrounded by Thebian palms and date-trees. There are also numerous representations of funeral ceremonies, and at the upper end of the tomb is a list of offerings and the names of those who presented them. These pictures are lively and free from stiffness and clumsiness. Many of the other tombs are very interesting, but probably those already described will give a fair view of the main part. After partaking of a lunch, which was carried out on the shoulders of an Arab, and having also the benefits of our water bearers, we climbed up by a very steep and precipitous path and reached the top of the Libyan range of mountains, from the top of which we had a splendid view of the Nile valley for a long distance north and south, and as far as the Arabian Mountains on the east. We took in all the site of old Thebes, the ruins below us, and much more additional country, which constituted a beautiful panorama. Descending on the east side of the mountain by a bridle-path as steep as we had climbed, and winding around among the piles of rubbish and ruins, where tombs and other structures once stood, we reached the small temple,

DEIR EL-BAHARI,

Built in the times of Thothmes III., and raised to the glory of Queen Hatasou. It is unlike any of the other Egyptian temples and has a different class of pictures and inscriptions. It was preceded formerly by a long line of sphinxes, now utterly destroyed, and two obelisks, of which nothing remains but the basis. Among the pictures troops are marching, preceded by trumpets and officers; the soldiers are fully equipped, some carrying in their hands branches of palm-trees, probably returning from a victorious campaign. In another part the queen has sent her troops into Arabia. Some of the servants are piling up enormous heaps of gum and other goods. The Egyptian fleet is drawn up close by, and the loading of ships is proceeded with. Bales of goods, earthen jars, live animals, trees—everything is carefully arranged in its appointed place. The ships are propelled by sails and by oars. Thebes at last is reached and the different items are enumerated. Among the rest is a procession of cynocephalous monkeys, panthers, giraffes, and short-horned oxen; while collars, chains, bracelets, daggers, and hatchets are all being classed in order. Ammon is witness of the scene and addresses his congratulations to the queen regent. In a side chamber to the south, another subject is presented. We no longer have the green waters of the Red Sea, but the blue waters of the Nile; in a lower compartment more troops are marching. Close by, a fine doorway, with many ruins heaped about it, leads into a chamber, the colors of which have retained all their vividness. On each side of the passage leading to this chamber are admirable sculptures representing a royal personage, who quenches his thirst with the milk of Hathor, under the form of the most beautiful cow that Egyptian bas-reliefs can show.

DEIR-EL-MEDINEH.

Pretty well up near the Libyan range, and in a sort of hollow, is this small temple, somewhat hidden from view. It was begun by Ptolemy Philapater and finished by his successors. The place which it occupies in the necropolis, and the presence of Osiris among the deities of the interior, indicate that the temple was a funeral monument. The inscriptions, however, give no certain clue to the definite intention, nor to the general idea which it served to commemorate. The façade of the temple is elegant. This temple was used by the early Christians for a church.

THE SITTING COLOSSI.

On our way back to the river we passed by the two immense figures in stone which for thousands of years have sat desolate in the green plains, sometimes surrounded by the waters of the Nile, when it overflows it banks. They were erected by King Amunoph and both represent him. Their hight is fifty-three feet. They measure eighteen feet across the shoulders, sixteen and a half feet from the shoulders to the elbows; ten and a half feet from the top of the head to the shoulders; thirteen feet from the elbows to the ends of the fingers, and nineteen feet eight inches from the knees to the soles of the feet. Each foot is ten and and a half feet long. The colossi are sixty feet apart; they sit with their faces toward the east. The faces have been sadly mutilated, as well as other parts of the monster statues. They are monoliths, though one of them has cracked into several pieces. They still present a very majestic appearance, and look as though they had been silently watching the passing events for the past three thousand years. Between the feet traces of small figures are seen, said to have been the consort of the king, whose figure, eighteen feet high, is on one side of the throne, while on the other is another which represents the mother of Amunoph. The throne is ornamented with figures of the Nile god, who holds in his hands the stalks of two plants peculiar to the Nile, twining around a kind of pedestal. A row of hieroglyphics reach from the shoulders of the statue down to the pedestal, which contain the name of the king.

In former times it was said that one of these statues made a sound, and hence was called "The Sounding Memnon." Tradition has it that it greeted the morning sun when it rose, to which Roman prefects and emperors listened with astonishment. In later times it was considered a mere freak of nature; after the coldness of night it was held that the morning sun drove the cold air through the cracks in the rocks, making a murmuring sound. In the present day, however, the statue is dumb; no more sounds are emitted from it, so that even this former wonder is now taken from it. Behind the monument is a cavity in which it is thought a priest used to secrete himself and make the doleful sounds attributed to the statue. The same thing is now sometimes done by one of the natives at the low price of two piasters.

We returned across the green field to the hotel, feeling that we had seen a good deal that is wonderful.

Wednesday, Dec. 21st.—We made our way again across the Nile as before, and found the donkeys, donkey-boys, and water-bearing girls again ready to receive us. Conceiving it wholly useless to have so many girls accompany us, we told Josef the guide that two girls would be quite enough to carry water for us, and that we preferred that the others remain behind. Josef soon selected the two girls that were to bear us company, upon which those not selected were nearly heart-broken. Fatma came to me with tears in her eyes, saying she could not go, and she wanted to carry water for me. I told her we did not need so many girls; that Josef had selected those he thought best, and that I feared she would have to submit to the inevitable. I impressed upon her mind that the best of friends often had to part, and handing her a piaster, I said, "Good-bye, Fatma; be a good girl; be virtuous and you will be happy." I presume Fatma will make Mehemet Ali a very good wife.

This morning, like all the mornings in this country, is extremely pleasant. The birds are out in great numbers flying around the fields. I think we saw not less than a thousand sparrows in one convention or gathering, and they are to be seen wherever we go. There are also many white pigeons a well as other birds. I hear no remarkable singers. We again crossed the second stream or branch as before and had the same experience in being carried to the ferry-boat, seeing the donkeys boosted in and out, etc. One of our party, Miss Rose, caught her first fall to-day; her saddle turned with her while her donkey was at a gallop, and she came to the ground; but as the sand was not hard, nor the distance great, she was not hurt. None of the falls our company have thus met with have been at all serious.

THE RAMESEUM, OR MEMNONIUM.

We rode by the two sitting colossi and took another look at them, and then made our way at once to one of the most remarkable of the old temples in Egypt; for elegance of structure and symmetrical architecture it is not surpassed. A ride of twenty minutes west of the colossi brought us to it. It was built by Rameses II., one of the ablest of the many kings of Egypt. His cartouches appear upon each of the walls, to perpetuate his own memory, to serve as his own cenotaph, and to be the lasting memorial of greatness and glory.

In front of a large court are two propylons, more or less injured by the ravages of time and by Cambyses and others, who were jealous of the fame of Egypt. These propylons, of heavy, hewn square blocks of stone, are more than forty feet in hight and perhaps one hundred and fifty feet each in length, with a high portal between the two towers, which recede gradually from the ground up, being much heavier at the base than above. One of the massive columns, between the towers, is leaning much and looks as though it must fall; but as it was described as in the same condition half a century ago, no apprehension of a speedy fall need be entertained. Both the wide towers are profusely adorned with sculptures representing the battle scenes in which Rameses, otherwise called Sesostris, was engaged. The king is represented in these scenes as fighting in the thick of the combat, changing expected defeat to victory by his own personal bravery.

Entering the second large court, against the columns surrounding it are seen large figures of Rameses with the attributes of Osiris. On the left hand lies the largest statue ever made in Egypt, and probably the largest monolith statue produced by the hand of man. It is a statue of Rameses, of fine red granite, in a sitting position, sixty feet high and estimated to weigh a thousand tons; and this enormous weight was conveyed from the cataract of the Nile some two hundred miles away. One is filled with wonder at the vast achievement of conveying so heavy a stone such a distance and placing it in position. But as huge as the statue is, it has been thrown over and broken by Cambyses or some other jealous person. To give some idea of its monster size I will state that one of its toes is thirteen inches in length. With considerable effort and by the aid of blocks of stone lying by the side of it I climbed on the prostrate head of the statue, some ten or twelve feet through. The miserable Arabs have cut out of the very face of the statue millstones for grinding grain, thus sadly defacing one of the grandest works of man. The surface of the statue is highly polished, and the execution throughout was of the highest character. The name of the artist is Memnon of Syene. According to Diodorus, the statue bore this inscription: "I am king of kings, Osimandyas; if any one wishes to know how great I am and where I lie, let him surpass one of my works."

On the front right corner of the second court still stand pillars which supported the mammoth figure of Osiris, whose heads the destructive Persians broke off. The headless statues still sit there with arms crossed, keeping watch of the desolation that reigns around.

These entrances from the second court led to a large saloon, somewhat in the manner of an odeon, and containing forty-eight large columns, still in very fair preservation. A double row of gigantic pillars, forty-five feet high and twenty-three in circumference, crowned with calyxed capitals (patterned after the lotus flower), leads through the middle and reaches the massive ceiling of heavy blocks of hewn stone, nearly twenty feet in length, three or four feet wide and two feet thick. These make one of the most permanent ceilings that could be devised. The two neighboring rows of columns want an addition of high windows over their burgeon capitals, in order to come half way up to the center nave, and so by these high windows to light these and the whole hall.

The forest of massive pillars, with coping bead, forming a grand colonnade on both sides, supported the lower stone roof of the aisle. At the entrance were colossal statues, amongst them that known as the young Memnon, the head of which is now in the British Museum. The calyxed capitals over the shafts of the center aisle are in great perfection. The elegant imbricated bowl at the base has still evident signs of a circle of calyx leaves. The shafts in the middle are perfectly round and smooth as far as the neck, with five fillets under the calyx. The other fillets are changed into hieroglyphics. The base of the column, faced with pointed leaves, is much dwindled away. There is also a smaller colonnade which once had apartments at the sides, and an astronomical ceiling, but of which nothing is left. Here was the library of the temple, over which were inscribed the words, "Refreshments for the mind." On the door columns leading into the adjacent part, are Seph, the goddess of libraries, and Thoth, the god of writing and theology, writing the name of Rameses II. on the leaf of a sacred tree, thus transmitting immortality.

Sculptures, inscriptions, and battle scenes are on the walls, little space being allowed to go unoccupied. At the upper end of the great hall, on the northwest wall, the king is represented as receiving a battle ax and two scepters from Amunre, who is accompanied by the goddess Mont. The hieroglyphics state that the goddess is the guardian of the palace of Rameses the Great, and that the king is to smite the heads of his enemies with the battle-ax, and with the scepter rule the land of Egypt. On the corresponding wall he receives the sistrum, the emblem of life and authority to govern from Amunre, who is accompanied by Konso, in the presence of the lion-headed goddess. On each of the walls under these are tablets, on which are represented a procession of the twenty-three sons of the king, and in the west corner three of his daughters. The ruins of small temples are lying around; among them those of the temple-palace of Amunoph III., about three thousand feet to the southwest of them, consisting of fragments of pillars, sphinxes, and statues. From these ruins were dromos eleven hundred feet long, of which but few traces remain. In the immediate vicinity are also the ruins of an old Coptic village.

We next visited the pit or excavation whence the thirty-seven mummies and the large quantities of antiquities now in the museum at Cairo were taken out six months ago, of which an account is already given. It is located in the very edge of the Libyan range of mountains, and looks like a shaft twelve or fifteen feet square, and thirty-five or forty feet deep. A deep lateral passage from the bottom is said to lead into the mountain. We had to climb up a steep mass of loose rubbish, the fragments of broken stone and earth, to reach the opening, which is in a hidden nook in the mountain. When well covered the place would seem a very secure one to contain mummies. It is as dry a place as could be imagined. It is thought that, fearing the tombs of the kings were about to be rifled of the mummies they contained, the priests caused this shaft to be excavated, and removed the mummies there for safety. Others think the tombs were built to mislead as to the real place where the mummies of the kings were deposited; that they really never contained the royal mummies, and that they were put in this pit at first where they were found.

TEMPLE OF MEDEENET-HABOO.

We next visited these remarkable ruins, consisting of two temples, one of Thothmes III. and one of Rameses III. In these ruins, under the empire, a Coptic cathedral was found, and around it clustered a Coptic village called Medeenet-Haboo. Hence the name generally given to the ruins.

The temple of Thothmes III. is the smaller of the two. The court—eighty feet by one hundred and twenty-five—by the flowered capitals of its columns and the style of its sculptures and hieroglyphics, belongs to the Roman epoch. It also bears the names of Titus, Adrian, Antoninus, etc. Beyond this court, which is a Ptolemaic addition, is another smaller court, with cartouches of Tirhakeh (twenty-fifth dynasty), and Neetanebo (thirtieth dynasty). The temple itself is more ancient still, being erected and adorned by Thothmes II. and Thothmes III.

The temple of Rameses III. was erected by him in the immediate vicinity of the smaller edifice just described. This grand building is of great historical importance, and by its style and general effect and variety of decoration makes a profound and lasting impression. The edifice consists of a palace and a temple, separated by a court, forming together a gorgeous structure, highly decorated, a labyrinth of immense courts, innumerable pillars, and superb colonnades. Many parts are still perfect, but all around columns, bright and vivid with every color of the rainbow, lie scattered in countless profusion.

The palace, though probably intended as a grand monument of military architecture, rather than as actual habitation, has all the characteristics of a royal residence. The main part of the edifice consists of two immense pyramidal tower. The exterior architecture merits careful study, but it is in the interior decoration that the chief interest of the palace centers. Here Rameses III. is seen at home in the bosom of his family. One lady offers him flowers; in another picture he is caressing a favorite, in a third he is invited by a lady to a game of draughts or checkers.

In a building of such importance Rameses was not likely to omit to display himself as the great conqueror. At the entry gate he is shown presenting his prisoners to the gods, and in these prisoners are skilfully portrayed the races inhabiting Western Asia, Libya, and Soudan in the thirteenth century before our era. Similar pictures, with the ethnological characteristics of the various races most carefully rendered, are met with on various portions of the walls, and in the inner courts of the palatial pile.

The temple, north of the palace, is approached by a doorway or propylon between the two towers. Over this doorway are sculptures commemorating the victorious enterprises of Rameses against the Libyans and their allies. On the northern façade of this pylon is a sculpture representing the king receiving the falchion of vengeance from Ammon Armachis, who thus addresses the monarch: "I turn my face toward the north, and I will that Phœnicia be under my feet; I will that the nations that acknowledge not Egypt bring thee their gold, their silver, and their precious stones. . . . I turn my face toward the East, and I will that Arabia provide thee perfumes and essences, rare woods, and all its products," etc.

The court, measuring 110 feet by 185, is remarkable for the enormous Osiride columns, seven in number, adorning one of its sides, and revealing the funereal character of this monumental pile, for these statues are those of the king himself, with the attributes of Osiris. On the other side of the court are eight elegant columns with papyrus capitals. After examining from this point of view the various tableaux on the surrounding walls, commemorating the warlike achievements of the king, we passed through the granite portals of the second propylon, which is surrounded by a row of apes, emblems of Thoth, into the finest inner court found in any of the Egyptian temples.

This splendid area measures 123 feet by 135. Its hight to the cornice is nearly forty feet. Corridors covered with sculptures, brilliantly colored, surround the four sides, in front of which is an inner peristyle, supported on the north and south by Osiride pillars, and on the east and west by massive columns with capitals representing the flower of the lotos closed. In the center of the court are remains of columns once forming part of the Christian cathedral, erected here when Medeenet-Haboo was a Coptic settlement. These columns are very inferior in size and richness to the surrounding much older and better work.
